13 For, brethren, ye have been called (by Christianity) unto liberty (from the Jewish yoke); only (be careful that ye) use not (your) liberty [8] for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another.

upon that faith, the Holy Ghost, they could not afterward submit to the observance of the law; but by so doing, they must testify they thought not faith in Christ sufficient to justification, or acceptance with God, without the observance of the law; and therefore must submit to it for these ends, and so must in effect deny that faith in Christ would justify them, or that the giving of the Holy Ghost was a sufficient evidence of their acceptance with God; which was a tempting or distrusting of God, after so full a demonstration of his grace and favour to them (Acts xv. 8—10).

I therefore think these words concern as well those Jews as gentiles, who sought for justification still, not by their faith in Christ, but through the works of the law (Rom. ix. 31, 32), and held circumcision necessary to all; not by way of precept only, but as a necessary means of salvation: for by these things, saith the apostle, they in effect declared that "Christ was dead in vain," and "frustrated the grace of Christ" (Gal. ii. 21), and so fell from it. Nor is it easy to perceive how they should have justification and salvation from him, from whom, after the revelation of him, they did not expect it; or have faith in him to justification, by whom they thought not that they should be justified.

[2] Ver. 5. Ἐλπίδα δικαιοσύνης, Hope of righteousness.] Or justification, i. e. the hope of glory, the consequent of our justification: for, "being justified by faith, we have peace with God, and rejoice in the hope of the glory of God:" it is through the Spirit that we wait for, and expect this glory: for he is the pledge and earnest of it; "by him we are sealed up to the day of redemption, and wrought up to the expectation of it" (Rom. v. 1, 2, Eph. i. 14, 2 Cor. i. 22, Eph. iv. 33, 2 Cor. v. 5, Rom. v. 5); and therefore are not ashamed of our hope, "because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Spirit he hath given us:" and thus we do, "who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, wait for the redemption of our bodies, and the glorious liberty of the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 21. 23).

[3] Ver. 6. Πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη, Faith working by love.] There be great disputes about, and divers interpretations of, these words, which I think may be rendered, Faith working or made active by love, or excited to perform our duty to God, and to our neighbour for his sake, by that love which we bear to him; or from considerations of his great love to us, according to those words of the apostle, "The love of Christ constraineth us," 2 Cor. v. 14. And here, "The life I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me," Gal. ii. 20.

[4] Ver. 8. This persuasion cometh not of him that calleth you.] Here Jerome's note runs thus: Persuasio nostra non est ex eo qui vocavit nos, sed ex nobis qui consentimus, vel non consentimus vocanti; aliud quippe Dei opus, aliud hominum: Dei opus est vocare, hominum credere, vel non credere; et sicubi alitèr de scripturis liberum hominis affirmatur arbitrium, ut ibi, Si volueritis, et si audieritis me, Exod. xix. 2, et iterùm, Et nunc Israel, quid petit à te Dominus Deus tuus? Deut. x., et ex hôc loco vel maximè comprobatur. Accusat enim, quare non obediverint veritati, ostendens in eorum arbitrio positum vel obedire vel non obedire. And in this he speaks the sense of all the ancients till Austin's time.

[5] Ver. 9. A little leaven, &c.] That is, saith Chrysostom, circumcision, though it be but one command, brings us under an obligation to obey the whole Jewish law, as the apostle teacheth, ver. 3.

[6] Ver. 11. Εἰ περιτομὴν ἔτι κηρύσσω, If I yet preach circumcision.] All the Greek interpreters say, this verse returns an answer to the suggestions of the patrons of the law, viz. that* "he was a hypocrite, in some places preaching up circumcision, in others not" (see the note on iii. 4).

[7] Ver. 12. Ὄφελον καὶ ἀποκόψονται, I wish they were even cut off.] The interpretation of all the Greek fathers, and of Ambrose, Austin, and Jerome on this place, is this, Utinam non solùm circumcidantur, sed etiam abscindantur, "I wish not only they were circumcised, but even made like the priests of the mother of the gods, worshipped formerly by you of Galatia, who had that member cut off." But if this interpretation seem too light to be affixed to the words of the apostle, I rather choose to interpret them as a wish, that they were cut off from the communion of the church, because this seems agreeable to a like passage, 1 Cor. v. 6, 7, where having said, as here, "A little leaven leavens the whole lump," he adds, "Purge out therefore the old leaven," i. e. "Put away from yourselves the wicked person," which he himself here would not do alone; because he saw his authority among them was impaired, and he feared this rather might exasperate, than cure their distemper (see note on 2 Cor. x. 16). That ὄφελον is sometimes joined with an aorist, and sometimes with an imperfect of the indicative mood, we learn from these examples, ὄφελον ἐν ᾅδῃ με ἐφύλαξας, "I wish thou wouldest hide me in the grave," Job xiv. 13; ὄφελον γὲ ἐβασιλεύσατε, "I wish you did reign," 1 Cor. iv. 8.

[8] Ver. 13. Εἰς ἀφορμὴν τῇ σαρκὶ, For an occasion of the flesh.] This is done (1.) by a carnal use of it to gratify the motions of the flesh, as they who "turned the grace of God into lasciviousness," and thought they might sin more freely, "because they were not under the law, but under grace" (Rom. vi. 1. 15): or, (2.) by an uncharitable use of it, to the scandal of their weak brethren; or the contempt of those who did not fully understand their liberty; or by contending with, or biting one another (ver. 16), which was an evidence that they were carnal (1 Cor. iii. 3): or, lastly, by refusing obedience to their masters (see note on 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2), and subjection to superiors (see note on 1 Pet. ii. 16); the remedy of which distempers is true Christian love; for "he that loves sincerely will not refuse to serve him whom he loves."†

* Ὑποκριτής ἐστιν ἀλλαχοῦ περιτομὴν κηρύσσων, ἀλλαχοῦ δὲ οὔ. Theodoret.

† Ὁ γὰρ εἰλικρίνως ἀγαπῶν οὐδὲ δουλεύειν παραιτεῖται τῷ φιλουμένῳ. Theophylact.

14 [9] For all the (moral) law (respecting our neighbour) is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

15 But [10] if ye (in contradiction to this law) bite (calumniate) and devour one another, take heed that ye be not (in the issue) consumed one of another.

16 [11] This I say then (to prevent these miscarriages), Walk in the Spirit (i. e. according to the motions of the Holy Spirit, Rom. viii. 1, 2. 9. 12—14), and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh: (i. e. these carnal motions, ver. 13, and those uncharitable contentions, ver. 15.)

17 For the flesh (indeed) lusteth against the Spirit (and so incites you to these things), and (but) the Spirit (lusteth) against the flesh: and these (two principles) are contrary the one to the other: so that ye (who are led by the Spirit) cannot do the things that ye would (according to the flesh; nor ye who are led by the flesh, the things that ye would according to the Spirit).

18 But if ye be led of the (conduct of the Holy) Spirit, ye are not under the law (and so sin shall not have dominion over you, Rom. vi. 14).

19 [12] Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness,

20 Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies,

21 Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

22 But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, 23 Meekness, temperance: against such [13] there is no law (that can condemn or render them obnoxious to the wrath of God).

24 And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts (of it).

25 If (then) we (pretend to) live in (and by) the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit (according to the motions, not of the flesh but of the Spirit).

26 Let us not be desirous of vain glory (Gr. vainglorious), [14] provoking one another, envying one another.

[9] Ver. 14. The whole law is fulfilled in this, That thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.] So that if thou be still desirous to fulfil the law, thou mayest do it by observing this comprehensive law of love. So Œcumenius.

[10] Ver. 15. Εἰ δὲ ἀλλήλους δάκνετε, If ye bite, &c.] Theodoret here notes, that the contentions and quarrels which arose betwixt them that stood firm, and those who warped to the legal observances, gave occasion to these words: and as I have observed, that the zeal of the Jews would not suffer an uncircumcised person to live among them, so might it be also with these zealous Judaizers.

[11] Ver. 16, 17.] Note, that I have interpreted these verses as most commentators do; but I conceive, they may be best interpreted from Rom. vii. thus:

Ver. 16. "But this I say (to take you off from this bondage to the law), Walk in the Spirit (in newness of the Spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter, Rom. vii. 6) and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh; (i. e. the motions of the flesh shall not have dominion over you, and bring you captive to the law of sin, as it doth in them; because ye are not under the law, but under grace, Rom. vi. 14.)

Ver. 17. "For (in them) the flesh lusteth against the Spirit (or inward man not renewed, ver. 23. 25), and the Spirit lusteth against the flesh (ver. 19—22), and these two are contrary; so that ye (who are under the law, and walk not in newness of the Spirit) cannot do the things that ye would (for the good that ye would, ye do not, ver. 19)."

[12] Ver. 19. Τὰ ἔργα τῆς σαρκός, The works of the flesh.] That some of these may very properly be called works of the flesh, cannot be doubted; but seeing some of these sins seem chiefly to consist in errors of the mind, as heresy and idolatry, and others of them to derive from evil dispositions of the spirit, as envy, malice, witchcraft, it seems not easy to perceive with what propriety they are here called the works of the flesh. But,

1. That "strife, contentions, bitter zeal," are indeed works of the flesh, we may discern from a reflection on the usual objects of them; for we do not use to contend with or envy men on the account of things truly spiritual, because they bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, or have the pleasures of an upright conscience; but our contentions generally are about worldly, carnal things, the pleasures, honours, or enjoyments of the present world: for "whence come zeal and envy?" saith James, "come they not from your lusts which war in your members?" James iv. 1.

Moreover, "murder" and "witchcrafts," or φαρμακεῖαι, as that word imports, those poisonous ingredients which are used to destroy human life, are the fruits of this hatred, envy, malice; and so must have their rise from the same sensual lusts.

The idolatry of the heathens, not only as it was attended with revellings and uncleanness, but as it represented God to corporeal eyes in images, and brought him down unto the senses, may well be deemed a sensual crime.

And, lastly, heresy, according to the scripture notion, being not a pure mistake of judgment, but an espousing a false doctrine out of disgust, pride, or envy, or from worldly principles, or to avoid persecution or trouble in the flesh, may well be ranked among carnal lusts. Hence are such men said, "not to serve God, but their own belly" (Rom. xvi. 17, 18), to "teach what they ought not for filthy lucre's sake" (Tit. i. 11), to "account gain for godliness" (1 Tim. vi. 5), and "through covetousness, with feigned words, to make merchandise of others" (2 Pet. ii. 3); and therefore the apostle doth not advise us to convince, but only to admonish and reject the heretic, as knowing that "he sins, being convinced of his own conscience" (see note on Tit. iii. 10).

[13] Ver. 23. Οὐκ ἔστι νόμος, There is no law.] The exposition of those who say, "Such persons had no law," is not to be approved, because it suits not with the word κατὰ τοιούτων, "Against such there is no law." Moreover, the law of liberty they are under was given to oblige them to the practice of these virtues; and so was needful to that end.

[14] Ver. 26. Ἀλλήλους προκαλούμενοι, Provoking one another, &c.] Theodoret here observes, that they who stood firm in the faith, and so enjoyed their spiritual gifts, might be apt to condemn, and glory over the weak on that account; and others might envy their gifts: and this shows the seasonableness of this exhortation, and connects these words with the beginning of the following chapter, where the apostle condemns them who had high thoughts of themselves, and upon that account were apt to overlook and to neglect their fallen brother.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 1. Παραπτώματι, With a fault.] They seem not well to have considered the use of this word in scripture, who say it is, lapsus hominis ex improviso impingentis, "a fault committed unawares, or for want of circumspection;" since the apostle applies it to all the sins of the heathen world, styling them νεκροὶ ἐν τοῖς παραπτώμασι, "dead in trespasses," Eph. ii. 1. 5, Col. ii. 13, and to all the sins forgiven us through faith in Christ, Rom. iv. 25, v. 16, 2 Cor. v. 19, Eph.

gifts which enable you for the public ministrations in the church), restore such an one [3] in the spirit of meekness (to a right understanding of his duty, and a suitable practice); considering thyself, [4] lest thou also be tempted (and so fall as he did).

2 Bear ye one another's burdens (infirmities in judgment or in manners), and so fulfil the law of Christ (which requires you by love to serve one another, v. 13).

3 For [5] if a man think himself to be something, when (wanting charity, 1 Cor. xiii. 2, 3) he is nothing, he deceiveth himself.

4 But (to avoid this deceit) [6] let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not (only) in (comparing himself with) another.

5 For every man shall bear [7] his own burden.

(The apostle having thus instructed their teachers, or spiritual men, not to despise or undervalue their Christian brethren, proceeds now to instruct these brethren how to behave themselves towards their teachers, saying,)

6 Let him that is taught in the word [8] communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things (he stands in need of, as God's blessing may enable him).

7 Be not deceived (by your false teachers); God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, (of) that (kind) shall he also reap.

8 For he that soweth to his flesh (by doing the works of the flesh, v. 20, 21) shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit (by bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit, mentioned v. 22, 23) shall of the Spirit (raising him up to it, Rom. viii. 11) reap life everlasting.

9 And (but then) let us not be weary in well doing (or of exercising these fruits of the Spirit): for [9] in due season we shall reap (the rewards of them), if we faint not (but hold out unto the end).

10 As we have therefore opportunity (ability), let us do good (and charitable offices) unto all men, [10] especially unto them who are of the houshold of faith.

11 Ye [11] see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand.

i. 7. The word προληφθῇ seems rather to import such a surprise.

[2] Ὑμεῖς οἱ πνευματικοί, You that are spiritual.] I have noted on 1 Cor. xiv. 32, that in the beginning of Christianity, when churches were first converted, they had for a time no settled church-governors; but all their church-offices were performed by men who had spiritual gifts; and by them are said to prophesy in the church, to their edification, exhortation, and comfort, ver. 3. So I conceive it was when Paul writ to the Galatians: for, here is no direction of this epistle to any stated church-governors; no salutation of any in the close; no charge against any for suffering these great miscarriages in the church; no exhortation to them to take heed of their ministry, and to oppose themselves to these deceivers: and then the spiritual men here mentioned must be the prophets, who then performed all spiritual offices among them.

[3] Ἐν πνεύματι πραΰτητος, In the spirit of meekness.] 2 Tim. ii. 24, that so they may not provoke them to fly off to Judaism (v. 26), whom they should restore to a right understanding of their Christian liberty, and to a freedom from that yoke of bondage.

[4] Μὴ καὶ σὺ πειρασθῇς, Lest thou also be tempted.] i. e. Lest thou fall by temptation: for to stand firm against temptation, when it assaults us, is not a proper consideration to engage us to pity those that fall by it. This is the import of the word, when we are taught to pray, That we enter not into temptation, Matt. vi. 13, when the apostle bids the married persons live together, "that Satan tempt them not for their incontinence," 1 Cor. vii. 5; when he is solicitous for the Thessalonians, "lest the tempter should have tempted them, and rendered his labours vain," 1 Thess. iii. 3; and when James saith, "Every man is tempted when he is led away by his own lust," James i. 14.

[5] Ver. 3. Εἰ γὰρ δοκεῖ τις εἶναι τι, μηδὲν ὤν, If a man thinks himself something, being nothing,] Of himself, but "by the grace of God being what he is" (1 Cor. xv. 10, 2 Cor. xii. 11): so some truly, but not so pertinently to the scope of the text: say others, "Being nothing in the sight of God;" who regards him not for his knowledge, but his charity (1 Cor. xiii. 2, 3); i. e. if upon this account he overlooks and despiseth his weak offending brother, not sympathizing with him (ver. 2), or endeavouring to restore him (ver. 1), but rather glorying in this, that he is a strong Christian in comparison of others; he is then nothing in the sight of God.

[6] Ver. 4. Δοκιμαζέτω ἕκαστος, Let every man prove.] i. e. Let him approve his actions to God and his own conscience; and then he may take comfort simply in himself, that he is a good man, and not in this only, that he is better than others. So the word signifies, Rom. i. 28, οὐκ ἐδοκίμασαν, "They approved not" of God; Rom. ii. 18, δοκιμάζεις, "Thou approvest the things which are most excellent;" Rom. xii. 2, "Be transformed by the renewing of your mind, εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν, that you may approve the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God;" and, xiv. 22, "Happy is the man who doth not condemn," or act against his conscience, ἐν ᾧ δοκιμάζει, "in that which by his actions he approves of" (see Eph. v. 10, Phil. i. 10, 1 Thess. ii. 4, 1 Tim. iii. 10, and note on 1 Cor. xi. 28).

[7] Ver. 5. Τὸ ἴδιον φορτίον, His own burden.] i. e. This every man is concerned to do; viz. to make his own work good, and approved in the sight of God: for another man's greater sins will not excuse thee from bearing the burden of thy own.

[8] Ver. 6. Κοινωνείτω, Let him communicate.] This he elsewhere styles, "communication, εἰς λόγον δόσεως, καὶ λήψεως, by giving" their good things, and "receiving" his good instructions (Phil. iv. 15), by "sowing spirituals" and "reaping" of them "carnal things" (1 Cor. ix. 11): and if this was their duty towards such teachers, as had no need of books or study to fit themselves for the work, they being enabled for it by immediate assistance and gifts of the Holy Ghost; how much more towards them who spend much time and money to fit themselves for that work, and must be still employed in studying and reading, to make themselves such "workmen as need not to be ashamed?"

The following words, ver. 7, are by most interpreters referred to the same subject thus, "Make no false excuses in this case, God will not be mocked with vain pretences." But I rather think the apostle proceeds to a new general exhortation against the carnal doctrines of their deceivers, "the hidden things of dishonesty," which he charges them with, 2 Cor. iv. 2, vii. 1, 2, xii. 21, whose "exhortation was attended with uncleanness," 1 Thess. ii. 2 (see note on 2 Cor. iv. 2), against which doctrines this is his usual preface, "Let no man deceive you with vain words," Eph. v. 6, 1 Cor. vi. 9, James i. 16.

[9] Ver. 9. Καιρῷ ἰδίῳ, In due season.] i. e. In the proper time of recompense: for the encouragement Christ gives unto the works of charity is this, "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just," Luke xiv. 14.

[10] Ver. 10. Let us do good to all men.] By this precept, saith Chrysostom, he extends the love of the Christian beyond that of the Jews, which was confined, πρὸς τοὺς ὁμοφύλους, "to men of their own nation and religion."

[11] Ver. 11. Ἴδετε πηλίκοις ὑμῖν γράμμασιν ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρί, See how large a letter I have written to you with my own hand.] It is true that γράμματα sometimes signifies "epistles," as when the Jews say to Paul, οὔτε γράμματα περὶ σου ἐδεξάμεθα, "We have received no letters concerning thee," Acts xxviii. 21; but then it is also true, that Paul elsewhere uses seventeen times the word ἐπιστολαί, but never the word γράμματα, when he speaks of his epistles. Though, therefore, it be true that Paul wrote his other epistles by an amanuensis (Rom. xvi. 22), adding only in the close of them the salutation with his own hand, as an indication that he indited the epistles (see note on 2 Thess. iii. 17); whereas this whole epistle was written with his own hand for their greater assurance, and as a testimony of his great

12 As many as desire to make a fair shew in (things concerning) the flesh (endeavouring to gratify men, and avoid their displeasure), they (would) constrain you to be circumcised; only lest they should suffer persecution (from their hands) [12] for the cross of Christ.

13 (I say, it is upon this account, and not out of regard to the law, that they so zealously plead for circumcision, and the observation of it;) [13]For neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, [14] that they may glory in your flesh.

14 But (whatsoever they may glory in) God forbid that I should glory, save in the (knowledge and in the profession of the) cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world (ii. 20, as being dead to sin, Rom. vi. 3, 4, to the flesh, Gal. v. 24, to the law by the body of Christ, and separated from the world to live unto God).

15 For [15] in (the economy of) Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature (one dead to sin, the flesh, and the world, but living unto God).

16 And as many as walk according to this rule (being chiefly concerned that the new covenant may be formed in them), peace (shall) be on them, and mercy, and (or, that is) upon the Israel (not of the flesh, but) of God.

17 From henceforth let no man [16] trouble me (with their contentions against my office; because I renounce circumcision, and my legal righteousness): for I bear in my body the marks of (a servant, not of the law, but of) the Lord Jesus (these wounds and stripes which testify me to be a faithful servant of that Jesus for whose sake I suffer them).

18 Brethren, the grace (favour and good-will) of our Lord Jesus Christ be [17] with your spirit. Amen.

affection and concernment for them: yet πήλικα γράμματα, "what kind of letters," may not refer to that; but, as the Greek scholiast conceives, to the largeness or inelegancy of the characters in which it was written, this inaccurateness in writing or forming the Greek characters being the most probable account why all his other epistles were written by another hand.

[12] Ver. 12. Τῷ σταυρῷ, &c. For the cross of Christ.] I have shown (note on v. 11) that this was the great stumbling-block of the Jews, partly because their law pronounced a curse on those that "hanged on a tree" (see note on 1 Cor. i. 23); partly because the cross, and sufferings of Christ on it, was the foundation of the doctrine of justification by faith in his blood, of the cessation of the ceremonial law, and the removal of the partition-wall betwixt the Jew and gentile (Col. ii. 14. 16); on which account chiefly they were scandalized at it, and persecuted those who thought that this was the result of our Lord's death and sufferings. St. Jerome here saith, that Octavianus Augustus, Tiberius, and Caius Cæsar had made laws that the Jews dispersed through the whole Roman empire should live according to their own laws and ceremonies; whosoever therefore was circumcised, though he believed in Christ, was by the gentiles deemed a Jew; but they who had not this token of a Jew, viz. the circumcision of the flesh, were persecuted both by Jew and gentiles: has igitur persecutiones hi, qui Galatas depravaverant, declinare cupientes, circumcisionem pro defensione discipulis persuadebant; "and hence they who perverted the Galatians persuaded them to be circumcised, that they might avoid persecution."

[13] Ver. 13. Οὐδὲ γὰρ νόμον φυλάσσουσιν, For neither do they keep the law.] This was unquestionably true of these Judaizing Christians: for how, saith Theodoret, could they in Galatia regularly observe the Jewish feasts, or offer sacrifice, or cleanse themselves from their defilements, by touching any thing that was unclean?

[14] Ἵνα ἐν τῇ ὑμετέρᾳ σαρκὶ καυχήσωνται, That they might glory in your flesh.] i. e. Might boast of this among the Jews, that they promoted circumcision even among the gentiles, and by that pretence might avoid persecution from them.

[15] Ver. 15. Ἐν γὰρ Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ οὔτε περιτομή τι ἰσχύει.] Dr. Mills omits the words scored, and reads οὐ περιτομή τι ἐστὶν· but the words, as they are in the text, are not only owned by the Vulgar, Arabic, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, but are exactly the same in v. 6 (see Examen Millii in locum).

[16] Ver. 17. Let no man trouble me, ἐγὼ γὰρ τὰ στίγματα τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ ἐν τῷ σώματί μου βαστάζω, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.] i. e. Let no man henceforth question, whether I truly style myself Paul the servant of Jesus Christ, or fight the good fight of faith, as a good soldier under this Captain of salvation; seeing whereas servants and soldiers have only one στίγμα, as a mark of their relation to their masters and generals, in their hands or wrists, I bear many marks of these relations to the Lord Jesus, throughout my whole body, in those many wounds and stripes I have received for his sake.

[17] Ver. 18. Μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν, With your spirit.] That is, "with you;" for in other epistles it is μεθ' ὑμῶν, "with you," 1 Cor. xvi. 23, Col. iv. 18, 1 Thess. v. 28, or μετὰ πάντων ὑμῶν, "with you all," Rom. xvi. 24, 2 Cor. xiii. 13, Phil. iv. 23, 2 Thess. iii. 18, Tit. iii. 15, Heb. xiii. 25.

THE

EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS,*

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

§. 1. That this Epistle to the Ephesians was indeed written by Paul, and directed to them, and not to any other church, we cannot doubt, if we believe either the epistle or Paul himself. For,

First, It begins thus: "Paul, an apostle (writeth these things) to the saints that are at Ephesus." And in this reading all the versions and all the manuscripts agree.

Secondly, In the close of this epistle he speaks thus to them: "That you may know my affairs, and how I do, Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, shall make known to you all things; whom I have sent unto you," vi. 21, 22: and in the Second Epistle to Timothy he saith, "Tychicus I have sent to Ephesus," iv. 12.

* Ἡ πρὸς Ἐφεσίους Ἐπιστολή. See this title confirmed by the clear testimony of the fathers of the four centuries, and the mistakes of Dr. Mills discovered, Examen Millii.

Moreover, all antiquity agrees in this, that this epistle was written by Paul: Ignatius* is express for it in his Epistle to the Ephesians. Irenæus,† Clemens of Alexandria,‡ and Origen,§ in divers places of their works. We learn, indeed, from the argument of this epistle in Œcumenius, and more fully from Theodoret,‖ that some of the ancients thought this epistle was writ by Paul before he had seen the Ephesians, or at least before his three years' converse with them: but not any of the ancients, excepting Marcion, ever thought that this epistle was not written among other churches to that of Ephesus, but that of Laodicea; and therefore Tertullian¶ takes notice of it as a thing proper to those heretics, though indeed both might be true; for this epistle being writ not only to the saints at Ephesus, but also "to the faithful in Christ Jesus," might be writ also to the Colossians, the Laodiceans, and others, who had not seen his face (Col. ii. 1, see note on Col. iv. 16). And this observation gives a sufficient answer to the arguments from i. 15, iii. 2, from which some have conjectured, that this epistle could not be writ to them after St. Paul had staid three years in Asia, though they more fully are considered in their respective places.

§. 2. That this epistle was written when Paul was prisoner at Rome, is evident from iii. 1, where he is styled "Paul the prisoner of Jesus Christ;" and, iv. 1, "a prisoner in the Lord." Now, it must be at soonest in the third year of Nero that he was sent prisoner to Rome; for Felix was made procurator of Judea by Nero in his first year, saith Josephus,* and after two years he left Paul prisoner at Cæsarea (Acts xxiv. 27). Portius Festus succeeds him, and after some time hears him twice at Cæsarea, and sends him afterward to Rome; which interval, if we consider how long it was before he reached Rome, may very well be supposed to take up another year: he therefore could not write this epistle till the fourth or fifth of Nero. He did not write it, saith Bishop Pearson, till the eighth of Nero, A. D. 62.

§. 3. That this epistle was writ against Simon Magus, and his followers, as Esthius hints, none of the ancients say. More probable is the conjecture of Grotius, that the apostle rather designed by it to arm them against the doctrines of the philosophers, and of those Jews who endeavoured to bring them to the observation of their rites; for that there were then many Jews at Ephesus, and throughout Asia, we learn both from the Acts of the Apostles, which inform us, that Paul being at Ephesus, "entered into a synagogue of the Jews" (Acts xviii. 19, xix. 8—10), and discoursed with them, till by their perverseness he was forced to separate from them; and that by his preaching, "all that were in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks:" as also from Philo,† who informs us, that "the Jews inhabited the most and best cities in the provinces and islands both of Europe and Asia." And that these Jews were disturbers of the churches of Asia, and of Ephesus in particular, and sticklers to introduce a mixture of Judaism with Christianity, we learn from both the Epistles to Timothy. Against their doctrine of the necessity of the observance of the law of Moses to justification and salvation, he seemeth to oppose these words, "By grace ye are saved, not of works, lest any man should boast," ii. 8, 9, which manifestly answer to his discourse upon that subject, Rom. iii., where he asserts, that "we are justified freely by his grace," ver. 24, "and not by the works of the law," ver. 20, and that all "boasting is excluded, not by the law of works, but of faith."‡ Against that other notion of theirs, depending on the former, that the gentiles should be admitted into the church only as proselytes, and not assumed to the same privileges with the Jews, he declares himself more largely, ii. 12—20, iii. 6—10.

CHAPTER I.

1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God (calling me to that office), [1] to the saints which are at Ephesus, [2] and to the faithful in Christ Jesus (throughout all Asia):

2 [3] Grace be (given) to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 Blessed be the (that) God and (who is) Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with [4] all

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Τοῖς ἁγίοις, To the saints.] See the note on 1 Cor. i. 1.

[2] Καὶ, And, that is.] See note on Col. i. 3.

Καὶ πιστοῖς, And (that is) to the faithful.] So οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς πιστοὶ, are "the believers of the circumcision," Acts x. 25; τίς μέρις πιστῷ μετ' ἀπίστου, "What portion hath a believer with an infidel?" 2 Cor. vi. 15; so Acts xvi. 1, 1 Tim. iv. 3. 10. 12, Tit. i. 6; yet it is very probable, as Mr. L. here suggests, that here and Col. i. 2, these words may particularly relate to such Christians as kept the doctrine of Christ from the corrupt mixtures of those Judaizers, who went about, καπηλεύοντες, 2 Cor. ii. 17, καὶ δολοῦντες τὸν λόγον, "corrupting and handling the word of God deceitfully."

[3] Ver. 2. Χάρις, Grace.] This grace is given by the communication of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son to the church (John xiv. 23), which is the reason that the Holy Ghost is not mentioned in these salutations.

[4] Ver. 3. Ἐν πάσῃ εὐλογίᾳ πνευματικῇ ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις.] These words ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, "in heavenly places," may probably refer to the gifts of the Holy Ghost then conferred upon the church, and styled by the prophet, εὐλογίαι Θεοῦ, "the blessings of God:"—"Fear not, Jacob my servant, and Israel whom I have chosen, for I will put my Spirit on thy seed, καὶ τὰς εὐλογίας μου, and my blessings on thy children," Isa. xliv. 2, 3, where the word in the Hebrew and Chaldee is וברכתי, "and my benediction," and so well correspondeth with the words of the apostle, "God hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings." The same apostle styles these gifts εὐλογία τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, "the blessings of the gospel;" for having said to the Romans, "I long to see you that I may impart unto you χάρισμα τὸ πνευματικὸν, some spiritual gift, to the end you may be established," i. 11, he adds, "When I come to see you, I shall come in the fullness, τῆς εὐλογίας, spiritual blessings in heavenly places (or, things) in (and through) Christ:

4 According as he hath [5] chosen us (gentiles, iii. 6) in him before the foundation of the world, (ch. ii., designing) that we (thus chosen) should be [6] holy and without blame before him in love, (by virtue of our faith in Christ, and love to one another, iii. 17, Gal. v. 6:)

5 Having predestinated (or foreappointed) us unto the [7] adoption of children by (through) Jesus Christ to himself (Gr. εἰς υἱοθεσίαν εἰς αὐτόν, unto the adoption of sons to him through Christ Jesus, we being all the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus, Gal. iii. 26, John i. 12), according to the good pleasure of his will,

6 (And this he hath done) To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted (or, with which he hath favoured us, ἐχαρίτωσεν ἡμᾶς) in (and through) the beloved.

7 In whom we have [8] redemption (from the curse of of the blessing of the gospel," xv. 29. And the promise of the Spirit is styled, εὐλογία τοῦ Ἀβραὰμ, "the blessing of that Abraham in whom all the families of the earth were to be blessed," in these words, "That the blessing of Abraham might come upon the gentiles through Jesus Christ, that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith," Gal. iii. 14. These gifts are also called ἐπουράνια, "heavenly things:" thus when our Saviour had discoursed of the Spirit to be received in baptism, he saith, he had told them τὰ ἐπουράνια, "heavenly things," John iii. 12, and they who were made partakers of these gifts were said to have tasted τῆς δωρεᾶς τῆς ἐπουρανίου, "of the heavenly gift," Heb. vi. 4. Or (2.) God's blessing us ἐν ἐπουρανίοις, "with heavenly things in Christ Jesus," may signify his exalting us to a blessed state of immortality in the heavens through him; his giving us "a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens" (2 Cor. v. 1, 2), and "clothing us with a house from heaven;" his giving us "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, reserved in the heavens for us;" on the account of which incorruptible and immortal bodies, we are styled ἐπουράνιοι, "heavenly," as Christ is, 1 Cor. xv. 58; and the apostle saith, that as we have borne the image of the earthly Adam by our mortal bodies, so by our bodies made immortal, "we shall bear, εἰκόνα τοῦ ἐπουρανίου, the image of the heavenly Adam," ver. 49, and hence we are said to be partakers, κλήσεως ἐπουρανίου, "of our heavenly calling." In a word, Christ, having delivered us from that death and mortality which came upon us by the sin of Adam, hath blessed us with this heavenly blessing, having "made us sit together with him in heavenly places," Eph. ii. 6. And this is the hope of our calling, ver. 18 of this chapter.

[5] Ver. 4. Ἐξελέξατο ἡμᾶς.] It was the opinion of the Jews, that God in framing the world had a particular regard for them, and that the world was made for their sakes (Esd. ii. 55. 59), and that the Messiah being created before the world, God entered into covenant with him, that he should redeem the world, and them especially. "The holy blessed God," say they, "began to covenant with the Messiah when he created him, and said unto him, The sins of those who are laid up in secret with thee, will make thee to come under an iron yoke, and make thee like to this young heifer, whose eyes are dim, and fill thy spirit with anguish; and because of their iniquity, thy tongue shall cleave to the roof of thy mouth: wilt thou undergo their condition for them? The Messiah said, I undertake it with joy, and exultation of heart, on this condition, That not one of Israel may perish; and that not only they may be saved, who live in my days; but also they who are dead from the days of the first man to this very day."* And again, "When God created the world, he held forth his hand under the throne of glory, and created the soul of the Messiah and his company, and said to him, Wilt thou heal, and redeem my sons after six thousand years? He answered, Yes. God said to him, If so, wilt thou bear chastisement to expiate their iniquities? according to what is written, Isa. liii. 4, Surely he bare our griefs. He answered, I will endure them with joy."† Now because the Jews held, that God thus elected them from the beginning of the world, and sent the Messiah that none of them should perish, the apostle, to take from them all cause of boasting against the gentiles upon that account, declares the gentiles were thus elected in Christ Jesus, even before the foundation of the world; i. e. that he designed then to choose them to be his church and people, i. e. a holy people to the Lord.

[6] That we may be sancti et immaculati, holy and unblameable.] There is a difference, saith Jerome, betwixt these two things, parvuli quippe immaculati sunt, quia integro corpore nullum fecerunt peccatum; et tamen non sancti, quia sanctitas studio et labore comparatur; "so children are unblameable, as having done no sin in the body; and yet they are not holy, because holiness proceeds from the will and the endeavour." This in other men would be styled Pelagianism.

[7] Ver. 5. Εἰς υἱοθεσίαν, To the adoption of children.] This in the scripture phrase imports adoption to a blessed resurrection, and a state of immortality both of soul and body: for being sons of God, saith Luke (xx. 36), we are "sons of the resurrection;" "and if sons," saith the apostle, "then heirs of God, joint-heirs of Christ" (Rom. viii. 16, 17). The "revelation of the sons of God" is their future glory to be revealed at Christ's appearing (ver. 18, 19, see Col. iii. 4). Their adoption is "the redemption of their bodies" from corruption (ver. 23). This being so, God's "electing us in Christ before the foundation of the world," is his purpose before the world was made, or from the fall, to give to those that should believe in Christ this adoption, i. e. the redemption of their bodies from that mortality to which the fall of Adam had subjected them (Gen. iii. 15); whence he is said to have elected us, προορίσας ἡμᾶς εἰς υἱοθεσίαν, "foreordained as to this adoption, κατὰ τὴν εὐδοκίαν, according to the good pleasure of his will," or his free grace and favour, there being nothing in us, or even in our faith, that could deserve this glorious adoption.

[8] Ver. 7. Τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν, Redemption.] All mankind lying under the sentence of condemnation on the account of sin, "all having sinned, and fallen short of the glory of God" upon that account (Rom. iii. 23), it was necessary that something should be done to take away the guilt of sin, and reconcile us to a God displeased with us for it, that so we, as to our persons and performances, might find acceptance with him: this could not be done by any righteousness of our own before faith in Christ, we "being in Christ Jesus created to good works" Eph. ii. 10), and therefore was necessary to be done by an act of grace on God's part, accepting us as righteous through faith in Christ, and justifying us freely through faith in his blood. Hence do the scriptures of the New Testament seem plainly to make our reconciliation, and so our access to God, depend on our being purged from the guilt of sin, by an atonement made by the blood of Christ for our iniquities, that so, they being pardoned, we may have peace with God, and freedom of access to him; "Christ suffered," saith Peter, ἵνα ἡμᾶς προσαγάγῃ τῷ Θεῷ, "that he might bring us to God," 1 Pet. iii. 18; i. e. to give us freedom of access to God; "for, by him we have, προσαγωγὴν, admission to the Father," Eph. ii. 18 (see the note there); and "God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses to them," 2 Cor. v. 18, 21; and this reconciliation was effected by making Christ ἁμαρτία, "a sin-offering for us, though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God (or righteous with that righteousness which God only will accept through faith) in him" (see the note on that verse). And the author to the Hebrews having said, that the covenant established in the blood of Christ was this, that he would "be merciful to our iniquities, and remember our sins no more," Heb. x. 16, 17; and having thence inferred, that having thus obtained remission for us by his blood, there was no need that he should again make himself an offering for sin, ver. 18, he adds, that therefore we may "draw near with full assurance of faith," that we should be accepted through his Beloved, as "having our hearts sprinkled by his blood," ver. 19—22, and therefore cleansed from any guilt of conscience on that account.

And this remission was also necessary, that we might obtain that adoption of sons to which believers were afore appointed, because into the new Jerusalem can "nothing enter that is defiled, or unclean:" nor can there be any enjoyment of God till "the blood of Christ hath cleansed us from all sin;" and therefore, saith the apostle, "he became the mediator of the new covenant," that having suffered death for the redemption of us from the sins we formerly had committed under the old covenant, "they that were called might receive the promise of an eternal inheritance," Heb. ix. 15.

Redemption through his blood.] Here Jerome saith, Duplicitèr sanguis Christi et caro intelligitur; vel spiritualis ista, atque divina, de quâ ipse dixit, Caro mea est verè cibus, et sanguis meus verè est potus; nisi manducaveritis carnem meam et sanguinem meum biberitis, non habebitis vitam æternam,—vel caro, et sanguis, quæ crucifixa est, et quæ militis effusa est lanceâ: where he plainly distinguishes the flesh and blood received in the sacrament, from the flesh of Christ crucified, and his blood shed upon the cross; calling the first spiritual, in opposition to his material flesh and blood.

[9] Ver. 8. Ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ καὶ φρονήσει, In all wisdom and prudence.] That is, say some, in the spiritual gifts of wisdom and prudence; but though σοφία be reckoned among spiritual gifts, I find not that φρόνησις is so. Moreover, he hath thus "abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence," saith the apostle, "by making known to us the mystery of his will;" which leads to the other exposition, that refers this to the manifold wisdom of God, shown in contriving this dispensation (iii. 10), and his prudence in executing the counsel of his will by this means, viz. by sending of his Son to be our Saviour. And whereas the deists seem to side with the Socinians, in denying the wisdom of this dispensation of God, in sending his Son into the world to suffer for our sins, and by his sufferings to make an atonement for them, it seemeth easy to demonstrate, as well the manifold wisdom, as the rich grace and favour of God to us in this dispensation. For,

First, It seemeth absolutely requisite, either that the substitution of another to suffer in our stead should be admitted, or that we ourselves should suffer the reward of our iniquities, or that a full remission and free pardon of our sins should be vouchsafed us without any suffering: now the admission of another to suffer in our stead is the thing pleaded for; if therefore that be granted, the wisdom of that God who acteth all things "according to the counsel of his will," must also be acknowledged in this dispensation: if we ourselves must suffer the reward of our iniquity, that being death eternal, or death without recovery from it by a blessed resurrection, all mankind must inevitably be subject to that punishment, "all having sinned, and fallen short of the glory of God" (Rom. iii. 33): and, thirdly, should God have issued out a free pardon, and given us a full remission of our sins, without any thing required by way of reparation for the violation of his law, he must have pardoned sinners without any thing required to show his hatred of sin, and his resolution not to let it go unpunished; and so without sufficient motive to deter us from it for the future, which seems not well consistent with his holiness and justice, and the relation of a governor, which seemeth plainly to require the vindication of his honour, and the preservation of the laws he hath established from contempt: it was then an act of grace not to require we should personally suffer the reward of our iniquities; it was an act of wisdom not to afford a full remission of our sins, without requiring any thing by way of reparation for the violation of his law; it must be therefore an act of wisdom also to admit another to suffer in our stead; especially if we consider,

Secondly, That by the obedience of our Lord Christ to the death in our stead, all the great ends of punishment designed by governors were very signally obtained, and that with more advantage to God's glory, than if the punishment of our offences had been inflicted upon us, and so God by it may be truly said to have been satisfied; seeing that justice, which consists in punishing for the transgression of a law, is truly satisfied, when all those ends for which the punishment of the offenders could be desired are obtained. Now the ends of punishment are,

1. Παράδειγμα, That they who suffer may be exemplary to others; and may, by what they do endure, deter others from the commission of the offences for which they suffer.

2. Νουθεσία, That the offender may learn wisdom by the rod; that the remembrance of what he suffered for it might prevent the repetition of his sin, and that he may be fitted to embrace the counsel of our Saviour, "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come upon thee."

3. Τιμωρία, The vindication of the prince's honour, and the preservation of the laws he hath established from contempt.

Now, First, God by this dispensation hath given us the most effectual example to deter us from sin. For, (1.) by what our Saviour suffered in our stead, we see that God is certainly in earnest when he threateneth death to sinners; that he is thoroughly resolved upon the punishment of sin, since he inflicted so great punishment on the Beloved of his soul, when he became our surety; for if on this account "God spared not his only Son" (Rom. viii. 32), we may be sure he will not spare his stubborn enemies. But let us say with the Socinians, that Christ suffered all his bitter agonies, his ignominious and painful death, not as the punishment of sin, or to make an atonement for it, but from a pure act of God's dominion; how will it follow hence, that God will surely punish sin, and with severity avenge the transgressions of his law, if he laid none of these sufferings on Christ for the punishment of sin? Seems it not strange to say that the severities laid on Christ without respect to sin, should be designed as an instance of God's severity against sin? "This shows," saith Crellius,* "that he, who laid such bitter sufferings on his innocent and well-beloved Son, will inflict the severest punishments on wicked men."

I answer, This will indeed follow in respect to sufferings for the same cause; for "if the righteous be recompensed upon earth, much more the sinner, and the wicked" (Prov. xi. 31). If good Eli and holy David suffered so great punishments for their sins, much more shall a wicked Cain, and a profane Esau. But will it follow, that because holy Job suffered so much by way of trial, or St. Paul for propagation of the Christian faith, that therefore sinners shall be obnoxious to greater punishment? Crellius† himself saith, Christ's sufferings cannot be an exemplary punishment, because, abundè fuerint à Deo compensatæ, "they were so abundantly rewarded by God;" and doth not the same reason show that they could not be a warning to us, if he only suffered "with respect to the recompense of reward?" For are the light afflictions which Christians suffer here in prospect of an eternal recompense, ever made an instance of God's severity against sin? Moreover, this example shows how insupportable the punishment will be, which justice will inflict upon the sinner; for if the apprehension of it produced such agonies and consternations in the soul of Christ, that God saw need to send an angel to support him (Luke xxii. 43), how must the sinner sink under the burden when it is laid upon his shoulders? If he, who was the well-beloved Son of God, found it so dreadful to lie under the burden for some hours, to lie exposed for ever to it must be far more intolerable.

Secondly, Whereas inevitable ruin must have followed upon the execution of the deserved punishment on the offending person, God by this method hath taken a fit way for reformation of the sinner, which was the second end of purposed in himself, (viz. his secret purpose to choose us gentiles to be fellow-heirs of the same body, iii. 6:)

10 That (so) in the dispensation (which was to be accomplished by sending of Christ) of the fulness of times he might [10] gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him:

11 In whom also we (believing Jews) have [11] obtained an inheritance (or, are become his portion), being predestinated (or foreordained to it) according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will:

12 That we should be to the praise of his glory, [12] who first trusted in Christ (the glorious gifts he hath punishment; for what can be a more effectual motive to abstain from sin than this example, which represents the greatness of the provocation in the greatness of the punishment, and shows it is impossible the guilty person should avoid the stroke of God's vindictive justice, or bear the weight of his almighty arm. But the Socinian tenet, which denies that God was angry with us on the account of sin, or that he did require any punishment or satisfaction, in order to the pardon of it, so far obstructs this reformation, as it affords the sinner hopes that he may not hereafter be angry with him on that account, or require any punishment or satisfaction in order to the pardon of his future sins.

Thirdly, God by this dispensation hath sufficiently consulted the preservation of his honour, and secured the reverence and observation of his laws; which was the third great end of punishment: he, by declaring that he would not pardon our offences, without a satisfaction made for the violations of his law, hath fully vindicated his institutions from contempt, seeing, by this example, he hath let all men know, that though he be a God of mercy and long-suffering, he will by no means "clear the guilty," or let the transgressor of them go unpunished.

Again, God by this dispensation hath vindicated his honour more than if he had destroyed the sinner, having more evidently showed his hatred of, and great displeasure against, sin, by punishing it so severely in his own Son; for the greater is the inducement to remit the punishment of sin, the greater must be his hatred of it who inflicts it. That therefore this consideration, that he who suffered was his only beloved Son, would not induce him to remit the punishment, must be the strongest demonstration of his most perfect hatred of all iniquity.

But now remove this supposition, and say, with the Socinians, That God pardoned all men's sins against him without any valuable consideration, and with an absolute freedom forgave men all the punishments his law had threatened to them; and ceased from all his anger and displeasure against sinners, without any atonement made unto, or required by, him; and how will it appear God was at all concerned to vindicate the honour of his laws, or show his hatred against sin? Hence Crellius* saw it necessary to own, that "the sufferings of Christ are a demonstration of God's hatred of iniquity, because our sins were the cause of them;" but he means not that they were the meritorious, but only that they were the final cause of his sufferings; not that he suffered to prevail with God to pardon sinners, but only to prevail with sinners to break off their sins. Now hence, indeed, we may conclude that God is very desirous that sinners should desist from sin; but it follows not hence, that they must certainly expect the most heavy punishments if they do not: for if God could freely pardon the sins of the whole world, without any satisfaction made to his offended justice; if there be nothing in God, as rector of the universe, that requires he should punish sin, or show his displeasure against it; if the punishment of sin depends purely upon his arbitrary will, why may not sinners hope, notwithstanding all that Christ hath suffered for their good, for a like act of his free grace hereafter, in the remission of their sins, without a reformation; and that God may be reconciled to them again, whilst they continue in their sins?

Since then no laws require the punishment of the offender himself, rather than of another who is willing to be his surety, and suffer for him, on any other account than this; that the punishment of the offender, and not another for him, will only answer the forementioned ends of punishment; when that can equally be done by what another suffers, the law given must equally be satisfied, because the ends of the law are equally obtained.

* Hinc enim manifestissimè apparet summum Dei adversùs peccatum odium, si quidem Deus, ut ab illis nos penitùs abstraheret, unigenito filio suo non pepercit. Ibid.

Ver. 9.] From this ninth verse it appears, that the election and foreappointment, mentioned ver. 4, 5, is as large as is his manifestation of his will to the gentiles: for as προώρισεν, "he foreappointed them to sonship by Jesus Christ," ver. 5, so here, προέθετο, "he purposed before to make known his will unto them; ἐν αὐτῷ, in him," according to the same "pleasure of his will." Note also, that the words being not ἐν ἑαυτῷ, but ἐν αὐτῷ, should not have been rendered "in himself," that is, in God the Father, but "in him," that is, in Christ (ver. 4), as the following preceding verses show.

[10] Ver. 10. Ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι, To gather together in one.] i. e. God hath now by the gospel accomplished the secret purpose of his will; to "make the gentiles fellow-heirs of the same body" and privileges with the Jews; having reconciled both Jew and gentile to him in one body on the cross (Eph. ii. 14. 16), and so "gathered together in one all things on earth;" and by procuring for us that adoption, which is the redemption of the body from mortality (Rom. viii. 23), and making us like to the angels, by being "children of the resurrection," he hath "summed up in one all things in heaven;" for they being styled the sons of God, Job i. 6, ii. 1, xxxviii. 7; because they live already in their Father's house, and are an image of his immortality; when the resurrection hath put us into that happy state, that we "can die no more, but are equal to the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection" (Luke xx. 35, 36), then shall we be made one with them. The interpretation of the ancient fathers seems to give this sense, That God hath by this dispensation gathered under one head, viz. Christ, the head of the church, "all things on earth," i. e. Jews and gentiles; and "all things in heaven," Christ being the "head over all angels and principalities;" they being all ministering spirits to him. And this sense seems agreeable to the like words, Col. i. 20 (see the note there).

[11] Ver. 11. Ἐκληρώθημεν, We have obtained an inheritance.] The Jews were before chosen of God, to be a people of inheritance, Deut. iv. 20, and "a peculiar people," Exod. xix. 5; and as such, God provided for them a habitation and inheritance in the land of Canaan; but the Jewish church being now to be dissolved, the Jews being to be banished from their own land, and the unbelieving Jews cut off from their relation to God as his people; the believing Jews were through faith in Christ to be chosen again, to be God's portion, and inheritance, and his peculiar people (1 Pet. ii. 9, Tit. ii. 14), and to be admitted to a better inheritance, εἰς τὴν μερίδα τοῦ κλήρου τῶν ἁγίων ἐν τῷ φωτὶ, viz. "to the portion of the inheritance of saints in light" (Col. i. 12). And to this, saith the apostle, they believing were appointed, God having foreordained that this inheritance should be the portion of believers, and the consequent of faith in Christ; by virtue of which we become the sons of God.

Ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐκληρώθημεν.] Note also, that here the Alexandrian copy and the Syriac read ἐκλήθημεν, "we are called," and the note of Jerome here is this: Vult Deus quæcunque sunt rationis plena et consilii, vult 'salvari omnes, et in agnitionem veritatis venire;' sed quia nullus, absque propriâ voluntate servatur, liberi enim arbitrii sumus, vult nos bonum velle, et cùm voluerimus, vult in nobis ipse suum implere consilium.

[12] Ver. 12. Τοὺς προηλπικότας, Who before trusted in Christ.] I see no reason why us and we, in the first ten verses, may not signify believers in the general, and then us and we, ver. 11, may signify the believing Jews, who literally were προηλπικότας, believers in Christ before the gentiles; nor could any thing tend more to the establishment of the freedom of the believing gentiles from Judaical ob bestowed upon us, and the eminent graces he hath wrought in us, tending highly to the glory of his grace, ver. 6, Phil. i. 11).

13 In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard (or, hearing) the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed (or, believing), ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, (i. e. the Spirit promised to the sons of God; for because ye are sons, God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, Gal. iv. 6,)

14 Which is the earnest of our inheritance until [13] the redemption of the purchased possession (for the procuring this salutary redemption), unto the praise of his glory.

15 Wherefore I also, [14] after I heard (Gr. having heard) of your (steadfast) faith in the Lord Jesus, and (your increasing) love unto all the saints (i. e. that the faith and love wrought in you continue steadfast, and abound),

16 Cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers;

17 (Praying) That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you (in greater measure) [15] the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge (or to the farther acknowledgment) of him:

18 The eyes of your understanding being enlightened (or, that he would give you understandings enlightened); that ye may know what (i. e. how glorious) is the hope of his calling (i. e. to which he hath called you), and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints (i. e. how great is the inheritance he hath designed for the saints),

19 And what is [16] the exceeding greatness of his power (which he will exert) to us-ward who believe servances than this consideration, that the Jews themselves could only obtain the benefits of Christianity, by being chosen anew to be God's people through faith in Christ.

[13] Ver. 14. Εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῆς περιποιήσεως, Till the redemption of life.] There is a twofold ἀπολύτρωσις, "redemption," mentioned here, and in other places of the New Testament. The first consists in the remission of sin, or our redemption from the guilt of it; and of this we have mention, ver. 7, Rom. iii. 24, Col. i. 14. The second in the redemption of the body from corruption, that it may be partaker of eternal life: and of this the apostle speaks, Rom. viii. 23, calling it "the adoption," and ἀπολύτρωσιν τοῦ σώματος, "the redemption of the body," or "the glorious deliverance of the sons of God from the bondage of corruption," ver. 21. Thus 1 Cor. i. 30, "Christ is made to us justification, καὶ ἀπολύτρωσις, and redemption:" where redemption being distinguished from, and following justification and sanctification, it must import the redemption of the body from corruption. And Eph. iv. 30, where we are said to be "sealed by the Spirit, εἰς ἡμέραν ἀπολυτρώσεως, to the day of redemption:" the first delivers us from the guilt which condemns us to death; the second confirms the promise of eternal life on them who are thus delivered. Heb. ix. 15, περιποιεῖν, is to save alive, and περιποίησις is preservation, περιποίησις ψυχῆς, "the salvation of the soul," Heb. x. 39. So Gen. xii. 12, "They will kill me, σὲ δὲ περιποιήσονται, but they will save thee alive;" Numb. xxii. 23, "I had killed thee, ἐκεῖνον δὲ περιεποιησάμην, but him I have saved alive:" Josh. vi. 17, "As for Rahab, περιποιήσασθε αὐτὴν, ye shall save her alive." "Go slay Amalek, οὐ περιποίησασθε ἐξ αὐτοῦ, ye shall save none of them alive," 1 Sam. xv. 3; "but Saul, περιεποιησάτο, saved Agag alive," ver. 9. 15; 2 Chron. xiv. 13; "The Ethiopians were overthrown, ὥστε μὴ εἶναι ἐν αὐτοῖς περιποίησιν, so that none of them were left alive." So Phavorinus, περιποιησάντες ἀντὶ τοῦ διασώσαντες. See also Ps. lxxix. 11, Exod. i. 16. Whence it appears that ἀπολύτρωσις τῆς περιποιήσεως, is fitly rendered "the redemption of life;" or, the redemption of those who are to be preserved from death.

Ὅς ἐστιν ἀρραβών, &c. Who is the earnest of our inheritance.] It was the custom, both of the Jews and heathens, to confirm a promise or a bargain, by giving something as an earnest of, or an obligation to perform it. This the Latins styled arra, the Greeks ἀρραβῶν, καὶ ἐνέχυρον (see Plaut. Mostell. act. iii. sc. 1, Miles Glorios. act. iv. sc. 1); the Jews eraban: so when Judah had promised Tamar a kid, he gives her ἀρραβῶνα, "an earnest," that he would perform his promise, Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18. And in like manner God having promised to his faithful servants an eternal inheritance, gives them his Holy Spirit as "the earnest" of it.

[14] Ver. 15. Ἀκούσας, Having heard.] Hence some infer, that Paul could not write this to the church of Ephesus, where he abode about three years (Acts xx. 31), and had converted many to the faith throughout most parts of Asia (Acts xix. 26): he therefore could not need to hear of their faith.

To this it is answered by the Rev. Dr. Hammond, that the word ἀκούειν, as the Hebrew שמע not only signifies to hear, but to understand and know; and therefore should be rendered here, Cùm sciverim, "knowing," or "Having known your faith." And indeed the word bears this sense undoubtedly in those words, 1 Cor. xiv. 2, "He that speaketh in an unknown tongue, speaketh not to man, οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἀκούει, for no man understands him:" so Gen. xi. 7, "Let us confound their language, ἵνα μὴ ἀκούσωσιν, that they may not understand one another's speech:" and xlii. 23, "They knew not, ὅτι ἀκούει, that Joseph understood them, for he spake to them by an interpreter" (see Deut. xxviii. 29, 2 Kings xviii. 29, Jer. v. 15, Ezek. iii. 6). But,

Secondly, I answer, that this epistle was writ, not only to the metropolis of Ephesus, but to "the faithful in Christ Jesus" in the general, and more especially to those of the Lesser Asia; among whom many might have been converted by Apollos and others, and Paul might have only heard of it; he preaching only at Ephesus, and they of Asia hearing the gospel only by their resort unto him there (see the note on Acts xix. 10). Yea, he insinuates that this epistle was read at Laodicea; and gives order for the reading of it at Colosse, Col. iv. 16 (see the note there); at both which places he had never been (Col. ii. 1). And,

Thirdly, From the epistle of Paul to Timothy it appears, that a dangerous and almost epidemical apostasy from the purity of the Christian faith happened among the Jewish churches in Asia; which verified Paul's prediction concerning them, that "after his departure," not only "grievous wolves should enter in among them," but that "among themselves should arise men speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them," Acts xx. 29, 30; and made it proper for him, after eight years' absence, to give thanks to God for the steadfastness in the faith, which he had heard of in the rest (see 1 Thess. iii. 6).

[15] Ver. 17. Πνεῦμα σοφίας, The Spirit of wisdom]. Paul having asserted the necessity of the revelation of the Spirit, "that we may know the things that are freely given us of God," they being not naturally to be perceived (1 Cor. vi. 2. 12), doth therefore pray, that the Spirit of wisdom, knowledge, and revelation, may be imparted to Christians for that end.

[16] Ver. 19. Τὸ ὑπερβάλλον μέγεθος τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ, The exceeding greatness of his power.] Some interpret these two verses of the power of God, working faith in believers, making it equal to that which effected the resurrection of our Lord, and thence concluding, that we are merely passive in the whole work of our conversion: but as this power is not consistent with persuasion and a rational choice, and, if it were exerted, would not render it praiseworthy in us to turn to God; nor could it truly and properly be said that we turned, but only that we were turned to God; so is not this exposition agreeable to the words: for the apostle speaks not of the power exercised on us, to render us believers; but of the power which shall be exercised on us, who believe already; not of the power exercised upon our souls, to raise them from a death in sin; but of the power to be exercised upon our bodies, to give them a glorious resurrection to eternal life.

Καὶ τί τὸ ὑπερβάλλον μέγεθος, And what is the exceeding greatness of his power towards us.] The apostle doth not here pray, as Mr. L. suggests in his paraphrase, that the

(by raising us up to the enjoyment of this inheritance), according to the working of his mighty power,

20 Which (power) he (hath already) wrought in Christ (our head), when he raised (Gr. raising) him from the dead, and set him (whom he hath set) at his own right hand in the heavenly places,

21 Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, [17] not only in this world, but also in that which is to come:

22 And (he) hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to (the benefit of) the church,

23 Which is his body, (and so) the fulness of him (even that Jesus) that filleth [18] all in all.

Ephesians might have the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, that they might know the exceeding greatness of that power God "had employed already in bringing them to the faith;" for that they knew already; it being the mighty power of those miracles they had seen done before their eyes, which induced the gentiles to believe (Rom. xv. 18, 19), but he prays, that by these means they might know, what at present they had no experience of, viz. how glorious was the object of their hope, how great their future inheritance, and how excellent was the power God would show in raising them up from the dead, as he had done Christ, to the enjoyment of it.

[17] Ver. 21. Οὐ μόνον ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ, Not only in this world.] By comparing these words with Col. ii. 10, where Christ is said to be "the head of all principality" and power; and with Phil. ii. 9, where God is said to have "given him a name above every name," I am inclined to think these words only signify, that our Lord Christ is exalted above all power that is, or ever shall be; for, not to be done "in this world, nor in the world to come," Matt. xii. 32, is never to be done, Luke xii. 32 (see note on Matt. xii. 32). Note also, that the word ὄνομα, name, doth also signify persons: (see the note on Acts i. 15): and that men of great power and dignity are styled, both in scripture and in other writings, אנשי השם, οἱ ἄνδρες οἱ ὀνομαστοί, men of name," that is, renown; so are the giants styled, Gen. vi. 4, and "the princes of the congregation," Numb. xvi. 2; so that to be "exalted above every name that is named," is to be advanced, even in his human nature, above men and angels of the highest power and dignity, by being exalted to the right hand of the Father (Heb. i. 4, 5). After the dignity of Christ was contested by the Arians, the fathers, to avoid their argument from these words, chose rather to interpret this of the name of the Son, mentioned by Paul, Heb. i. 5, "To which of the angels said he, Thou art my Son?" So Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, on this place, and Epiphanius, Hær. lxix. p. 325, though the words, ver. 20, "He hath raised him from the dead, and set him on his right hand in heavenly places," strongly plead for the first interpretation (see the note on Heb. i. 4).

[18] Πάντα ἐν πᾶσι, All in all.] For he ascended up on high, that he might fill the members of his church with all gifts necessary for the edification of his saints, till they came "to the fullness of the measure of the stature of Christ" (iv. 10—12); "In him all fullness dwells, and we are πεπληρωμένοι, filled full in him, who is the head of the principalities and powers" (Col. ii. 9, 10).

CHAPTER II.

1 And you (also) hath he (raised and) quickened (with and by Christ, i. 20, ii. 5), who were [1] dead in trespasses and sins;

2 Wherein (in which sins) in time past ye walked (living) [2] according to the course (and fashion) of this (evil) world, [3] according to (the suggestions of) the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that (even) now worketh in the children of disobedience (the heathen world):

3 Among whom also we all (who are gentiles) had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind (or of our hearts); and were by [4] nature (indeed by birth among heathens, and in our natural estate before

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Νεκροὺς ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις, Dead in sins.] They who interpret the phrase thus, "You who are dead to sins by baptism," seem not to have looked to the fifth verse, where they who are here said to be "dead in trespasses and sins" are said to be "quickened;" or to the parallel place, Col. ii. 13, where it is said, "You who were dead in sins, and the uncircumcision of the flesh, he hath quickened;" nor indeed to the phrase, which is never used in the plural number in that sense, but only in the singular, viz. Rom. vi. 2, x. 11.

Καὶ, And.] That this glorious hope, this blessed inheritance, this happy resurrection, will be your portion, you may learn from what God hath already done for you; "for he hath quickened you who were dead in trespasses and sins," ver. 1, and so hath brought you into a state of salvation, ver. 5, "and made you meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light," Col. i. 12. He also hath raised up your head, and placed him, and in him your nature in heavenly places, and so hath, in a manner, "raised you up, and made you sit together with him there," ver. 6, you being hence assured that all his living members shall be raised up to live for ever with him: for "if we believe that Christ is risen, we must believe that them who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him, to be for ever with the Lord," 1 Thess. iv. 14. 17. "And to him that overcometh," saith Christ, "will I give to sit down with me on my throne, even as I also have overcome, and am set down with my Father on his throne," Rev. iii. 21.

[2] Ver. 2. Κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα, According to the course of this world.] That is, according to the life which men of this world, destitute of faith in Christ, do live: for, as Phavorinus saith, αἰών, "the word age is ἡ ζωὴ, καὶ ὁ βίος, the life of man, or τὸ μέτρον τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης ζωῆς, the measure of human life." Thus, τὸν αἰῶνα διάγειν, in Isocrates and Xenophon, is to pass the time of life; τελευτῆσαι τὸν αἰῶνα, in Herodotus, and Sophocles, is to end this life, or to die.

[3] Κατὰ τὸν ἄρχοντα τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ ἀέρος, According to the prince of the power of the air.] It was the opinion both of Jews and heathens, εἶναι τὸν ἀέρα ψυχῶν ἔμπλεον, "that the air was full of spirits," called "demons," as Diogenes* saith in the life of Pythagoras: and the Jews in the Pirke Avoth teach, à terrâ usque ad firmamentum omnia esse plena turmis et præfectis, that "from the earth to the firmament all things were full of these companies and rulers;" and that there was a prince over them, who was called ὁ κοσμοκράτωρ, "the governor of the world," that is, of the darkness of it, see note on vi. 12. This evil spirit is here said, ἐνεργεῖν, "inwardly to work in the children of disobedience;" and elsewhere, to "lead them captive at his will," 2 Tim. ii. 26; and their conversion is styled a recovery of them "from the power of Satan," Acts xxvi. 18. And hence we may rationally conclude, that the good Spirit doth also inwardly work in pious persons, enabling them to will and to do; it being unreasonable to conceive the evil spirit should have more power over those wicked men in whom he dwells, than the good Spirit hath in those pious persons in whose hearts he is said to dwell.

[4] Ver. 3. Καὶ ἦμεν τέκνα φύσει ὀργῆς, And were by nature children of wrath.] The ancient fathers generally affirm, that sin cannot owe its original purely to that nature in which we were born, but only τῷ αὐτεξουσίῳ, i. e. to the choice or consent of the will; and that they who make us to be sinners, merely by the derivation of our natures from our progenitors, do make God, the author of our nature, to be the author of our sin. The same they seem to do, who say that sin is propagated by generation, and that an infant is therefore properly by birth a sinner, it being God who hath established that order in the generation of mankind, which neither he that begets, nor he that is begotten, can correct, and by whose benediction mankind increase and multiply: and reason will instruct us, that to be born or not is not in our power, and that what is not in our power to avoid can never be our crime, nor render us obnoxious to the eternal wrath of God.

5 Even when we were (thus) dead in sins, [5] hath quickened us together with Christ, (through his rich grace; for) (by grace ye are saved) (i. e. are brought into a state of salvation);

6 And hath raised us up together, (not only by a spiritual conformity to his resurrection, Rom. vi. 5. 11, but also by an assurance of a like resurrection, 1 Pet. i. 3; he being risen as the first-fruits, 1 Cor. xv. 20, and the first-born from the dead, Col. i. 18,) and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus: (our head thus raised and exalted, and thus ascended into heaven, as our forerunner, Heb. vi. 20, x. 13, 14:)

Moreover, the circumstances of the text demonstrate, that the apostle here intendeth no such thing, because he speaks of persons "dead in (actual) trespasses and sins, in which in times past they had walked, according to the course of the (heathen) world," and the suggestions of Satan; of men "who had their conversation in times past in the flesh; fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and were (on that account) the children of wrath as well as other heathens." And therefore Suidas, agreeably to the context, saith, that "nature is here put for customary practice," according to the frequent import of that word in the profane authors; in Philo,* in whom custom is ἐχθρὰ φύσει ἀληθείας, "a nature opposite to truth;" and in our common proverb, that "custom is a second nature." His words are these;† "When the apostle saith, We are by nature the children of wrath, he saith not this according to the proper acceptation of the word nature, for then he had cast the blame on the Author of nature; but he understands by it a long and evil custom." And Didymus Alexandrinus saith,‡ the apostle intends by it τὸ προκείμενον τῇ φύσει, οὐ τὸ κατὰ φύσιν, "not that which is according to nature, but that which is accessory to it."

2. The fathers do more generally say, That to be by nature the children of wrath, is here the same as to be "truly and indeed so;"§ and that the Ephesians and other nations are styled such here, because in that estate they continually provoked God to wrath by their idolatries and fleshly lusts; and so they are here styled, say they, "children of wrath," partly as being born in heathenism, and therefore indole idolatræ,‖ and so out of covenant with God (in which estate the whole body of the heathens are represented, as having no hope of the blessings promised to those who were in covenant with God), and "without (the favour and protection of) God in the world:" and persons so abandoned by him are in scripture styled the objects of his hatred, comparatively to those who are in covenant with him, as in these words, "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated," Mal. i. 2. And when God determined to reject and to forsake his people, he styles them "the generation of his wrath," Jer. vii. 29, as being worthy of his wrath, as wicked persons are styled "sons of death and of perdition," as having done those things which rendered them worthy of death and destruction, i. e. not for original sin, but for a long series of actual and habitual transgressions. So Abiathar is, ἀνὴρ θανάτου, "a man of death," 1 Kings ii. 26. And whereas Esthius saith, that τέκνα, "children," shows that this phrase relates to what they were from their nativity; this may be easily confuted from these following expressions, some of them frequent in the holy scripture, viz. τέκνα Θεοῦ, "the children of God:" John i. 12, τέκνα σοφίας, "the children of wisdom," Matt. x. 19, τέκνα ὑπακοῆς, "children of obedience," 1 Pet. i. 14, τέκνα τῆς ἐπαγγελίας, "children of the promise," opposed to children of the flesh, Rom. ix. 1, Gal. iv. 28, κατάρας τέκνα. "accursed children," 2 Pet. ii. 14; for we are not sons of God, of wisdom, of obedience, of the promise, or curse, by nativity; but by our own good or evil actions. And whereas he adds, that the apostle writes this in the person of the Jews, this is most plainly false, the Jews being not under "the prince of the power of the air," i. e. the conduct and government of Satan, as were those heathens, whose gods were demons, and who "sacrificed to devils, and not to God." Moreover, they who are here said to be quickened, when they were "dead in trespasses," are said, Col. ii. 13, to be quickened when "dead in trespasses, and the uncircumcision of the flesh," which cannot possibly agree to the Jews. "We all" here therefore is only all the gentiles, whatsoever Mr. Clerc says to the contrary; nor is there any thing more common than for Paul to speak thus. So Tit. iii. 3, "We ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived; serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another;" not we apostles, or we Jews, but we gentiles. And this is here evident to demonstration; for what is here we, ver. 2 and 5, is ye, ver. 8; what is we, ver. 10, is again ye, ver. 11, 12, 13; what is we, ver. 18, is ye, ver. 19.

Καὶ ἦμεν τέκνα φύσει ὀργῆς, And were by nature children of wrath.] We were children of wrath, saith Jerome, vel propter corpus humilitatis, corpusque mortis, "by reason of the vile mortal body to which our souls were condemned," which was the opinion of Origen; or, quòd ab adolescentiâ mens hominum apposita sit ad malitiam, "because the mind of man is prone to iniquity from his youth; vel quòd ex eo tempore quo possumus habere notitiam Dei et ad pubertatem venimus omnes aut operâ, aut linguâ, aut cogitatione peccamus; or, because, when we come to ripeness of years, and attain to the knowledge of God, we offend all in thought, word, and deed:" where it is observable, that though he brings in Origen's peculiar opinion, as one reason of this appellation; yet hath he not the least hint of our being "the children of wrath," on the account of Adam's sin. See my interpretation confirmed by Mr. Thorndike, &c.

[5] Ver. 5. Συνεζωοποίησε τῷ Χριστῷ, Hath quickened us together with Christ.] Not only by giving us a new birth, or renovation of life, but an assurance also of eternal life; for "because I live," saith Christ, "you shall live also" (John xiv. 19), "We shall be saved by his life" (Rom. v. 10).

[6] Ver. 8. Τῇ γὰρ χάριτί ἐστε σεσωσμένοι, For by grace ye are saved.] That we may understand aright how we are here, and in other places, said to be saved by grace and mercy, and not by works, it may deserve to be observed,

First, That though the apostle here saith, "By grace ye are saved, not of works;" yet, lest any man should hence be tempted to infer, that Christians may be saved without doing works of righteousness, when they have time and opportunity to do them, he expressly adds, and that by way of reason of what he had asserted, that "we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to good works, which God hath or-

12 (And) That at that time ye were without (the knowledge of) Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel (to whom the Messiah primarily be- dained that we should walk in them." Since then to "walk in righteousness," according to the import of that phrase in scripture, implies, that the tenor of our lives be spent in works of righteousness; surely we cannot reasonably hope to be accepted by God, if we neglect the very end for which we are created in Christ Jesus, or decline that way in which God hath ordained us to walk. Hence the apostle tells the same Ephesians, that if they had been taught the Christian faith, "as the truth was in Jesus," they knew themselves obliged to "put off the old man, and to put on the new, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness;" and that it was their duty to "walk as children of light, proving what is acceptable to the Lord," and bringing forth those fruits of the Spirit, which "are in all goodness, righteousness, and truth," iv. 21, 22, v. 8, 9.

Note, Secondly, That when the apostle saith, "We are saved not by works," his meaning is not to exclude all works from having any influence on our salvation; but only to exclude those works, which are done antecedently to faith, and to the renovation of the Holy Ghost, or antecedently to their being called by the gospel to salvation: this is apparent from the reason here assigned, why we are not saved by works, viz. because we were not fitted or prepared to do good works till we were first in Christ; which, as it doth exclude good works performed before faith in Christ, so doth it as effectually establish those which are afterward to be performed by virtue of the new nature given to us, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost.

Obj. And whereas some object against this answer, that the apostle saith, "We are saved by grace, not of works, lest any man should boast," which boasting doth not seem to be excluded, if our salvation doth any way depend on works done by us, whether they be legal or evangelical, done before or after faith:

Ans. To this I answer, That though salvation doth depend upon good works, or on sincere obedience to be performed by us after faith; yet is all boasting utterly excluded; (1.) Because the good works we do proceed not from ourselves, but purely from the grace and Spirit of God, for "it is God that worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure." As therefore the apostle saith, of the gift of tongues, and healing, and the like, which were so frequent in the church of Corinth, and were occasions of their boasting, "Who maketh thee to differ in these things from others? or what gift hast thou which thou hast not received? and if thou hast received it, wherefore dost thou boast, as if it were thine own, and thou hadst not received it?" 1 Cor iv. 7, so may we here: What good work dost thou, which thou hast not received grace and the good Spirit to perform? And if thou hast received strength from God, for the performance of them, wherefore dost thou boast? This being the apostle's rule, that we can boast of nothing but of that which we have not received, or which is purely from ourselves.

(2.) Though God is pleased to make the doing good works a necessary condition of salvation, so that without them we shall not obtain it; yet is all boasting utterly excluded, because it is of grace, that our imperfect works are counted good, and that they are at all rewarded by God. For it is alone through that new covenant which God hath established in Christ Jesus, that all the imperfections which adhere to our best performances are pardoned; seeing the covenant of works requires perfect obedience, and tendereth no pardon to the least offence. Now upon what account can any of us boast of doing that which in itself deserves condemnation, though through grace it finds acceptance? Boasting, saith the apostle, is not excluded by the law of works (Rom. iii. 27, iv. 4), because "to him that worketh, the reward is not reckoned of grace, but of debt" (Rom. xi. 6), grace and works that deserve justification and salvation, being perfectly opposite to one another. Where therefore the reward is still of grace, and not of debt; where it is given on the account of works imperfect, which deserve nothing from God, there boasting is excluded. Note, Thirdly, That when the apostle saith, "We are saved by grace," there the word "saved" doth not signify the final and complete salvation which we shall enjoy in heaven; but only our being placed in the way of salvation, and put into that estate, in which "if we continue grounded and settled in the faith, and be not moved from the hope of the gospel" (Col. i. 23), we shall undoubtedly be saved. That this may be the sense of these expressions, "We are saved by grace," and "According to his mercy he saved us" (Tit. iii. 5), cannot be doubted, if we consider that this is frequently the import of this phrase in other places; as when it is said at the conversion of Zaccheus, "This day is salvation come to this house," Luke xix. 3, that "baptism doth save us," 1 Pet. iii. 21, that "there were added to the church οἱ σωζόμενοι, the saved," Acts ii. 47 (see John iv. 22, Rom. viii. 24, 1 Cor. i. 18). That this must be the proper import of it in these places, is evident from this consideration, that the persons to whom the apostle here speaks were not actually and completely saved, but only by embracing the gospel, which is styled "the word," "the gospel of salvation," "the power of God through faith to salvation," were placed in that way which leadeth to eternal life, and which is called the way of salvation. It being therefore of God's free grace and mercy that any church or nation is called to the knowledge of salvation, and hath the word of life revealed to them, it being by that faith which is the gift of God that they are justified, and so placed in the way of salvation, and by his free gift that they enjoy the Holy Spirit, by which they are enabled to work out their salvation; they may well be said to be saved by grace, through faith, according to those words of the same apostle (2 Tim. i. 9), "He hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ." But then this hinders not our complete salvation at the great day, from being conferred upon us, with respect to our works, by him who hath declared, "He will render to every one according to his works: glory, honour, and immortality, to every one that worketh good, and that by patient continuance in well-doing seeketh for it" (Rom. ii. 6, 7).

[7] Ver. 10. Προητοίμασεν, He hath before prepared us.] i. e. Before we do them, by giving us the knowledge of his will, and the assistance of his Spirit to perform them: i. e. our entire renovation or new creation, by which alone we are enabled to do works good and acceptable in his sight, is from God, who by Christ Jesus hath given us the knowledge of our duty, and by his grace and Spirit hath enabled us for the performance of it. They mislead men who extend this to our whole salvation, from the beginning to the end, which though it be so of grace, as to be carried on from the beginning of the new nature to the end of our life, by the assistance of God's grace and Holy Spirit; yet is not so of grace as to exclude those works of righteousness God hath prepared us to walk in, they being the conditions requisite to make faith saving, the terms on which alone we are to enter into life (Matt. vii. 21, Luke x. 25. 28, Rom. ii. 6, 7. 10, 2 Pet. i. 5. 11, Rev. xxii. 14), and according to which we shall receive our future recompense (Rom. ii. 6, 1 Cor. iii. 8, 2 Cor. v. 10, Gal. vi. 4, 5).

[8] Ver. 12. Ἐλπίδα μὴ ἔχοντες, Having no hope] After this life (1 Thess. iv. 13); "I would not have you sorrowful for them that sleep, as οἱ λοιποὶ, the residue of the world, who have no hope" (see note on 2 Tim. i. 10).

[9] Ἄθεοι, Without the true God.] For then not knowing God, they served τοῖς μὴ φύσει οὖσι θεοῖς, "those which by nature were not gods" (Gal. iv. 8); even their wise men "changed the truth of God into a lie," and worshipped the vulgar deities (Rom. i. 25); they were heathens, "carried about to dumb idols" (1 Cor. xii. 2). Hence at their conversion they are said to "turn from idols to serve the living and true God" (1 Thess. i. 9). In this sense the Christians styled the heathen ἄθεοι "atheists," because τὸν μὲν ὄντως ὄντα Θεὸν ἠγνοήκασι, "they knew not the true God." So Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 14, and Theodoret here. And the heathens styled the Christians so, because they denied those to be gods whom they esteemed truly such; so Just. Mart. Apol. ii. p. 56, Athenag. p. 6. And the stoics reckoned two kinds of atheists; one that "contemned the gods, τόν τε ἐναντίως Θείῳ λεγόμενον, the other that "spake things contrary to the Deity," Laert. lib. vii. §. 119.

[10] Ver. 13. Ἐγγὺς, Nigh.] Those Jews who had no ceremonial defilement to be purged away, and who had made an atonement for their known sins, were admitted to come near to God, as being holy; they had a freedom of access to God in his tabernacle and temple, whence they are styled, ὁ λαὸς ἐγγίζων αὐτῷ, "the people that draw near to God," Lev. x. 3, Ps. lxv. 4, cxlviii. 14, and God is said to be, ὁ Θεὸς ἐγγίζων αὐτοῖς, "a God near to them," Deut. vii. 4, both by relation, as having owned them as his children and family, and entered into covenant to be their God, and by his more especial presence with them; for the Shechinah, or the glorious presence, dwelt among them in the holy place. Now all these privileges, saith the apostle, are equally conferred upon the gentiles, they are now made near to God, ver. 13, have "access to him," ver. 18, are "fellow-citizens of the saints, and of the family of God," ver. 19, the Shechinah dwells in them as in a temple, and they "are made a habitation of God through the Spirit," ver. 21, 22.

[11] Ver. 14. Τὸ μεσότοιχον, The middle wall.] This refers to that partition-wall in the temple which separated the court of the gentiles from that into which the Jews entered, on which was written, "That no alien might go into it;" it being, saith Josephus,* a sanction of Antiochus, μὴ δεῖν ἀλλόφυλον ἐντὸς τοῦ ἁγίου προσιέναι, "that no alien should enter into the court of the sanctuary, which was enclosed with the sept:" and this inscription was writ in Greek and Latin.

[12] Ver. 15. Εἰς ἕνα καινὸν ἄνθρωπον, Into one new man.] As being both to walk in newness of life, and by the new law of Christianity, and by Christ's new commandments of love.

[13] Εἰρήνην, Peace.] This peace Christ hath made between Jew and gentile, by abolishing the ceremonial law, which made the enmity; and with God, by reconciling both to him by his death.

* Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3, De Bello Jud. lib. v. cap. 14.

[14] Ver. 16. Ἐν αὐτῷ.] i. e. Ἐν τῷ σταυρῷ, "By the cross." So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, read. Other copies read, ἐν ἑαυτῷ, "in himself:" but this reading, saith Jerome, is only of the Latin copies, and it seems to have had its rise from the former verse (see Examen Millii).

[15] Ver. 18. Οἱ ἀμφότεροι, We both.] Hence we learn (1.) that Christ not only reconciled Jew and gentile to one another, but that he reconciled both to God, "for by him we have, προσαγωγὴν, access to the Father," a freedom of access to God, ver. 28, and iii. 12. Now where this phrase in the New Testament is used with respect to Christ, it still imports the freedom of access vouchsafed to them who formerly were by their sins excluded from God's gracious presence: this is obtained, say these words, by virtue of his blood, making our peace by him, reconciling us to God by his cross, and bringing them near to God who were afar off. How is he our peace? because "the chastisement which procured our peace was upon him," Isa. liii. 5. How did he reconcile us to God, but "by the cross;" i. e. "by bearing our sins in his body on the cross?" 1 Pet. ii. 24. By virtue of his blood the gentiles, who formerly were aliens, are made near to God; they who were strangers were made God's domestics; they who emphatically were "sinners," Gal. ii. 15, were made "fellow-citizens of the saints;" they who were "children of wrath," ver. 2, to them is God "reconciled:" and after all this can it be reasonably denied, that Christ hath pacified God to the gentiles by his blood? or doth not all this import a reconciliation, on God's part, to them?

To show the reason of this reconciliation let it be noted, that God being a holy God, none were to come into his presence who had any pollution or defilement on them, upon pain of death, till they were sanctified or cleansed from it by some purification, or atonement made for them to God. He dwelt in the camp of Israel; and so those lepers which were so unclean as to pollute the camp were driven from it (Lev. xiii. 46, Numb. v. 2, 3, 2 Kings xv. 5), and those sin-offerings, which were polluted with the sins of the whole congregation, were carried out of the camp (Lev. xvi. 21, 22, Heb. xiii. 11).

God dwelt more especially in the temple, and therefore they who had lesser impurities, i. e. who were defiled by the dead, or by an issue, or a menstruous woman, were not to come thither, till they were cleansed from those defilements (Lev. xii. 4, xv. 31).

Moreover, he being a God of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, they who had committed any sin of ignorance, and lay under the guilt of it, were not permitted to come into the court of the men of Israel, till they had brought their offering of atonement (Ainsworth on Numb. v. 3).

Now God being still the same holy God, of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, the scriptures of the New Testament seem as plainly to make our freedom of access to God to depend upon our being sanctified, or purged from our defilement, and our being delivered from the guilt of sin, by an atonement made by the blood of Christ for our iniquities· enabled to come unto him as our Father, Rom. viii. 15.)

19 Now therefore ye (gentiles) are no more (to be reckoned as) [16] strangers and foreigners, but (as) fellowcitizens with the saints, and of the houshold of God;

20 And are built upon the foundation of the apostles (of the new) and prophets (of the old covenant), Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone (who supports and cements the whole building, both of believing Jews and gentiles, and unites both into one body by the Spirit, Ps. cxvii. 22);

21 In whom all the building (being thus) fitly framed together (or compacted) groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: (they then belong not to this building, whose bodies are not a holy temple to the Lord:)

22 In whom ye (Ephesians) also are builded together for [17] an habitation of God through the Spirit.

that so they being pardoned, we may have peace with God, and an access to his favour. This plainly seems to be the import of the words, Heb. ix. 13, "If the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of a heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh," and by so doing procureth an admission of the person cleansed to serve God in the sanctuary (Numb. xix. 9. 12. 17), "how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works (or works exposing you to death, the punishment of the person who came unclean into God's presence, that so you may be admitted) to serve the living God?"

[16] Ver. 19. Ξένοι, Strangers.] The proselytes who joined themselves to the God of Israel, were by the Jews, and by the scriptures, styled "strangers." He that only took upon him to worship the true God, and observe the precepts of Noah, was גר תושב, a stranger permitted to dwell among them, and to worship in the court of the gentiles: he that was circumcised, and became obedient to the law of Moses, was גר צדק, "a proselyte of righteousness:" but both were called strangers, according to that maxim of the Jews, "All the nations of the world are called גרים, strangers before the God of Israel:" but the Jews are said to be קרבים, "near to him." But now, saith the apostle, there is no such difference, the believing gentiles being equally admitted with the believing Jews to the privileges of the new Jerusalem, and equally related to God, as part of his family.

[17] Ver. 22.] Thus Philo* saith, that good men are Θεοῦ οἶκος καὶ ἱερὸν, "God's house and holy temple" (see note on 1 Cor. vi. 20).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. Τούτου χάριν, For this cause.] i. e. Because I assert that these privileges belong equally to the believing gentiles, though they be not circumcised: this being the reason why the Jews so fiercely persecuted him, and forced him to appeal to Cæsar (Acts xxii. 22, xxv. 11, 12, xxvi. 17); and why, after he came to Rome, the Jews preached Christ not sincerely, but out of envy to him, to "add affliction to his bonds" (Phil. i. 15, 16).

[2] Ver. 2. Εἴγε ἠκούσατε, If ye have heard.] Hence some raise a second objection against this epistle's being written by Paul to the Ephesians; for, say they, to them with whom he had so long conversed, there could be no doubt, whether they had "heard of the dispensation of the grace of God given him towards them." But indeed this is no objection to them who will consider, that this epistle was not written to the Ephesians only, but also to "all the faithful in Christ Jesus;" many of whom had never seen his face, nor heard his voice. And, secondly, if we consider, that he speaks here particularly of the manner of his receiving this dispensation, viz. "by immediate revelation from Christ Jesus;" of which the Galatians, among whom he had also preached, were ignorant: and therefore the apostle in his epistle to them, saith, γνωρίζω ὑμῖν, "Of this I certify you," confirming his assertion with an oath (Gal. i. 11, 12. 16). Add to this, thirdly, that the particle εἴγε is not here a particle of doubting, but of affirmation, and is to be rendered, as Theophylact doth, ἐπειδὴ, "since:" so the Hebrew אם is often rendered quandoquidem; and so Philo uses this particle in these words,* εἴγε τὰ ἀκούσια, καὶ τὰ κατ' ἄγνοιαν οὐδὲ ἀδικημάτων λόγον ἔχειν φασί τινες, "Seeing some say of things done involuntarily, and out of ignorance, that they are not to be accounted sins; and when he says, "Abel yet lives,* εἴγε καὶ ἱκέτης ὢν Θεοῦ καὶ φωνῇ χρώμενος εἰρίσκεται, seeing that he had still a voice to cry to God;" and that Sarah is represented by Moses both as barren and very fruitful,† εἴγε τὸ πολυανθρωπότατον τῶν ἐθνῶν ἐξ αὐτῆς ὁμολογεῖ γενέσθαι, "since he confesses, that from her should proceed the most populous of nations" (see also the note on i. 15).

[3] Ver. 5. Ὡς νῦν ἀπεκαλύφθη, As it hath been now revealed.] It was in the general made known, that in Abraham should "all the families of the earth be blessed;" and that Christ should be "a light to the gentiles;" of which see note on ver. 10. But it was not made known to the Jews, that the gentiles should be "fellow-heirs with them" of the same salvation and celestial inheritance: for that this was matter of admiration to the first Jewish converts, we learn from these words, "Then hath God also given to the gentiles repentance unto life," Acts xi. 18. They did know, or believe, that the gentiles should be made members of the same body, and admitted to the same privileges, and made partakers of the same Spirit with them. Hence the believing Jews, ἐξέστησαν, "were in an ecstasy," when they saw that the gift of the Holy Ghost was poured on the gentiles (Acts x. 45, Gal. ii. 14); and much less did they know, that the partition-wall, which made the distance and enmity between them, should be taken away by the Messiah as the apostle here teacheth (ver. 14, 15), that "the hand-writing of ordinances" was to be blotted out on this account (Col. ii. 24), and that these privileges were to be conferred upon them without circumcision, or observation of the law of Moses. They rather thought they were either first to be made Jews, and then Christians, or only were to come as slaves and drudges to them, who were the children of the kingdom. And hence the apostle spends a great part of the tles and [4] prophets by the Spirit (of wisdom and of knowledge, given them to discern all mysteries, 1 Cor. xii. 8, xiii. 2;

6 It being not before revealed as now it is,) That the Gentiles should be fellowheirs (of God with the believing Jews), and of the same body (with them), and partakers of his promise (the promise of his Spirit, Gal. iii. 14) in (and through) Christ (only) by (virtue of) the gospel (preached to them, and believed by them):

7 Whereof (gospel) I was made [5] a minister, [6] according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me (to be the apostle of the gentiles; for which work I was enabled) by the effectual working of his power (in signs and wonders, &c., Rom. xv. 19).

8 Unto me (I say), who (by reason of my former persecutions of the church of Christ, 1 Cor. xv. 9) am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ (i. e. the exceeding blessings to be obtained by faith in him);

9 And to make all men (Jews and gentiles) see what is the fellowship of the mystery (of the calling of the gentiles to be thus fellow-heirs with the Jews), which from the beginning of the world hath been hid (ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων, from former ages) in (the purpose of) God, [7] who created all things (belonging to the old and new creation) by Jesus Christ:

Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, to assert this privilege of the gentiles against the Judaizing Christians. In a word, to the Jews anciently belonged υἱοθεσία, "the sonship," and so the inheritance, for "if sons, then heirs" (Rom. viii. 17); and "the promises" (Rom. ix. 4); and they conceived that none were ever to be admitted into their body, or partake of those privileges, unless they were circumcised, and become obedient to the law of Moses (Acts xv. 1), which they thought never was to cease, or to be antiquated. And therefore, say the Greek fathers, the apostle here declares, that God now, under the gospel dispensation, equally admitted the unbelieving gentiles to these privileges by faith without circumcision, or obedience to the law of Moses.

[4] Καὶ προφήταις, And to the prophets.] That the apostle here understands the prophets of the New Testament, or those who in the first ages of the church received the prophetical grace, and by it understood "all mysteries" (1 Cor. xiii. 2), the words ὡς νῦν, "Now it is revealed" under the gospel to the prophets, will not suffer us to doubt. And this fully answers all the objections of Esthius against the expositions I have given of the former words.

[5] Ver. 7. Οὗ ἐγενόμην διάκονος, Of which I am made a minister.] Mr. L. thinks, that "this strongly implies a denial, that others were made ministers of the same doctrine;" but as it cannot imply that Barnabas, and others appointed to go with him, or that Silas and Timotheus, who preached the same doctrine (2 Cor. i. 19), were not also ministers of that doctrine; so the commission Christ gave to all his apostles, being to preach the gospel, and to make disciples through all the gentile world, it is not easy to conceive, that those nine, who were sent to preach to the gentiles, as well as Paul, should none of them understand their commission aright; especially if we consider how fully the council met at Jerusalem establish Paul's doctrine, with respect to the gentile converts, declaring, as Peter doth, that they, being Jews, expected to be saved by faith in Christ as did the gentiles; that God had put no difference betwixt them and the circumcised Jews, "purifying their hearts by faith," and giving them the Holy Spirit, as he had done to his believing Jews; and that therefore to endeavour to put the yoke of circumcision on their necks, was to "tempt God;" that is, to distrust the evidence that he had given of his acceptance of them without circumcision (Acts xv. 8—11). And the whole synod declare that they who said, they ought to be circumcised, and to keep the law, troubled them with words tending to the subversion of their souls (ver. 24); whereas "it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to them, to lay upon them none of these burdens" (ver. 28). And lastly, that they who were pillars of the church of the circumcision, knowing the grace given to Paul, approved his commission of preaching to the gentiles, as he did, Gal. ii. 9.

[6] Κατὰ τὴν δωρεὰν τῆς χάριτος, According to the gift of grace.] That the apostolate is by Paul oft styled grace, see the note on Rom. i. 5. And that in this sense he understands the gift of grace here, is evident from the following words.

[7] Ver. 9. Τῷ πάντα κτίσαντι, Who created all things.] The ancients commonly say, that God the Father is ὁ πρῶτος δημιουργός, "the prime and chief Creator of the world," as being the original of all creating power, and he as it were commanding, and the Son executing his command, who is hence styled,* ὁ προσεχὴς δημιουργός, "the immediate Creator," or αὐτουργὸς τοῦ κόσμου, "the Artificer of the world." Hence Irenæus† so often saith, Patrem omnia fecisse per Verbum, or Verbo virtutis; and that the Son and Holy Spirit are‡ quasi manus, "as it were the hands of God by which he made all things," and to both which all the angels are subject.

Διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.] See these words vindicated, Examen Millii in locum.

[8] Ver. 10. Ταῖς ἀρχαῖς καὶ ταῖς ἐξουσίαις, To the principalities and powers.] This phrase, though used of evil spirits, vi. 12, may be understood of good angels, the mystery of godliness being then "seen of angels," 1 Tim. iii. 16, and the things which the apostles preached by the Holy Ghost, being such as "the angels desired to look into," 1 Pet. i. 12. That the words ἐπουράνιος, and ἐπουράνια, always signify things, or persons in heaven, is very evident. So πατὴρ ἐπουράνιος is "our heavenly Father," Matt. xviii. 25, ὁ ἐπουράνιος, "the Lord from heaven," 1 Cor. xv. 48, 49, τὰ ἐπουράνια, "heavenly things," to be taught only by him "who was in heaven," John iii. 12, 13, σώματα ἐπουράνια, "heavenly bodies," viz. the stars, 1 Cor. xv. 40, βασιλεία ἐπουράνιος, "the kingdom to be enjoyed in heaven," 2 Tim. iv. 18, Heb. xi. 16, Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐπουράνιος, "the Jerusalem that is above," Heb. xii. 22, ὑπόδειγμα τῶν ἐπουρανίων, "the pattern of things in heaven," Heb. viii. 5, τὰ ἐπουράνια, "heavenly things," Heb. ix. 23. Hence are they distinguished from "things on earth," or "under the earth," Phil. ii. 10. The words are five times used in this epistle, and always signify "heavenly places." So it doth when we are said to "sit down with Christ, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, in heavenly places," ii. 6, when Christ is said to be "sat down with God, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, in heavenly places," i. 10; that being the consequence of his ascension into heaven (1 Pet. iii. 22, Heb. xiii. 10. 12), and therefore it is well rendered "in heavenly places," ver. 3. So it signifies, when the apostle speaks of "principalities, powers, and spiritual wickedness," ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, vi. 12, and so it must signify, when he speaks here of good angels in the same places; nor can it be well joined with σοφία, because διὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας intervenes.

To Mr. L.'s objection, that "it is not easy to conceive that the declaration of this mystery should be to this intent, that the angels, good or bad, should be acquainted with it," it may be answered,

First, That the apostle doth not say this was God's sole intent in the revelation of this mystery; but only, that this, amongst others more important, might be one.

Secondly, That the particle ἵνα signifies, adeò ut, "so that" (see note on 1 Cor. xiv. 13); and then the words will not respect God's intention in this revelation, but only the consequence of it. But whereas from those words, ver. 6, "Was not made known," &c., Mr. Le Clerc saith thus, "The same thing which is there said in other ages not to have been made known to the sons of men, is said here to have been unknown also to angels; which being so, I confess I do not well understand how they who are neither prophets nor angels can find out so many places in the prophets, in which the calling of the gentiles is manifestly and directly foretold: for certainly if it was revealed to the prophets, they understood it; and if it could be gathered from the literal sense of any prophecies, the angels might have understood it by those prophecies:" whereas, I say, he descants thus: What would he have? Would he deny against the plain and frequent sayings of Paul, that the calling of the gentiles was revealed to, and plainly foretold by, the prophets, as his words do import? Let him, if he can, confute Paul proving it against him, that the Lord had commanded the gentiles should be called in these words of the prophet Isaiah, "I have set thee to be a light to the gentiles, and to be for salvation to the ends of the earth" (Acts xiii. 46, 47): and his four other proofs from the prophets, Moses, David, and Esaias, that the gentiles were to glorify God for his mercy to them, in Christ Jesus, that root of Jesse, who was to rise up to govern the gentiles, and in whom the gentiles were to trust (Rom. xv. 9—12): yea, let him confute the apostle James, saying, "Simeon hath declared how God at first did visit the gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name: and to this agree the words of the prophets, After this I will build again the tabernacle of David, &c. that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the nations upon whom my name is called" (Acts xv. 14. 17). Nor doth the apostle any where hint, that the calling of the gentiles was not revealed to or by the prophets; but only that it was not so made known in all the particularities of it, ὡς νῦν, "as it is now discovered" by the apostles and prophets of the New Testament (see the note on ver. 6). Secondly, It was also known to, and preached by, the angels, declaring the glad tidings of great joy "which should be to all nations" through Christ (Luke ii. 10, 11), he being as well "a light to lighten the gentiles," as "the glory of his people Israel." Nor does the apostle here say, as he suggests, that this was unknown to the angels, but only that what was before made known to them by prophecies, was now made known to them by the church, i. e. the gentiles actually called; though all the circumstances mentioned note on ver. 6, might not be fully known before, even to them.

[9] Ver. 11. Κατὰ πρόθεσιν τῶν αἰώνων, According to the foredisposing of the ages.] In the first of the ages his wisdom seeing fit to give the promise of a Saviour to a fallen Adam; in the second age to typify and represent him to the Jews in sacred persons, rites, and sacrifices; and in the age of the Messiah, or the last age, to reveal him to the Jews, and preach him to the gentiles.

[10] Ver. 15. Πᾶσα πατριὰ, The whole family.] It is frequent with the Jews to make mention of the angels as "the family in heaven;" and of men, especially those that are in covenant with God, as his "family on earth;" as when they say, "God doeth nothing but he first consults with his family שלמעלה above," that is, with the angels: and that "he that addicts himself to the study of the divine law for the sake of the law, conciliates to himself peace with the family above, and with the family below;" that is, with angels in heaven, and men on earth. They are also called קדישי מעלה "the saints above," Targ. in Job xv. 15, and "the sons of God," as in these words of Job i. 6, and ii. 1, "And on a day came ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ, the sons of God," and xxxviii. 7, "Where wast thou when ἄγγελοί μου, all the sons of God shouted for joy?" And so are all true believers styled, for "to as many as believed, he gave power to be the sons of God," John i. 12, and they at the resurrection shall be "like the angels, and be the sons of God," Luke xx. 36.

[11] Ver. 18. Τὸ πλάτος καὶ μῆκος, &c. The breadth, length, depth, and height.] By "the breadth" of this love, some of the fathers understand the great extent and generality of Christ's affection: his death being designed for the benefit of all persons, Jew and gentile, through all ages, from Adam to the end of the world, and in all places, he having by it "reconciled things in heaven, and things in the earth" (i. 10). By "the depth" of it, say they, is signified the greatness of his humiliation; love to mankind having induced him to change "the form of God" for that of a servant, humbled the Lord of life to an ignominious and painful death, and brought him from the highest heaven to the lowest hell, into which, they conceive, he descended for our sakes. "The length" of it imports, say they, his love to us from the beginning of the world, we being "chosen in Christ from the beginning (i. 4, iii. 11). "The height" of his affection is manifested, say they, in that being now exalted to the right hand of Majesty, he is still there employed in acts of greatest kindness to us, using his whole power in heaven and earth for the benefit of his church. But it seems more natural to say, that the apostle, by enumerating these dimensions, only intends to signify the exceeding greatness of "the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge." Thus Job, speaking of the unsearchable wisdom of God, and his unfathomable perfections, puts these inquiries: "Canst thou search him out to perfection? It is higher than the heaven, what canst thou do? Deeper than hell, what canst thou know? The measure of it is longer than the earth, and the breadth of it than the sea" (Job xi. 7, 8); and the son of Sirach saith, "The height of heaven, and the breadth of the earth, the abyss and wisdom, who can search out?" (Ecclus. i. 3), and the apostle cries out, "O the depth of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how unsearchable are his judgments," &c. (Rom. xi. 33). And in this sense these four dimensions will chiefly be designed to import what the apostle styles, (ver. 8), "the unsearchable riches of the love of Christ." It therefore seems unreasonable to think, that "the love of Christ passing knowledge," should import only the love of Christ passing, i. e. "excelling the knowledge or skill in mystical interpretations, which the Gnostics pretended to:" for, as the word γνῶσις put absolutely hath no such import, that I know of, in the holy scripture; so after the mention of all these dimensions, and "the unsearchable riches" of it (ver. 8), it seems a very faint expression to say, it surpasseth that vain and insignificant knowledge to which the Gnostics pretended; their mystical interpretations, recorded by Irenæus, being above measure vain and impious, even a mystery of iniquity: and as for the phrase ὑπερβάλλουσα τῆς γνώσεως, it is justified by Aristotle,* who hath it twice in one chapter, viz. ὑπερβάλλειν τῆς συμμετρίας, "to exceed the measure," ὑπερβάλλειν τῶν πλωτήρων, "to excel other navigators."

[12] Ver. 19. Εἰς πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ Θεοῦ, With all the fullness of God.] Εἰς pro ἐν (see note on Col. i. 20), that is, say some, with the highest degrees of faith and love; or with all fullness of spiritual gifts, especially those of knowledge dantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power (of the Holy Ghost) that worketh in us (and so miraculously confirms his doctrine to the world), 21 Unto him (I say) be (ascribed all) glory in the (assemblies of the) church by (and through) Christ Jesus (through whom we offer up all prayers and praises, Heb. xiii. 15, Eph. v. 20) throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

* Polit. lib. iii. cap. 13, p. 447, 448.

and wisdom, which might enable them to comprehend the greatness of his love. Thus iv. 10, "He ascended up on high, that he might fill all things" with spiritual gifts, mentioned ver. 10, that he might "give gifts unto men," ver. 8; and i. 23, his church is styled, "the fullness of him that filleth all in all;" i. e. who filleth all his members with those gifts.

CHAPTER IV.

1 I THEREFORE, the prisoner of the Lord (ἐν Κυρίῳ, in bonds for Christ), beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called,

2 [1] With all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, (and so) forbearing one another in love;

3 Endeavouring (thus) to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

4 (For ye know, that)There is one body (of the whole church), and [2] one Spirit (which animates the whole body), even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; (i. e. and you know also, that you are all called to the same hope of eternal life.

5 There is also to us Christians)One Lord, [3] one faith (in this Lord), one baptism (by which we do profess this faith),

6 [4] One God and Father of all, who is above all (by his essence), and through all (by his providence), and in you all (by his Spirit).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 2, 3.] Note here from the fathers, that ἐὰν τὴν ἀγάπην ἔχωμεν ἀνεξόμεθα ἀλλήλων, "where love is retained, there will be mutual forbearance;" and from Zanchy, that peace cannot be preserved without that mutual forbearance, and that humility, which exclude, and that meekness, which is opposite to, anger and contention.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἓν Πνεῦμα, One Spirit.] From these and the former words, "the unity of the Spirit," it seems plain to me that the union of the mystical body of the church catholic consists in this, that they all have the same Spirit communicated to them from their head Christ Jesus. For the whole body of Christians is here said to have "one Spirit," and their unity is styled, "the unity of the Spirit." "The body is one," saith the apostle, 1 Cor. xii. 12, "for by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body," ver. 23. And to the whole body of the church of Corinth he speaks thus, "Know ye not that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" 1 Cor. iii. 16; "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, that is in you?" vi. 19. Christ, saith the apostle here, ii. 16—18, hath reconciled both Jew and gentile into one body unto God, and hath made peace between them; "for by him we have both access by one Spirit to the Father;" ἄρα οὖν, and therefore having thus one Spirit, by which we are made one body, and sons of the same Father, "we are all fellow-citizens of the saints, and of the family of God;" and are "built up all together into a habitation of God through the Spirit." Now hence it follows,

First, That only sincere Christians are truly members of that church catholic of which Jesus Christ is the head, since the whole body is united to him by the communication of the Holy Spirit, whom the wicked of the world "cannot receive" (John xiv. 17), they being "sensual, having not the Spirit" (Jude 19).

Secondly, That nothing can unite any professor of Christianity to this one body, but the participation of the Spirit of Christ; and therefore nothing else can make him a true member of that church which is his body. Hence the apostle doth inform us negatively, that "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ" dwelling in him, "he is none of his," Rom. viii. 9. 11, and affirmatively, that "by this we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit that he hath given us," 1 John iii. 24. And again, "By this we know that he abideth in us, and we in him, because he hath given us of his Spirit," iv. 13. For "as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are sons of God," Rom. viii. 14, and "because we are sons, God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts," Gal. iv. 6. It therefore must be owned as a certain truth, that nothing can unite us to that church and body, of which Christ Jesus is the head, but the participation of the Spirit.

Thirdly, That no error in judgment, or mistake in practice, which doth not tend to deprive a Christian of the Spirit of Christ, can separate him from the church of Christ.

Fourthly, Hence it demonstratively follows, that no church-governors, jointly or severally, can be by God appointed to be the living judges, or the infallible directors of our faith. For since in matters of faith we must have a judgment of certainty, we cannot own him as such by virtue of that assistance of the Holy Ghost, which alone can make them such, till we are certain they belong to that church of which Christ Jesus is the head, and to which only the promise of the Spirit doth belong; i. e. till we are certain they are sincere and upright Christians. Since therefore God hath given us no certain rule to know this by, we may rest satisfied, that he designed no such magisterial guides should be continued in his church.

[3] Ver. 5. Μία πίστις, One faith.] It plainly is asserted in the holy scriptures, that there is one "common faith," Tit. i. 4, one "like precious faith," 2 Pet. i. 1, of all that bear the name of Christians; a "unity of faith," and "of the knowledge of the Son of God," to which we must all arrive, Eph. iv. 13; a "faith once delivered to the saints," Jude 3, for which we must "strive earnestly," and in which we must "build up ourselves;" a "faith of the gospel" for which we are exhorted to "contend as with one soul," Phil. i. 27. But vain is hence the inference of the papists, that this one faith must be either theirs, and then we cannot be saved without it; or ours, and then they cannot be saved: for this "one faith," into which all Christians were baptized, contains neither the doctrines in which they differ from us, nor we from them, but only the Apostles' Creed, which the whole church of Christ, for many centuries, received as a perfect system of things necessary to be believed in order to salvation; as I have fully proved, Treatise of Tradition, par. ii. chap. vii. §. 4—8.

[4] Ver. 6. Εἷς Θεός, One God.] Here, say the Socinians, that God who is styled "one," is also styled "the Father," and to him is ascribed this epithet so common among the philosophers, to denote the supreme Deity, that he is ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πᾶσι, "God over all." But to this it is answered,

1. That we deny not that God the Father is "one God over all," or that there is one who is both God and the Father; only we add, that there is also one who is one God of the same essence, and the Son; and so also say we of the Holy Spirit: and that as the one Lord, and the one Spirit here, do not exclude the Father from being both Lord and Spirit, so neither doth the "one God and Father" exclude the Son, or Holy Spirit, from being God, but only from being God the Father. It is also to be noted, that the primitive fathers before the Nicene council did not scruple to distinguish Christ from God the Father, by styling him another God from the maker of all things, ὑπὲρ ὃν ἄλλος Θεὸς οὐκ ἔστι, "above whom there is no other God." Justin Martyr* twice describes the Father by this distinctive character, that he is God, ὑπὲρ ὃν ἄλλος Θεὸς οὐκ ἔστι, "above whom there is no other God;" saying, that Christ did nothing but what ὁ τῶν

* Dial. cum Tryph. p. 275, cap. 276, D.

7 But (though the body is but one, yet) unto every one of us (who are members of this body) [5] is given grace (enabling us to serve this body) according to the measure of the gift of Christ.

8 [6] Wherefore (to manifest this) he (the psalmist) saith, When he (Christ) ascended up on high, he led captivity (Satan and death) captive (Judg. v. 12, Heb. ii. 14), and [7] gave gifts unto men (i. e. received them, Ps. lxviii. 19, to give to them).

9 (Now that he ascended, what is it but (a demonstration) that he also descended first [8] into the lower parts of the earth?

10 He that descended (thus into the lower parts of the earth) is the same also that (after his resurrection) ascended up [9] far above all heavens, that he might fill all things) (with his gifts, according to his promise, that when he was ascended he would send the Spirit upon his apostles and disciples, John xiv. 17, xv. 26, xvii. 5, Luke xxiv. 49).

11 And (accordingly) he gave some, apostles (to reveal his will); and some, prophets (to explain the mysteries of faith); and some, evangelists (to propagate this faith to other nations); and [10] some, pastors and teachers (to instruct others in it.

12 [11] And this variety of gifts was conferred upon them) for the perfecting (Gr. compacting) of the saints (into one body), For the work of the ministry (that they who had them might minister to the temporal necessity, κόσμον ποιήσας, ὑπὲρ ὃν ἄλλος οὐκ ἔστι Θεός, "the Maker of the world, above whom there is no other God, would have him do;" and yet he at least twenty times asserts, that Christ is "God and Lord," and that he is the person, ἀφ' οὗ οὐρανὸν καὶ γῆν,* "by whom he made the heaven and earth," and by whom he will renew them; the Word of God, δι' οὗ οὐρανὸς καὶ γῆ, καὶ ἡ πᾶσα κτίσις ἐγένετο, "by whom the heaven and the earth, and the whole creation was made." So Irenæus† often saith that "the Father is only to be called God and Lord;" and yet he adds, that this is not said to exclude the Son, "who is in the Father, and hath the Father in him, and hath his principality in all things."

[5] Ver. 7. Ἐδόθη ἡ χάρις, Is given grace.] These graces being therefore the gift of Christ, and not our own, no one should be puffed up, or despise others on the account of them; nor should envy any others to whom he thinks fit to give them in a higher measure.

[6] Ver. 8. Διὸ λέγει, Wherefore he saith.] That this psalm relates to the Messiah, we learn from the Jews themselves, who interpret this psalm of him; for the words, ver. 32, are by them thus paraphrased, "All nations shall bring gifts to the King Messiah," Schemoth Rabbah, §. 15. Let it be also noted, that Christ triumphed over death and Satan on the cross" (Col. ii. 15), but he led Satan captive more gloriously, when, after this ascension, he poured his Holy Spirit on his apostles and disciples, and by that Spirit enables them to cast out devils in his name, and turn men from the power of Satan to God (Acts xxvi. 18). He also then triumphed over death most signally, when, thus ascending, he became Lord over the dead, and "had the keys of death and hades in his hand" (Rom. xiv. 9, Rev. i. 18). Note also, that to "lead captivity captive," is a phrase common in the Old Testament, to signify a conquest over enemies, especially over such as formerly had led them captive: so Judg. v. 12, "Arise, Barak, αἰχμαλώτισον αἰχμαλωσίαν, lead captivity captive" (see 1 Kings viii. 46, 2 Chron. xxviii. 5. 11. 17, Numb. xxi. 1, Deut. xxi. 10).

[7] Καὶ ἔδωκε δόματα, And gave gifts.] That is, saith Dr. Hammond, "he received gifts to give to men," from the nature of the Hebrew לקח, which signifies both to give and to receive, and thus it is rendered by the Targum, Syriac, and Arabic: but, saith Mr. Clerc, "When the word signifies to give, there follows a dative case, Exod. xxv. 2, whereas the Hebrew here hath באדם, which has made learned men conjecture, that St. Paul read לאדם, to man." But, first, this is not always true, for, Hos. xiv. 2, we read thus, "Take away iniquity, וקח טוב, and give good;" and where a dative case is added, an accusative either goes before it, as, "Thou hast received, מתנות, gifts for men," and Judg. xiv. 2, קחו אותה לי, "Give her to me," and ver. 3; or else follows after it, as 1 Kings iii. 24, קחו לי חרב, "Give me a sword" (see xvii. 10, Exod. xviii. 12, xxv. 2): and as for ב in באדם, who knows not that it sometimes signifies pro, for, and sometimes only is the sign of the dative case? (see Noldius de Partic. Hebr. p. 158. 163.)

[8] Ver. 9. Εἰς τὰ κατώτερα μέρη τῆς γῆς, Into the lower parts of the earth.] That is, into the grave: so Ps. lxiii. 9, "They that seek my soul to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth," i. e. they shall fall by the sword, ver. 19; Isa. xliv. 23, "Sing, O heavens! shout, the lower parts of the earth." "We cannot be assured," saith Bishop Pearson,* "that the descent of Christ, which St. Paul here speaketh of, was performed after his death, nor can we be assured that 'the lower parts of the earth' do signify hell; they may as well refer to his incarnation," according to that of David, Psal. cxxxix. 15, "My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lower parts of the earth;" or to his burial, according to that of the prophet, "They that seek my soul to destroy it shall go into the lower parts of the earth; κατώτερα γὰρ μέρη τὸν Θάνατον ἐκάλεσεν, "He calls his death his descent into the lower parts of the earth, say Chrysostom and Theodoret on the place.

[9] Ver. 10. Ὑπεράνω πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν, Far above all heavens.] He being made "higher than the heavens," Heb. vii. 26, that is, than the airy and the starry heavens, and ascending above them into the presence of God, who hath "set his glory above the heavens," Psal. viii. 1, and is exalted above them, Psal. lvii. 5. 11, cviii. 4, 5.

[10] Ver. 11. Τοὺς δὲ ποιμένας καὶ διδασκάλους, And some pastors and teachers.] That these "pastors and teachers" were in the first ages men of extraordinary gifts, is evident from this very place; for the preceding words, "He gave gifts unto men, some apostles, some prophets," &c., show that all the persons mentioned here were partakers of the gifts which Christ, ascending up on high and sending down the Holy Spirit, gave to men. Hence, among the different χαρίσματα, gifts of the Holy Ghost, are reckoned, διδασκαλία, "teaching," Rom. xii. 6, 7; and among the gifts exercised in their assemblies, διδαχὴ, "doctrine," 1 Cor. xiv. 6. 26; among the persons who had received the διαιρέσεις χαρισμάτων, "diversities of gifts," are reckoned, after prophets, διδάσκαλοι, "teachers," 1 Cor. xii. 28, Rom. xii. 6, 7, and here: and so Tertullian† makes mention of them, as persons "endued with the grace of knowledge." The "pastors" seem probably the same with the κυβερνήσεις, "governments," 1 Cor. xii. 28, and the προστάτις, Rom. xii. 8: and it is evident, from both those places, that there were also men endued with those spiritual gifts there mentioned. Hence it is observable of these doctors, that when the extraordinary gifts of the church ceased, their very names grew out of use, they being very rarely mentioned in the succeeding ages of the church.

[11] Ver. 12—15.] From these five verses the papists argue for an infallible guide, thus: "Christ gave apostles, pastors, and teachers, that Christians might not be tossed to and fro with every wind of doctrine: this end could not be compassed by giving us such guides and instructors in belief as were merely fallible, and who might lead us into circumvention of error. Moreover, God gave such pastors to his church, till we all come to the unity of the faith, which will not be till the last days of all; wherefore, till the end of the world, the world shall be provided of them, and by them be secured from being 'like children tossed to and fro.'"

Ans. I answer, That this text is so far from proving a succession of infallible guides, in matters of faith, to the world's end, that it seems rather to establish the doctrine of the protestants, touching the fullness and perspicuity of the holy scripture in all necessary articles of Christian faith, and to overthrow the pretended necessity of infallible guides in order to that end. For

First, To "come to a perfect man," as to the unity of faith and knowledge of the Son of God, is, in the scripture language, to be sufficiently instructed in the articles of the Christian faith and knowledge. Thus, when our Lord saith to the young man, "If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast," Matt. xix. 21, by comparing these words with those in Mark and Luke, Mark x. 21, "One thing is lacking," or, is wanting to thee, Luke xviii. 22, it is evident, that to "be perfect" there, is not to be wanting in the knowledge or practice of any thing to be done, that this young man might have eternal life.

When Paul saith, "We speak wisdom, ἐν τοῖς τελείοις, among them that are perfect," 1 Cor. ii. 6, the meaning is, say the Greek commentators,* παρὰ τοῖς τελείαν παραδεξαμένοις πίστιν, "among those who are perfectly instructed in the faith:" and when he saith, "As many as are perfect, let us mind the same thing," he speaks of persons fully instructed in their Christian liberty: and when he saith, "Leaving the principles of the oracles of Christ, let us go on to perfection," he calls us to advance to a more full instruction in the faith and knowledge of Christ (see note on 1 Cor. ii. 6).

Secondly, Note, that the apostles and first preachers of the gospel were made ministers of his church, πληρῶσαι τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ, "to teach fully the word of God," Col. i. 25, 26; "to teach every man in all wisdom, that they might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus," ver. 28. And accordingly, departing from the churches planted by them, they commended them only "to the word of grace, which was able to build them up, and give them an inheritance among all that are sanctified," Acts xx. 32.

Thirdly, Observe, that the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, here named, were given at our Lord's ascension for these ends; for "when he ascended up on high, ἔδωκε, he (actually) gave some apostles," &c.; and that even those pastors and teachers had their χαρίσματα, or supernatural gifts of the Holy Spirit, to fit them for that end. Whence it demonstratively follows, that these gifts ceasing soon after, a succession of such persons was neither promised nor was necessary to this end; for if so, Christ must be charged with breach of promise, and being wanting to the church in what is necessary for the obtainment of those ends.

Fourthly, Observe, that these apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, endued with these supernatural gifts, "for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ into a perfect man," not doing all or any of these things in person since their death, and yet being given for the accomplishing these ends, must be acknowledged to have done all these things, as far as they were needful, by some other way. Now there being no other way in which they could do it, but by their writings left behind them as a rule of faith, and by which "they being dead yet speak;" it follows, that these writings, duly attended to, must be sufficient for these ends; and consequently they must, both with sufficient fullness and perspicuity, instruct us in all the necessary articles of Christian faith and knowledge. Hence Chrysostom* informs us, that they writ the gospel, πρὸς καταρτισμὸν τῶν ἁγίων, "for the perfecting the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ." In a word, it is evident this text doth as much prove a necessity of apostles, prophets, and evangelists, in all future ages of the church, to keep her members fixed in the truth, as of pastors and doctors; these apostles, prophets, and evangelists, being here placed in the first rank of those whom God hath given for this end: since therefore these apostles, prophets, and evangelists were only given in the first ages of the church, it evidently follows, that the persons mentioned in this text were not given them to do this personally to the world's end, but only to do it by the doctrine they then taught.

[12] Ver. 16. Ἐξ οὗ, From whom.] That is, from which head the whole body of Christians, duly compacted together, some sustaining the office of an inferior head, some of an eye, some of a hand, some of a foot (1 Cor. xii. 15—17), by the assistance which every of these parts, thus united together, gives to the whole, according to the particular proportion of its gifts, increaseth or grows in love, and so each member edifies one another.

[13] Ver. 17. Ἐν ματαιότητι τοῦ νόος, In the vanity of the mind.] The heathen idols are frequently in the Old Testament styled μάταια, "vain things;" and the apostles preached to the gentiles to abstain and turn ἀπὸ τῶν ματαίων τούτων, "from those vain things," Acts xiv. 15, by compliance with which they became "vain in their imaginations, and their foolish hearts were darkened," Rom. i. 22, and this seems to be the "vain conversation" from which, saith Peter, they were redeemed, 1 Pet. i. 18, and the "vanity of the mind" here mentioned.

[14] Ver. 18. Ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι, Alienated from the life of God.] i. e. Not only from that way of life which God approves of, but which resembles him in purity, righteousness, truth, and goodness.

[15] Διὰ τὴν ἄγνοιαν τὴν οὖσαν ἐν αὐτοῖς, By the ignorance that is in them.] This seems to refer to their ignorance of the nature, the attributes, and the providence of God, and of a future state of happiness and misery.

[16] The blindness of their hearts,] Here mentioned, they had contracted by wicked habits and customs, the frequency of vile examples, and by those corrupt principles which made them insensible of their impurity and lasciviousness; for they committed whoredom and adultery, saith Origen,†

20 But ye have not so learned (the doctrine of) Christ;

21 If so be (or since) that ye have heard him (by our preaching), and have been taught by him (Gr. instructed in him), as the truth is in Jesus:

22 (To wit,) That ye put off concerning the former conversation (in heathenism) [18] the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; (i. e. the lusts which deceive you, promising that pleasure and satisfaction which they cannot yield; or which you practised whilst heathens, being deceived by your heathen priests, declaring that they were acceptable to the gods, and the philosophy and vain deceit of those men who allowed them;)

23 And be renewed in the spirit of your mind;

24 And that ye (may) put on the new man, which after (the image of) God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

25 Wherefore putting away [19] lying (a vice too common among heathens, and opposite to truth and righteousness), speak every man truth with his neighbour: for we are members one of another: (now lying tends to dissolve societies, and hurt the members of the same body.

26 If you) [20] Be ye angry (take heed), and sin not: [21] let not the sun go down upon your wrath:

27 [22] Neither give place to the (temptation of the) devil.

28 [23] Let him that stole (before his conversion) steal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he [24] may have to give to him that needeth.

29 Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying, [25] that it may minister grace unto the hearers.

30 [26] And grieve not the holy Spirit of God, where-

[17] Ver. 19. Ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ, With greediness.] Hoc totum fecerunt in avaritiâ, dum nunquam luxuriando saturantur, nec eorum terminum habet voluptas (Hieronymus in locum).

[18] Ver. 22. Τὸν παλαιὸν ἄνθρωπον, The old man,] Signifies those evil habits they so long practised in the state of heathenism; "the new man," that divine life, that life of righteousness and holiness which Christianity requires: and it is called "holiness of truth," or inward holiness, in opposition to the outward and ceremonial holiness of the Jews.

[19] Ver. 25. Τὸ ψεῦδος, Lying.] Which the heathen philosophers thought lawful, when it was good or profitable for them; as owning that rule of Menander, κρεῖττον δὲ ἑλέσθαι ψεῦδος, ἢ ἀληθὲς κακόν, "A lie is better than a hurtful truth:" and that of Proclus, τὸ γὰρ ἀγαθὸν κρεῖττόν ἐστι τῆς ἀληθείας, "Good is better than truth:" and that of Darius in Herodotus,* ἔνδα γάρ τι δεῖ καὶ ψεῦδος λέγεσθαι, λεγέσθω, "When a lie will profit, let it be used:" and that of Plato,† "He may lie, who knows how to do it, ἐν δέοντι καιρῷ, in a fit season:" for "there is nothing decorous in truth," saith Maximus Tyrius,‡ "but when it is profitable: yea, sometimes," saith he, καὶ ψεῦδος ὤνησεν ἀνθρώπους, καὶ τ' ἀληθὲς ἔβλαψεν, "truth hurts, and a lie profits men." And to countenance this practice, both Plato§ and the stoics‖ seem to have framed a Jesuitical distinction between lying in words, and with assent to an untruth, which they called "lying in the soul:" the first they allowed "to an enemy in prospect of advantage; and for many other dispensations of this life:" that is, their wise man may tell a lie craftily, and for gain; but he must not embrace a falsehood through ignorance, or assent to an untruth.

[20] Ver. 26. Ὀργίζεσθε καὶ μὴ ἁμαρτάνετε, Be angry, and sin not.] These words, though spoken imperatively, are not a command to be angry, but a caution to avoid sinful anger; as when the prophet saith to Nineveh, "Fortify thy strong holds, the sword shall cut thee off," Nah. iii. 14, i. e. though thou dost fortify them, it shall do so. And the son of Sirach, "Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee afraid," xxx. 9, i. e. this will be the issue of it. So Isa. viii. 9, 10.

This must the Christian do, before he offers up to God his evening sacrifice, that so he may lift up to God "pure hands without wrath" (1 Tim. ii. 8).

[22] Ver. 27.] Let a man be always careful that he be not angry, say the Jews;† for whoso is angry, omnes species gehennæ ei dominantur, "is subject to the dominion of the infernal fiends."

[23] Ver. 28. Ὁ κλέπτων, Let him that stole, &c.] This exhortation was needful, because "in many nations it was not counted a sin to steal," saith Sextus Empiricus:‡ "nor were they much ashamed at it, when it was objected to them," saith Bardesanes.§

[24] Ἵνα ἔχῃ μεταδιδόναι, That he may have to give.] This charity the primitive Christians expected even from them that laboured with their own hands. So Hermas‖ saith, "It is good to give liberally to all that are in need, out of the labour of our own hands."

[26] Ver. 30. Καὶ μὴ λυπεῖτε, And grieve not the Holy Spirit.] The Holy Spirit being a divine person, it is certain that he cannot properly be grieved or vexed as we are. We therefore must remove from this expression, when it is applied to him, all turbulent motions, all real pain, disquiet, discontent, and look upon it as spoken ἀνθρωποπαθῶς, i. e. so as to intimate we do that to him, which, when it is done to men, creates grief to them. ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 2. Προσφορὰν καὶ θυσίαν, An offering and oblation.] That the death of Christ is here styled an oblation offered up to God for us, cannot be denied: but Crellius saith that the apostle speaks not here of an expiatory oblation; because the oblation here mentioned is said to be offered for a sweet-smelling savour, which phrase is scarce ever used concerning expiatory sacrifices, but chiefly of burnt-offerings, which were not of themselves expiatory, and are by Moses distinguished from sacrifices for sin.

But (1.) that sacrifices of a sweet-smelling savour were used to make atonement for, and to expiate the sin of, men, is proved from the sacrifice of Noah: for, whereas in the Greek we read, that when that sacrifice was offered, God smelled ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, "a sacrifice of a sweet savour;" in the Hebrew he is said to smell את ריח הניח "a savour of rest;" that is, which made God's anger to rest, say the Jewish writers. Josephus* informs us, that Noah by this sacrifice "entreated that God would now be atoned, and would no more conceive such displeasure against the earth," i. e. the inhabitants of it. And by the Syriac version it is rendered an "odour or placability," because, as Vatablus and Munster on the place observe, God then ceased from his anger, and was appeased: so that the first time this phrase is used it is taken for an expiatory sacrifice, and is designed to appease the wrath of God. The sacrifices which Job offered for his sons and daughters, and for his three friends, were burnt-offerings, as the phrase עלות shows, and yet they were offered, the one to expiate for the sin of his children (Job i. 5), the other to appease the wrath of God kindled against his three friends (xlii. 7). Moreover, it is evident from scripture that this phrase ὀσμὴ εὐωδίας, "a sweet savour," is used, not only of burnt-offerings, but of sacrifices for sin: thus, "If any people of the land sin through ignorance—when his sin comes to his knowledge," the text saith, "he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a female without blemish, περὶ τῆς ἁμαρτίας a sacrifice for the sin he hath sinned, and the priest shall burn it upon the altar, εἰς ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, for a sweet savour to the Lord; and the priest shall make atonement for him, and it shall be forgiven him." To this importance of the phrase doth David manifestly allude, when he saith to Saul, "If the Lord hath stirred thee up against me, ὀσφρανθείη ἡ θυσία, let him smell an offering." And when this ὀσμὴ εὐωδίας, "sacrifice of a sweet-smelling savour" is applied to burnt-offerings, they are declared to be "favourably accepted, to make atonement for him that offers them." This the son of Sirach seems plainly to say, of their sacrifices of sweet savour in the general, when he speaks thus of Aaron;† "He chose him out of all the people to offer sacrifices to the Lord, incense and a sweet savour, for a memorial, to make a reconciliation for his people." Thus of the burnt-offerings in Leviticus it is said, that he that brings them "shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt-offering, and it shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him," Lev. i. 4. Now, as the Hebrew doctors* tell us, that this imposition of hands was always joined with confession of sins over the sacrifice, which confession still concluded with a prayer, that the sacrifice might be an expiation for them: so the phrase, "It shall be accepted to make atonement for him," Lev. xiv. 20, used here and elsewhere concerning holy things, is as much as is ever said of expiatory sacrifices: nor is it any objection to the contrary, that burnt-offerings are usually distinguished from sin-offerings; the reason of that being this, saith Ainsworth,† that burnt-offerings were for the atonement of general sins, and such as often were unknown to men, whereas for special sins there was appointed a special sacrifice and sin-offering. This, saith Dr. Outram,‡ was the opinion of the Jews, that burnt-offerings were intended for the expiation of sin. And this, saith Mr. Selden,§ was their practice, to offer these as expiatory sacrifices for strangers.

[2] Ver. 3. Καθὼς πρέπει ἁγίοις, As becometh saints.] Worthy of observation is the note of Jerome here, Ex quo sanctus non potest appellari, quicunque, extra fornicationem, in aliquâ immunditiâ, et avaritiâ voluptatum, quâ se delectaverit, invenitur.

[3] Ver. 4.] That the words μωρολογία and εὐτραπελία, are to be interpreted to an impure sense, may probably be gathered from the words joined with them, fornication, uncleanness, filthiness, and more probably from the reason rendered for the abandoning them all; viz. that "no fornicator, or unclean person, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of God, or of Christ." Μωρολογία is in the rabbinical phrase, נבלות פה, turpitudo oris, of which they‖ proverbially say, כל המנבל פי, Quicunque fœdè loquitur, perinde est ac si introduceret porcum in sanctuarium. To commit נבלה, "folly in Israel," is to commit whoredom, or adultery: and the word by the Septuagint is sometimes rendered τὸ ἄσχημον, "indecency," sometimes ἀφροσύνη, sometimes μωρία, "folly," and sometimes ἀκαθαρσία, "filthiness." And the soliciting a woman to fornication by filthy words is in the Targum expressed thus, לא תנבל, Non deturpabis verbum oris, "Thou shalt not speak impurely with thy mouth, to cause thy flesh to sin," Eccles. v. 6.

Εὐτραπελία is by Suidas rendered μωρολογία, κουφότης, "scurrility, levity;" by Phavorinus, βωμολοχία. Now βωμολόχος, is a filthy scurrilous man; and in Aristophanes, βωμολόχοις ἔπεσι χαίρειν, is "to be pleased with filthy scurrilous words." Hence Œcumenius and Theophylact reckon them both as ὀχήματα τῆς πορνείας, "the forerunners or incentives to fornication."

As for the word πλεονεξία, that it hath sometimes an impure sense, see note on 1 Thess. iv. 6; though being here styled "idolatry," it seems more naturally to relate to the love of riches, which renders us most truly guilty of that sin: though it be also true that he who loveth pleasures more than God is guilty of that sin, and this impurity was a frequent and almost general appendix of idol-worship.

That the Ephesians stood in need of these instructions we learn from Democritus Ephesius,* who, speaking of the temple of the Ephesian Diana, hath much περὶ τῆς χλιδῆς αὐτῶν, "of the softness and luxury of the Ephesians;" and from Euacles in his book de Ephesiacis,† who saith, ἐν Ἐφέσῳ ἱερὰ ἱδρύσασθαι ἑταίρᾳ Ἀφροδίτῃ, "In Ephesus they built temples to Venus, the mistress of the whores;" and from Strabo, who informs us that "in their ancient temples there were old images, but in their new σκολιὰ ἔργα, vile works were done," lib. xiv. p. 640.

[4] Ver. 6. Μηδεὶς ἀπατάτω, Let no man deceive you.] Among the heathens, simple fornication was held a thing indifferent; the laws allowed and provided for it in many nations; whence the grave Epictetus counsels his scholars, "only to whore, ὡς νόμιμον ἔστι,‡ according to law:" and in all places they connived at it. "He that blames young men for their meretricious amours," saith Cicero,§ "does what is repugnant to the custom and concessions of our ancestors, for when was not this done? when was it not permitted?" This was suitable both to the principles and practices of many of their grave philosophers, especially of the stoics,‖ who held it "lawful for others to use whores, and for them to get their living by such practices." Hence even in the church of Corinth some had taught this doctrine (see note on 1 Cor. vi. 13).

[5] Ver. 8. Ποτε σκότος, Sometimes darkness.] That the state of the gentile world, both in the Old and the New Testament, is represented by a state of darkness, and that of Christians by a state of light, see note on Rom. xiii. 12.

[6] Ver. 9. Τοῦ Πνεύματος, Of the Spirit.] Many Greek copies, and all the Latin and the Syriac, read τοῦ φωτὸς, "the fruits of the light," with which you are enlightened; and so doth Jerome here, taking no notice of the other reading.

[7] Ver. 11. Ἐλέγχετε.] Reprove them, make them ashamed of them, by bringing them to the light, ἐλέγχειν γὰρ ἀντὶ τοῦ αἰσχύνειν, ἐλέγχω, τὸ κεκρυμμένον ἀτόπημά τινος εἰς φῶς ἄγω. Phavorinus.

[8] Ver. 12. Τὰ κρυφῇ γινόμενα, Done of them in secret.] In their mysteries, which therefore were styled ἀπόῤῥητα μυστήρια, none being permitted to divulge them upon pain of death. Hence even the word μυστήριον hath its name, say grammarians, from μύειν τὸ στόμα, "to stop the mouth." The Eleusinia Sacra were performed in the night, agreeably to the deeds of darkness committed in them; so were the Bacchanalia, hence called Nyctelia; and they were both full of detestable iniquity; and upon that account, saith Livy,* were banished by the Roman senate out of Rome and Italy: ἀκόλουθα γὰρ τῷ διονυσιακῷ πότῳ τὰ ἀφροδίσια, "lust being a consequent on the bacchanalia," says the scholiast† on Aristophanes. Hence is that of Aristippus,‡ ἐν βακχεύμασιν οὐδ' ἡ σώφρων οὐ διαφθερήσεται, "A chaste woman will not be corrupted at the bacchanalia:" and those precepts, that a married woman should abstain§ τοῖς ὀργιασμοῖς καὶ ματρωσμοῖς, "from the feasts of Bacchus, and the mother of the gods," because they tended to drunkenness, and the corrupting of chaste women.

[9] Ver. 14. Λέγει, He saith.] Epiphanius‖ saith these words were spoken by Elias; and Georgius Syncellus,¶ that they were taken from the apocryphal books of Jeremiah; others think they are cited from Isa. lx. 1. 19. 22, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, καὶ ἐπιφαύσει σοι ὁ Χριστός, and Christ shall enlighten thee, or shine upon thee:" and yet our translation, that "Christ shall give thee life," is very justifiable as giving the true sense of the metaphor: so Ps. xiii. 14, "Lighten my eyes, that I sleep not in death," i. e. preserve my life: Prov. xxix. 13, "The poor and rich meet together, the Lord enlighteneth both their eyes" (see Job iii. 20, xxxiii. 30). Mr. Dodwell, citing these words, saith, "Christ shall give thee light, is the same with the immortal light; and this is an address to the dead, who are frequently said to sleep, in the prophetic style of the New Testament; and the light seems to allude to the baptismal illumination of the Spirit, upon owning of the true faith:" but as in this he is singular, and hath not one authority, ancient or modern, agreeing with him in this interpretation, or to the application of it to Christ preaching to the dead in hades, and baptizing them; St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Photius, and Theophylact, among the Greek interpreters, Ambrose, or Hilary the deacon, and St. Jerome among the Latins, all saying positively, that the words are to be understood metaphorically of a sleep, and death in trespasses and sins; so is it also evident, that the words cannot bear this sense: for,

First, If "they that sleep," here signifies literally those whose bodies sleep in the grave, the address to them to rise from the dead, must be an address to their bodies to rise from the grave; and so they must be first raised from the dead before Christ gives them light.

Secondly, To "sleep," when it is used to signify death, in the New Testament, always relates to the body sleeping in 17 Wherefore be ye not unwise (in managing this and other affairs), but (act as) understanding what the will of the Lord is (viz. that in such cases he requires you to be as wise as serpents, and not to cast pearls before swine who will tear you from them; and sembably not to sacrifice your lives by an indiscreet zeal in discovering those mysteries, but to show the vileness of them with such prudence as may preserve you from perishing by the discovery).

the grave, or in the dust, as John v. 28, 29, 1 Cor. xi. 30, xv. 20. 51, 1 Thess. iv. 14, v. 10, and never to the soul in hades, or to the spirits in prison there: for, as Jerome notes on the place, spiritûs mortem nunquam legimus; "we never read in scripture of the death of the spirit" in the literal sense. And,

Thirdly, The preceding verses plainly show, that the apostle introduceth these words as a call to the gentiles, sitting in darkness, to awake out of their sleep in sin, their death in trespasses and sins (ii. 1. 5), that they might enjoy the light of Christ's gospel: for, saith he, ver. 8, "Ye were once darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord; walk as children of the light, and have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them," ver. 11, which you, who are "children of the light, and on whom God hath shined to give the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. iv. 6), may do; "for all that maketh manifest is light," ver. 13. Wherefore, λέγει, "the scripture saith" to those gentiles who are yet in darkness, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light:" so again, 1 Thess. v. 5, 6, "Ye are the children of the light, and of the day, not of the night, nor of darkness; therefore let us not sleep as others do" (see the note on Rom. xiii. 12). So Clemens Alexandrinus,* in his exhortation to the Gentiles, saith, ἀφυπνίζει γε τοι, καὶ τοῦ σκότους αὐτοῦ τοὺς πεπλανημένους ἀνίστησιν, "He, by his exhortation, raises out of sleep those that erred in and through darkness." See also the reading of the text confirmed, Examen Millii in locum.

[10] Ver. 16. Ἐξαγοραζόμενοι τὸν καιρὸν, Redeeming the time.] Here note,

First, That the times of peril and trouble are styled "evil days:" in this sense Jacob saith, his days were "evil," πονηραὶ ἡμέραι, by reason of the troubles he met with from Laban and his brother Esau, Gen. xlvii. 9; the psalmist, that the righteous shall not be ashamed, ἐν καιρῷ πονηρῷ, "in the evil day," lxxvii. 19; the wise man shall be silent, saith Amos, in that time, for it is, καιρὸς πονηρὸς, "an evil time," v. 13; i. e. "a time of lamentation," ver. 16, "of darkness," ver. 18; and that is by the prophet Micah styled, ὁ καιρὸς πονηρὸς, "an evil time," Micah ii. 2, which brought those judgments on them which they could not escape. And in the close of this epistle, to stand ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ πονηρᾷ, is to stand in the times of fiery trials and severe persecutions, by the instruments of Satan, vi. 13.

Ἐξαγοράζειν τὸν καιρὸν, To redeem the time,] Is, by all honest ways and prudent methods, to endeavour to avoid the dangers, and to escape the persecutions, to which these perilous times may render us obnoxious. So when king Nebuchadnezzar had threatened that the Chaldeans and magicians should be cut in pieces, if they declared not his dream, and they still put him off with this answer, "Let the king tell the dream, and we will tell him the interpretation:" the king replies, "Of a truth I know, ὅτι καιρὸν ὑμεῖς ἐξαγοράζετε, that you would gain the time;" i. e. you hope by these answers to delay the time of your punishment, and to contrive some way to escape it. So the scholiast upon the place expounds it, καιρὸν ὑμεῖς ἀγοράζετε, τουτέστιν ὑπέρθεσιν θεραθε διασκεδάσαι τῇ ἀναβολῇ τοῦ καιροῦ σκωτιοῦντες τὸ παρ' ὑμῶν ζητούμενον, "You hunt after delays; seeking, by the protracting of the time, to make me forget what I asked of you:" and Theodoret expounds it thus; "You prolong the time, τῆς ἐκβάσεως τὸν καιρὸν ἀναμένοντες, hoping for time to escape:" so also, Col. iv. 5, "Walk in wisdom towards those that are without," i. e. your heathen governors and magistrates, "redeeming the time;" i. e. endeavouring, by all Christian prudence, to avoid the calamities they are still ready to bring upon you, answering them with as much wisdom and gentleness of speech as you are able; for, walking among wolves, it concerns you to be "wise as serpents." And though it may be so pertinent to this text, yet will it be very profitable to the men of this age to consider the practice of the heathen in this case: for Ælian* informs us of the Lacedemonians, that they were much concerned that men should spend their time well, ταμιεύμενοι πανταχόθεν εἰς ἐπειγόμενα, "employing it still upon urgent business, and suffering no man either to be idle, or to employ himself about trifles, ὡς ἂν μὴ πρὸς τὰ ἔξω τῆς ἀρετῆς ἀναλισκόμενος, so that he might employ his whole time in virtuous actions:" and Stobæus† saith that the Lucani, a people of Italy, and the Athenians, punished those that were idle as well as those that were guilty, ἄλλου τινὸς ἀδικήματος, of any other crime. And seeing time is a talent given us by that God in whose hand our lives are, it must be given us for some good end, and must be misspent when it is not employed to such ends.

[11] Ver. 18. Μὴ μεθύσκεσθε οἴνῳ, Be not drunk with wine.] The heathens, who held drunkenness unlawful at other times, thought it a duty at the solemnity of Bacchus, and of other gods. Plato saith, that "no man should be allowed to be drunk, but at the solemnities of the god that gave them wine." And when Megillus, the Lacedemonian, had told the Athenians that he saw their whole cities drunk at the solemnities of Bacchus, and that the inhabitants of Tarentum did the same, "Marvel not at that," saith the Athenian, "for the law with us requires it:"‡ and Plutarch saith, that ὀργιάζοντες ἢ θυσίαις πάροντες, ἢ τελεταῖς, "when they celebrated the orgia of Bacchus, or were present at their sacrifices or sacred mysteries, they allowed themselves to be delighted, μέχρι μέθης, even to drunkenness." This was the usual appendix of their sacrifices, they thinking this a duty, saith Athenæus,§ in the service of their gods. Hence Aristotle and others say, that drunkenness had its name from the intemperance they used after they had offered sacrifice.

[12] Ἐν ᾧ ἐστιν ἀσωτία, In which is excess.] That ἀσωτία signifies luxury, is proved from the prodigal, of whom it being said, that he lived ἀσώτως, Luke xv. 13, this is interpreted, ver. 30, by "devouring his living with harlots;" and from Hesychius, who interprets ἀσώτως by the word αἰσχρῶς, "filthily." Phavorinus saith, the ἄσωτος is the ἀκόλαστος, ἀσελγὴς, "lustful and unchaste person;" and hence ἀσώτιον signifies a stew, or brothel-house. Now that this drunkenness ministers to this lasciviousness, as the poets often teach, so the practice and experience of the heathens found it true, their compotation and banquetings seldom concluding without the introduction of lewd women, and their bacchanalia ending in whoredom and adultery, ἀκόλαστον οἶνος, Prov. xx. 1.

20 Giving thanks [14] always for all things unto God and (or, who is) the Father (of us all, iv. 6) in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;

21 Submitting yourselves one to another (according to the divine ordinance) in the fear of God (who is the author of that order.

22 And therefore) Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the (ordinance of the) Lord (the husband of his spouse the church).

23 For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church: and (this) he is (as being) the saviour of the body.

24 Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every (lawful) thing.

25 (And ye) Husbands, (also, see that you) love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself (up to the death) for it;

27 That (so) he might present it to himself a glorious church, [16] not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish.

28 So ought men to love their wives [17] as their own bodies (they two being made one flesh; so that) he that loveth his wife loveth himself.

29 For no man ever yet hated his own flesh; but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as (doth) the Lord the church (which is his spouse):

30 For we are members of his body, [18] of his flesh, and of his bones.

31 For this cause (was it said at the production of Eve, and her being given for a meet-help to Adam, Gen. ii. 24, that) shall a man leave his father and mother, [19] and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh.

32 [20] This is a great mystery: but (when I represent

&c.] In their bacchanalia they sung their drunken hymns to Bacchus, saying, εἰοῖ Σαβοῖ, εὐοῖ Βακχέ, and had their φαλλικὰ ἄσματα. In opposition to which drunken and impure songs, the apostle here exhorts the Christians to sing the psalms of David, or the hymns composed by spiritual men, such as Zacharias and Simeon, or by the afflatus of the Spirit vouchsafed unto them, 1 Cor. xiv. 15. Jerome here saith, Canere igitur et psallere, magis animo quàm voce debemus, hoc est, quippe quòd dicitur 'cantantes, et psallentes in cordibus vestribus Domino.' Audiant hæc adolescentuli, audiant hi, quibus psallendi in ecclesiâ officium est, Deo non voce sed corde cantandum, nec tragœdorum ad modum guttur et fauces dulci medicamine colliniendas, ut in ecclesiâ theatrales moduli audiantur, et cantica, sed in timore, in opere, in scientiâ scripturarum; which shows that choristers, or choir-men, had then obtained an office in the church, though he seems not much to approve them.

[14] Ver. 20. Πάντοτε, Always.] See note on 1 Thess. v. 17; ὑπὲρ πάντων, "for all things;" for his sparing mercies, Ps. ciii. 3, 4, his preventing mercies, Eph. i. 4, Tit. i. 2, his distinguishing and peculiar mercies, Heb. ii. 16, for his common mercies and benefits bestowed daily upon us, as well as his extraordinary favours; for past mercies to be celebrated by annual festivals, Exod. xii. 14. 17. 24, Lev. xxiii. 21, for the mercies we hope for, 1 Pet. i. 3, 4, for adverse as well as prosperous events, blessing him who doth thus give us warning, Ps. xvi. 17, but chiefly for spiritual blessings.

[15] Ver. 26. Ἐν ῥήματι, By the word.] That is, saith Chrysostom, by the words used in the form of baptism; to wit, 'I baptize thee in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

[16] Ver. 27. Μὴ ἔχουσαν σπίλον, ἢ ῥυτίδα, Not having spot or wrinkle.] This seems to refer to the accuracy of the Jewish baptism, who thought not the person well baptized, if there were any wrinkle which kept the flesh from the water, or any spot or dirt which was not thoroughly washed by it. And thus the church is cleansed at present from the guilt of sin by the blood of Christ, 1 John i. 7, 2 Cor. xi. 2, Col. i. 22.

[17] Ver. 28. Ὡς ἑαυτῶν σώματα, As their own bodies.] The Jews say, "He that loveth his wife as his own body, and honoureth her more than his own body, of him the scripture saith, Peace shall be in his tabernacle, and he shall visit his tabernacle, and shall not sin" (Talmud. Sanh. fol. 76, 2).

[18] Ver. 30. Ἐκ τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐκ τῶν ὀστέων αὐτοῦ, Of his flesh, and of his bones.] This phrase being not only used to express an intimate relation, Gen. xxix. 14, Judg. ix. 2, but being the very words which Adam used concerning Eve, made out of his rib, Gen. ii. 23, shows that the apostle had his eye upon the mystical sense of the production of the woman from the man, of which the Jews speak.

[19] Ver. 31. Καὶ προσκολληθήσεται πρὸς τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ.] Jerome being an enemy to wedlock, insinuates that these words are an addition to the text; but the contrary is evident, they being found in all versions, all the Greek scholiasts, in the Codex Alex., and Hilary the deacon.

[20] Ver. 32. Τὸ μυστήριον τοῦτο μέγα ἐστὶν, This is a great mystery.] He doth not say as Mr. Clerc interprets the words, "But I speak concerning the love of Christ to his church;" nor was that any mystery at all, as being long ago revealed, and a thing known to all Christians. But this was indeed a mystery, till the apostle here revealed it to the Ephesians, that, as the learned Dr. Allix* saith, "The first match between Adam and Eve was a type of that between Christ and his church; and in this," saith he, "the apostle followed the Jewish notions; for the Jews say,† according to Voisin, 'The mystery of Adam is the mystery of Messiah,' who is the bridegroom of the church." These two great persons, therefore, confirm the observation of Munster, that "the creation of the woman from the rib of the man, was made by the Jews to signify the marriage of the celestial man, who is blessed, or of the Messiah, with the church;" whence the apostle applies the very words which Adam said concerning Eve his spouse, to those Christians, who are the spouse of Christ, saying, "We are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones," ver. 30. For the fuller explication of these words, note from the bishop of Ely,‡ "that the profoundest of the Hebrew divines, whom they now call cabbalists, having such a notion as this among them, that sensible things are but an imitation of things above, conceived from thence, that there was an original pattern of love and union, which is between a man and his wife in this world; this being expressed by the kindness of Tipheret and Malcuth, which are the names they give to the invisible bridegroom and bride in the upper world; and this Tipheret, or the great Adam, in opposition to the terrestrial and little Adam here below; as Malcuth (i. e. the kingdom) they call also by the name of cheneseth Israel, 'the congregation of Israel,' who is united, say they, to 'the celestial Adam,' as Eve was to the terrestrial. So that, in sum, they seem to say the same that the apostle doth, when he tells us that 'marriage is a great mystery; but he speaks concerning Christ and his church:' for the marriage of Tipheret and Malcuth, or cheneseth Israel, is the marriage of Christ, the Lord from heaven, with his spouse the church, which is the conjunction of Adam and Eve, and of all other men and women descended from them." Origen§ seems to have had some notice of the relation this passage had to Adam and Eve, when he speaks thus, "If any man deride us for using the example of Adam and Eve, in these words, 'And Adam knew his wife,' when we treat of the knowledge of God, let him consider these words, 'This is a great mystery.'" Tertullian frequently alludes to the same thing, saying, This is a great sacrament, carnalitèr in Adam, spiritualitèr in Christo, propter spirituales nuptias Christi et ecclesiæ; "carnally in Adam, spiritually in Christ, by reason of the spiritual marriage betwixt him and his church" (Exhort. ad Castitat. lib. v. p. 521; de Animâ, cap. 11, 12; et adv. Marcion. lib. iii. cap. 5).

CHAPTER VI.

1 Children, obey your parents [1] in (compliance with the commandment of) the Lord: for this is right (that you should yield obedience to them who gave you life.

2 For) Honour thy father and mother (with reverence, obedience, and maintenance, saith the fifth commandment); which is the first commandment (in the decalogue) [2] with (a) promise (annexed to it;

3 [3] And the promise is this,) That it may be well with thee, and (that) thou mayest live long on the earth.

4 And, ye fathers, provoke [4] not your children to wrath (by severe treatment and rigid injunctions: see Col. iii. 21): but (rather) [5] bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord (instructing them in the principles of piety towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus).

5 Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters (though they be only so) according to the flesh (the spirit being immediately subject to God alone), with fear (of displeasing them) and trembling (lest you justly should incur their anger, serving them) in singleness of your heart, as (knowing that in thus serving them, you do service) unto Christ (who requires this of you; whose gospel you will credit by your sincere obedience to your masters for his sake, Tit. ii. 2, and whose doctrine you will blaspheme by your disobedience, under pretence of any Christian liberty from the observance of your duty to them, 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2;

6 Serve them therefore) Not with eyeservice (and whilst they behold you), as menpleasers (use to do); but as (becomes) the servants of Christ, (in this relation) doing the will of God (who requires this obedience to them, 1 Pet. ii. 18—20) from the heart;

7 With good will doing (them) service, as (considering you do it) to the Lord (himself), and not to men (only):

8 (And) Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth (out of obedience to the Lord, a reward of) the same shall he receive [6] of the Lord, whether he be (a) bond (man) or free.

9 And, ye masters, do the same things unto them (show the like good-will to and concern for them), forbearing threatening (Gr. ἀνιέντες, remitting oft the evils which you threaten to them): [7] knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons (or conditions) with him.

10 Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might.

11 (And to this end) Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand (your ground) against [8] the wiles of the devil.

12 For we wrestle not (only) against flesh and blood (i. e. men who are compounded of them, see note on Gal. i. 16), but (also) against (evil) principalities, against powers (such as Christ triumphed over, Col. ii. 15), against the rulers of the darkness of this world (i. e. those evil spirits which still rule in those heathen nations which are yet in darkness, v. 8, 1 Thess. v. 5, see note on Rom. xiii. 12), against spiritual wickedness in high places (i. e. against those evil spirits which have their stations in the regions of the air: see note on ii. 2).

13 Wherefore (I again exhort you to) take unto you

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἐν Κυρίῳ, In the Lord.] That is, say Œcumenius and Theophylact, as far as their commandments are consistent with the will of God.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἐν ἐπαγγελίᾳ, With the promise.] i. e. A special promise; for that which is annexed to the second commandment, is rather a general assertion than a special promise.

[3] Ver. 3.] The apostle doth not add these words, "Which the Lord giveth thee;" because they particularly belonged to the Israelites, who were to be excluded from their own land, and he would give them no ground to think they should continue in it. Note also hence, that the gospel hath its temporal promises as well as spiritual, Matt. vi. 33, 1 Tim. iv. 8, 1 Pet. iii. 10—12. That this promise did not at all concern the Ephesians, is Mr. Clerc's mistake; for God is not the God of the Jews only, but also of the gentiles, and will reward moral duties performed by them as well as by the Jews.

[4] Ver. 4. Provoke not your children to anger.] By disinheriting them, by laying heavy burdens upon them, and using them rather as slaves than sons, but "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." For it is not, saith Aristides, a thing of a small consideration, what principles are put into them in their youth; but it is, τὸ πᾶν, the foundation of all they do hereafter. "And if lovers of horses, birds and dogs, are careful of their education; is it not just," saith Chrysostom, "that Christians should be more careful of the education of their children?" especially if they consider, that upon this education depends much their eternal state; and that they will contract the guilt of their eternal ruin, who neglect this duty.

[5] Ver. 4. Ἐκτρέφετε, Bring them up in the nurture.] This, saith Œcumenius, is the way to make them obedient; and if you furnish them with spirituals, temporal things will follow: "Make them read the scriptures," saith Theophylact, "which is the duty of all Christians; for is it not a shame to instruct them in heathen authors, whence they may learn bad things, and not to instruct them in the oracles of God?"

[6] Ver. 8. The same shall he receive of the Lord.] So that though he be not rewarded for the good he doth by his earthly and unbelieving master, he will, most certainly, be recompensed by his Lord Christ.

[7] Ver. 9. Εἰδότες, Knowing.] (1.) That you with respect to God are servants, and that as you mete to your servants he will mete to you. (2.) That his compassion and readiness to forgive your trespasses should make you also ready to remit the trespasses of your servants. (3.) That the relation of servants doth not make God less ready to show kindness to them, and own them as his children, and therefore should not induce us to despise and deal severely with them.

[8] Ver. 11. Τὰς μεθοδείας, The wiles.] That is, saith Phavorinus, ἐπιβουλὰς, ἐνέδρας, δόλους, the deceits he puts upon us, the snares he lays for us, the machinations he contrives against us.

[9] the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand (these dangerous enemies) in the evil day (of trial, persecution, and temptation), and having done all, to stand (firm against them).

14 Stand therefore, having your loins girt about [10] with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness;

15 [11] And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;

16 Above all (the rest), taking [12] the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked (one).

17 And take the [13] helmet of salvation (for a helmet the hope of salvation, 1 Thess. v. 8), and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God (by hiding which in your hearts you will be preserved from sin, Ps. cxix. 11):

18 Praying always (see 1 Thess. v. 17) with all prayer and supplication (1 Tim. ii. 1) in the Spirit (see note on 1 Cor. xiv. 6), and watching thereunto with all perseverance and (with) supplication (not for yourselves only, but) for all saints (your charity to others being a means to procure God's favour to yourselves);

19 And for me (in particular), [14] that (a door of) utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel,

20 For which I am an ambassador in bonds: that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak.

21 But (and) that ye also may know my affairs, and how I do (at Rome), Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in (the things of) the Lord, shall make known to you all things:

22 Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that ye might know our affairs, and that he might comfort your hearts.

23 Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

24 Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ [15] in sincerity. Amen.

[9] Ver. 13. Τὴν πανοπλίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ, The whole armour of God.] Here, and ver. 10, 11, which makes us "strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might," consists of such things as either are in us, as truth, faith, righteousness, peace, the hopes of salvation; or are to be used by us, as prayer, and attendance on the word of God; and not in any immediate influx of the power of God without the use of these. Yea, this is here styled, "the whole armour of God," nothing more being requisite to enable us to come off victors in this combat; so that in these things doth consist the power of his might; or by these it is certainly to be obtained.

That "the evil day" is the day of trial, and persecution, see note on v. 16.

[10] Ver. 14. Ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, With truth.] That the gospel is throughout the epistles emphatically styled "the truth," see note on Rom. ii. 8. And this seems to be the truth here mentioned, viz. a full persuasion of the truth of that religion we profess, or that steadfastness in the faith, by which we are enabled to resist the roaring lion (1 Pet. v. 8, 9, see 1 Thess. iii. 5, James i. 6). The "breast-plate of righteousness" is an exact observance of our duty to God, and a righteous deportment towards men, in all the offices of justice, truth, and charity, which will beget in us that good conscience which will support us in the day of temptation, and procure honour and esteem, love and compassion, from men. The phrase is taken from Isaiah lix. 18.

[11] Ver. 15. Ὑποδησάμενοι τοὺς πόδας, And your feet shod, &c.] For explication of this phrase observe, first, that shoes were anciently a part of military armour; for in the story of Goliath there is mention of his "greaves of brass upon his legs" (1 Sam. xvii. 6), and in the story of the Trojan wars, χαλκοκνημίδες Ἀχαιοί, "the Grecians which were shod with greaves of brass," are the armed Grecians. Note, secondly, that to "be shod" doth signify our being ready for the work we go about: thus the Israelites were commanded to eat the passover "shod," i. e. ready for their journey out of Egypt: and the apostles are required to be "shod with sandals," that they might be ready to go whither their Master should be pleased to send them (Mark vi. 8). "The gospel of peace" is either that gospel which proclaims peace with God, through faith in Christ, or which lays upon us the highest obligations to live peaceably with all men: so that the meaning of these words seems to be this, That ye may be ready for the combat, be ye shod with the gospel of peace, i. e. endeavour after that peaceable and quiet mind the gospel calls for; be not easily provoked or prone to quarrel, but show all gentleness and long-suffering to all men; and this will as certainly preserve you from many great temptations and persecutions, as did those shoes of brass the soldiers from those sharp sticks and gall-traps, which were wont to be laid privily in the ways, to obstruct the marching of the enemy.

[12] Ver. 16. Τὸν θυρεὸν τῆς πίστεως, The shield of faith.] That faith which is the confident "expectation of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen" (Heb. xi. 1,) "for this is the victory over the world, even our faith" (1 John v. 5).

[13] Ver. 17. Τὴν περικεφαλαίαν τοῦ σωτηρίου, The helmet of salvation.] i. e. We must be well assured, that if we "fight the good fight of faith," there will be "laid up for us an immortal crown of glory, which God the righteous judge will give us" (2 Tim. iv. 8): that he who cannot lie, hath promised "to him that overcometh, to eat of the tree of life" (Rev. ii. 7), to taste "the hidden manna" (ver. 17), to be "a pillar" in the new Jerusalem (Rev. iii. 12): that you strive and fight for "an incorruptible crown" that fadeth not away (1 Cor. ix. 25): and this hope will be as a helmet to defend your heads from all the strokes of a temptation. This in Isaiah lix. 17, is περικεφαλαία σωτηρίου, "the helmet of salvation upon the head."

[14] Ver. 19. Λόγος ἐν ἀνοίξει στόματος, That utterance may be given to me.] "A door of utterance," Col. iv. 6. This is a rabbinical phrase,* פתחון פה, "the opening of the mouth signifying an occasion of speaking, and confidence in speaking:" so that the apostle here requests their prayers, that he, being loosed from his bonds, may have again an opportunity of preaching the gospel, and also that he may do it publicly and plainly, μετὰ παῤῥησίας, "with due confidence and boldness."

[15] Ver. 24. Ἐν ἀφθαρσίᾳ, In sincerity.] i. e. Not only with a sincere love, uncorrupted by the opposite love of any lust forbidden by him; but with a constant and perpetual love, which no temptation can abate, or cause to cease, or to wax cold. Or, as Mr. L., without the mixture of those legal observations, by which the enemy, saith Paul, φθαρῇ, corrupts the minds of Christians from the simplicity of the gospel (2 Cor. xi. 3. See the note on i. 2).

EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

It is the observation of Theodoret, Œcumenius, and others, that Philippi was a city of Macedonia, under the metropolis of Thessalonica, which is confirmed, note on the first verse.

This epistle is by the same Greek scholiasts said to be written by Paul when he was in bonds at Rome. That he had been in bonds some time before, we may gather from i. 12. 14, from the Philippians sending Epaphroditus to him with relief, and his return to them with this epistle, after a dangerous sickness, and from his hopes to come quickly to them, ii. 24; and therefore he is supposed, by the most exact chronologers, to have writ this epistle in the eighth year of Nero, and the sixty-second of our Lord.

That the apostle here warns them against the Gnostics, or that "these Gnostics joined with the Judaizing Christians to persuade the gentiles to Judaize," I have not read in any of the ancients; but the Greek scholiasts agree in this, that he warns against* τὴν ἐξαπατὴν τῶν ἐξ Ἰουδαίων μὲν πεπιστευκότων, "the deceit of the believing Jews," who endeavoured to corrupt them, προφάσει τῆς σκιᾶς τοῦ νόμου, καὶ περιτομῆς, "by imposing on them circumcision, and the shadows of the law, and saying, that without these they could not be justified" (iii. 18, 19). And this is abundantly confirmed from the whole third chapter, where the apostle declares, he judges it for their safety to write to them to "beware of dogs, of evil-workers, and of the concision," and his styling them "the enemies of the cross of Christ," ver. 18 (see note on iii. 2, 3. 15, 16).

And, lastly, it is noted by Theodoret, and others of the fathers, that Epaphroditus, mentioned in this epistle as "their messenger" (ii. 15, and iv. 18), was also their bishop,† ὃς τῶν ψυχῶν αὐτῶν ἐπιστεύθη ἐπιμέλειαν, or "the person to whom the care of their souls had been committed;" though, I confess the words τὸν ἀπόστολον ὑμῶν, "your apostle," do not prove it.

* Theod. Chrys. Theoph. † Ibid.

CHAPTER I.

1 [1] Paul and Timotheus, the servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at (Gr. in) Philippi, [2] with the bishops and deacons (there:

2 I wish) Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 (And) I (Paul) thank my God upon every remembrance of you (in my prayers),

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1.] Note, that Timothy is here joined with Paul in the salutation, not in the writing this epistle (see ver. 3).

[2] Σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις, With the bishops and deacons.] Various are the expositions of these words, and great are the contentions about the true import of them. For,

1. Some, with the Pseud-Ambrosius, interpret these words thus: "Paul and Timothy, the servants of Jesus Christ, with the bishops and deacons that are with us, to the saints in Philippi." But as none of the Greek fathers thought fit to take any notice of this strained exposition, so may the harshness of it appear by comparing it with the like prefaces to some of the other epistles; v. g. 1 Cor. i. 1, 2, "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the church of God that is at Corinth, σὺν πᾶσι τοῖς ἐπικαλουμένοις τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου, with all that call upon the name of the Lord;" 2 Cor. i. 1, "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the church of God that is at Corinth, σὺν τοῖς ἐν ὅλῃ τῇ Ἀχαΐᾳ, with all the saints that are in all Achaia," are places exactly parallel to these words, "Paul and Timothy, the servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints that are in Philippi, with the bishops and deacons:" and yet can any man think, that Paul the apostle, with all that call upon the name of the Lord Christ, or with all the saints that were in all Achaia, writ to the church of Corinth, which was part of that Achaia? (2.) When the apostle takes in those that were with him as copartners in writing to another church, he doth it thus, "Paul an apostle καὶ οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ πάντες ἀδελφοί, and all the brethren that are with me," write to the churches of Galatia, Gal. i. 1. 3. Had he then intended to greet the Philippians in the like manner, he would have writ in the like style, "Paul and Timothy, καὶ οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ ἐπίσκοποι καὶ διάκονοι, and the bishops and deacons that are with me," to the church in Philippi.

The learned Dr. Hammond saith, that Philippi was a metropolis, which had many bishops under it, on which account it is styled, πρώτη τῆς μερίδος τῆς Μακεδονίας πόλις, "the chief city of that part of Macedonia," Acts xvi. 12, and by Photius, τῆς Μακεδόνων ἐπαρχίας μητρόπολις, "the metropolis of the province of the Macedonians." And "by this," saith he, "it appears, that in Philippi there might be more bishops than one, even as many as there were cities under that metropolis." But this solution was,

First, Unknown to the ancient fathers, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Jerome, who all contend that "bishops here must signify presbyters, because there could not be more bishops than one, properly so called, in one city;" whereas had they known this to have been a metropolis, they must have known that this had been a satisfactory answer to that objection.

Secondly, They tell us, that Philippi was then under the metropolis of Thessalonica, which was the metropolis of all Macedonia. Thus Chrysostom on these words, iv. 16, "When I was in Thessalonica ye ministered to my necessity," &c., observes, this was a great encomium of the Philippians, that ἐν μητροπόλει καθήμενος παρὰ τῆς μικρᾶς ἐτρέφετο πόλεως, "being in the metropolis, he was nourished by a little city." Thus Theodoret,* in his preface to this epistle, saith, Φιλιππήσιοι τῆς Μακεδονίας ἦσαν ὑπὸ μητρόπολιν τότε Θεσσαλονίκην, "The Philippians were inhabitants of Macedonia under the metropolis of Thessalonica:" and Theophylact, that they were, ὑπὸ μητρόπολιν τότε Θεσσαλονίκην τελοῦντες,

* Apud Œcum.

4 Always in every prayer of mine for you all making request with joy,

5 (Which joy I have) For your [3] fellowship in the gospel from the first day until now (i. e. for your continuance in the faith and the profession of the gospel);

6 [4] Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work (the good work of faith) in (or among) you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ:

7 Even as it is meet for me to think this of you all (Gr. τοῦτο φρονεῖν, to have this care for you all, which I show in my prayers, and my continual remembrance of you, ver. 4), [5] because I have you in my heart (or you have me in your heart); inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the then, when the apostle writ this to them, "under the metropolis of Thessalonica." That Thessalonica was then the metropolis of Macedonia, is plain from Antipater, the Thessalonian poet, who flourished in the time of Augustus Cæsar, and calleth Thessalonica* "the mother of all Macedonia." It is called also "the metropolis of Macedonia" by Socrates: and in the ecclesiastical sense it is so called by Ætius,† the bishop thereof, in the council of Sardica: and so say all the Notitiæ Antiquæ, at the end of Carolus Paulus, who saith that Philippi was no metropolis for the first six centuries; but after that Macedonia was divided into Prima and Secunda, it came to have the honorary title of the metropolitan city, and therefore might be styled so by Photius, who lived in the ninth century: but by Luke it is not styled the first city, τῆς ἐπαρχίας, "of the province;" but τῆς μερίδος, "of that part of Macedonia" which they that came from Thrace thither touched at; as appears by Dion's‡ description of it, and chiefly from Diodorus Siculus,§ who saith, ἡ δὲ πόλις αὐτὴ κειμένη κατὰ τῆς Θράκης, that "this city," being taken by Philip, was very serviceable to him, as "lying near Thrace," and other places very conveniently.

Thirdly, The Greek and Latin fathers do with one consent declare, that τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους οὕτως ἐκάλεσε, "the apostle here calls their presbyters their bishops." So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, among the Greeks, and among the Latins, Jerome,‖ Pseud-Ambrosius,¶ Pelagius, and Primasius; and that not only for the aforementioned reason, that "there could be but one bishop properly so called in one city;" but for another alleged by them all, that τέως ἐκοινώνουν τοῖς ὀνόμασι, "then the names were common to both orders," the bishops being called presbyters, and the presbyters bishops. And this, saith Theodoret, is manifest in this place, because "he adds here deacons to the bishops, making no mention of their presbyters." The learned Dr. Pearson therefore seems δουλεύειν τῇ ὑποθέσει, too much to favour his own hypothesis, when, against all these testimonies both of Greek and Latin fathers, he saith, "It is not yet proved, that there was then at Philippi any presbyters of the second order;" for surely this is proved from the authority of all these fathers. He therefore saith, (1.) That before the converted Jews and gentiles did unite into one church, there were two bishops of the same church. This he proves from those words of Epiphanius,†† "Alexandria never had two bishops at a time, ὡς αἱ ἄλλαι ἐκκλησίαι, as other churches had:" but if I am not much mistaken, this relates not to the primitive and apostolic time, but to the times of the Meletians, who founded bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and by them ἐκκλησίας ἰδίας, "private churches," calling them "churches of the martyrs;" whereas those of Peter's party called theirs catholic churches. But though this schism continued long, and even in the time of Theodoret prevailed in Egypt, and, as Danæus notes, infected almost all Christian regions; yet, saith Epiphanius, it never so prevailed in Alexandria as in other churches, there being never there two bishops, one of the catholic, another of the Meletian churches, as there were in many other places: and if this be the true import of these words, it is easy to discern how impertinent they are to the true exposition of this place. He adds also from the same Epiphanius, that Paul and Peter were both apostles and bishops of Rome, as doubtless they also were at Antioch, and wherever they met; but they were only bishops there, because apostles there, one of the Jews, the other of the gentiles, and in this they had no successors. Jerome* indeed takes notice of this evasion, but then he lays the censure of contentious persons upon them that made it.

The same learned bishop adds, That were it true, that there were but one bishop in one city, it would not follow that the word "bishops" here could not be taken in the proper sense, because the apostle doth not here call them bishops of the church or city of Philippi, but only saith, they were then at Philippi; he might write therefore to them whom he knew to be then at Philippi, though they were bishops of other churches. But, (1.) as none of the ancients have ever said one word of any other bishops than those met at Philippi, so the words seem not well consistent with this evasion; for writing τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Φιλίπποις, he doubtless writes "to the saints dwelling in Philippi;" writing therefore to them with the bishops and deacons, he must be supposed to write also to the bishops and deacons dwelling at Philippi.

I therefore acquiesce in the opinion of Theodoret, who says, that Paul then writ to the presbyters and deacons of that city, because their bishop Epaphroditus, whom he styles his brother and companion in labour, and fellow-soldier, and their apostle, was then with him at Rome, ii. 25, and that he therefore mentions them, because they were so instrumental in sending the contributions to him, mentioned iv. 15.

[3] Ver. 5. Κοινωνία.] That "fellowship;" for that κοινωνία here doth not signify their liberality towards the propagation of the gospel, but their communion with the apostles in the gospel, as it doth, 1 John i. 3. 7, I gather (1.) from the phrase ἔργον ἀγαθὸν, which is emphatically put to signify τὸ ἔργον πίστεως, "the work of faith;" as when we are said, καὶ' ὑπομονὴν ἔργου ἀγαθοῦ, "by patient continuance in the good work to seek for glory," Rom. ii. 7, that "being the work of God that we should believe in his Son," John vi. 29. (2.) From the phrase, "He that hath begun the good work in you, will perform it to the day of the Lord Jesus Christ," that being still used by the apostle to testify his hopes, that they would continue steadfast in faith and obedience, till they received their crown, 1 Cor. i. 8, 1 Thess. iii. 13, v. 23.

[4] Ver. 6. Πεποιθὼς αὐτὸ τοῦτο, Being confident, &c.] This the apostle speaks, not out of any opinion of the election of all the Philippians to eternal life, or of the certainty of their perseverance to the end by virtue of that election; for then why doth he exhort them to "work out their salvation with fear and trembling," ii. 12; "to stand fast in the Lord," iv. 1; and to "retain the word of life, that he might have joy in the day of Christ, that he had not run in vain, or laboured in vain among them?" (ii. 16.) He speaks this therefore from a judgment of charity, ἀπὸ τῶν παρελθόντων καὶ περὶ τῶν μελλόντων στοχαζόμενος, conjecturing, saith Theophylact, from what was past, what they would be for the future; because, saith he, it seems just or fit for me to conceive this good hope of you, by reason of that great affection you retain to me, and your patience in enduring the like afflictions: now he that only gives these reasons of his confidence, gives us just reasons to conceive, he knew nothing of the necessity of their perseverance by virtue of any absolute election to salvation.

[5] Ver. 7.] i. e. Because you have had your hearts upon me in my bonds, sending Epaphroditus to minister to me in my necessities (ii. 25), and contributing of your own substance to me (iv. 14), sending once and again to me, whilst I was in bonds for the defence of the faith (ver. 15, 16), gospel, ye all are partakers of my grace; (Gr. as those who are all my copartners of grace in my bonds, &c.

8 And of this my care for you I can call God to witness:) For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ (or the most passionate degree of Christian love).

9 And this I pray (for you), that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all [6] judgment;

10 That ye may approve (the) things that are excellent; [7] that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ,

11 [8] Being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are (taught) by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God.

12 But (to proceed to my own affairs, about which you have been so solicitous, ver. 7) I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me (through the malice of my adversaries) have fallen out rather unto the furtherance (than the hinderance) of the gospel;

13 So that my bonds in (and for the cause of) Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places (i. e. it is manifest not only in the palace, but throughout all Rome, that I am in bonds for the faith of Christ);

14 [9] And many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my (patience and courage in my) bonds, are (become) much more bold to speak the word (of God) without fear.

15 Some indeed (there are who) preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good will (and kind affection to me and to the gospel):

16 The one (party) preach Christ of contention, not sincerely, (not from love to him, but disaffection towards me,) supposing (by this means) to add affliction to my bonds (or to bring farther tribulation on me now in bonds):

17 But the other (party preach Christ out) of love (to him, and me his servant), knowing that I am set (or lie in bonds) for the defence of the gospel.

18 What then? (shall this afflict me? No, since) notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Christ is (still) preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

19 For I know that this shall (be so far from accomplishing their end of adding tribulation to my bonds, that it shall) turn to my salvation (i. e. my deliverance) through your prayer (for me), and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, (enabling me to plead so as shall tend to my enlargement, ver. 25,)

20 According to my earnest expectation and my hope, that (through the assistance of the Spirit of courage which God hath promised and given to us, 2 Tim. i. 7) in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always (hitherto), so now also [10] Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by (my) life (now), or by (my) death (hereafter).

21 For (the motive) to me to live is (the service of) Christ, and to die (for him) is (my greatest) gain.

22 But if (it happen that) I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour (Gr. is worth my labour): yet what I shall choose [11] I wot not (i. e. were it left to my choice, I should be in a strait which of the two conditions to choose).

23 For I am in a strait betwixt (these) two, having a desire [12] to depart, and to be with Christ; which is those things, which, being "a sweet savour, a sacrifice acceptable and well-pleasing to God" (ver. 18), confirm my hope concerning you; especially when I find you yet standing firm under the like afflictions, "having the same conflict which you saw in me," when I was among you (Acts xvi.), "and now hear to be in me" (i. 30).

[6] Ver. 9. Ἐν πάσῃ αἰσθήσει.] The outward senses being the instruments by which we discern and distinguish material objects; the word αἴσθησις, which is here rendered "judgment," is from them derived to the mind discerning and passing judgment on spiritual things; and is by Phavorinus styled ἡ νοὸς γεῦσις ἀκριβὴς τῶν διακρινομένων, "the exact taste of things that differ, or are to be discerned by the mind:" in which sense the word is often used by the LXX., especially in the book of Proverbs, where it is twenty times so used; and hence it bears the like sense in the apostle; and they, who have this exactness of judgment, are said to have αἰσθητήρια, "senses exercised" to discern betwixt good and evil (Heb. v. 14).

[7] Ver. 10. Ἵνα ἦτε εἰλικρινεῖς, καὶ ἀπρόσκοποι.] Εἰλικρινεῖς πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν, ἀπρόσκοποι κατ' ἄνθρωπον, "Sincere in their deportment towards God, inoffensive in their behaviour towards man."

[8] Ver. 11.] For all that Christ does as a prophet sent from God, or as assuming the person of a mediator, must refer ultimately to the glory of the Father (ii. 11).

[9] Ver. 14—18.] For explication of these four verses, let it be noted in the general, that they, who preached Christ ἐξ ἐριθείας, "out of contention," did not preach Christ, or the gospel in truth, and out of love to it (ver. 17, 18), but only in pretence, or upon this occasion, from strife and envy against Paul, being grieved that he had free liberty of preaching Christ to all that came to him for two years (Acts xxviii. 30), and also that they did not acknowledge Paul to be "set up," or by God appointed for the defence and propagation of the gospel. Whence it appears, that they could be only the persons who did contend with Paul for the glory of being the most diligent and successful promoters of the gospel; or as such, envying the apostle's glory, set up for themselves, boasting as if they were the only publishers of the gospel: but yet it is difficult to assign the persons here intended by Paul: Œcumenius and Theophylact say, they were the unbelieving Jews, who, by divulging every where about Rome what was the doctrine of Christianity which Paul preached; how opposite it was to the Roman gods and their worship; what tumults it had caused; how many it had turned from their old religion to the faith of Christ; and who he was in whom the Christians did believe; thought to enrage the emperor against Paul, the great promoter of this doctrine: and in this, say they, might Paul rejoice, as giving occasion to others to inquire into the Christian faith, and so to come unto it; for, saith Tertullian, desinunt odisse quod desinunt ignorare; "when they once know they cease to hate it;" but such cannot be said to preach Christ without an intolerable catachresis; nor can Paul be supposed to rejoice in such a representation of the Christian faith as they made. Others therefore say, with a greater likelihood, these were the Judaizing Christians, who with the gospel taught the observation of the law; for from these arose ἐριδες καὶ διχοστασίαι, "strife and dissensions," 1 Cor. i. 11, iii. 3, "zeal, animosities, and contentions," 2 Cor. xii. 20, and that on the account of this apostle, whom they would scarce own as an apostle of Christ, 2 Cor. vii. 2, but rather looked upon as one that "walked according to the flesh," x. 2, and would have "excluded him" from the churches, Gal. iv. 16, 17, and yet at their preaching Christ, though not sincerely, the apostle may be supposed to rejoice, because he knew the time was near when the "hay and stubble" they built on the foundation should be revealed, and the destruction of the temple and city of Jerusalem would sufficiently confute their vain additions to the faith.

[10] Ver. 20. Ἐν τῷ σώματί μου, Christ shall be magnified by me in my body.] For if I live in the body, the power of Christ will be magnified in delivering me out of so great danger: but if I be put to death for his sake, that power will be magnified which enables me so cheerfully to die for the faith, as I am ready to do.

[11] Ver. 22. Οὐ γνωρίζω, I know not.] Ἅπαξ λεγόμενον ἐν τούτῳ τῷ σημαινομένῳ. This γνωρίζω, saith J. Gregory, is but once used in this sense; which is true, if he confines this to the New Testament. But Phavorinus mentions another Gregory who used it in this sense; and Constantine says it occurs thus in Isocrates and Lucian.

[12] Ver. 23. Πολλῷ μᾶλλον κρεῖσσον, To depart and to be far better (for me than continuing here, were I only to respect my own interest):

21 Nevertheless (for me) to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.

25 And having this confidence (that you will receive this advantage by my abiding in the flesh), I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance (in) and joy of faith;

26 That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me by (or through) my coming to you again.

27 Only let (this be your care, that) your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ: that whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear (a comfortable account) of your affairs, that ye stand fast [12] in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel;

28 And (being) in nothing terrified by (the threats and persecutions of) your adversaries: which is to them an evident token of (your) perdition (viz. that you are an obstinate people, bent on your own ruin), but to you (it is a token) of salvation, and that of God, (it being righteous with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you, but to you rest, 2 Thess. i. 5.)

29 For [14] unto you it is given (by God as an especial favour) in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake;

30 Having the same conflict (with the enemies of the faith) which ye saw in me (when I was among you, Acts xvi. 23, 1 Thess. ii. 2), and now hear to be in me (ver. 16).

with Christ, which is much better.] "Because," saith Crellius, "the time betwixt death and the resurrection is not to be reckoned, therefore the apostle might speak thus, though the soul hath no sense of any thing after death." But could Paul think a state of insensibility much better than a life tending so much as his did, to the glory of God, to the propagation of the gospel, and the furtherance of the joy of Christians? Could he call such an insensate state, a being "with Christ," and a "walking by sight," in opposition to the life of faith? (2 Cor. v. 7, 8). Others say the apostle speaketh thus because he expected that the general resurrection, and the day of judgment, should be in his time: but the words will not bear this sense; for the apostle saith, he is in a constraint betwixt these two, whether he should choose that life which would enable him to gain many to Christ, and minister greatly to the necessities of his church; or that which would cause him to live with Christ, viz. as to his better part, i. e. whether his body and soul should be dissolved, or he should live in the flesh. Now it is impossible that the same man, at the same time, should expect the resurrection and the day of judgment, and yet expect to live in the flesh, and to abide with the church in the flesh, when none of the members of the church should abide in the flesh, but should enjoy that resurrection which would place them with Christ, as well as himself; that he should desire his soul should be dissolved, or separated from the body, that he might be present with the Lord, and yet at the same time expect that day when he should be clothed upon with his celestial body. Moreover, he himself informs us, that the apostles expected only the resurrection, when other Christians should arise, at the great day; for thus he speaks, "He that raised up the Lord Jesus from the dead, will raise us also by him, and will present us with you," 2 Cor. iv. 14, and this confutes their gloss, who say the apostle expected to be with Christ, as an especial privilege belonging to him as an apostle, or a martyr for Christ (see the note on 2 Cor. v. 8).

[13] Ver. 27. In one spirit, with one mind.] That is, with love and concord, saith Œcumenius (see note on 1 Cor. i. 10, 11), or with full consent: so ψυχῇ μίᾳ, 1 Chron. xii. 38; so in Irenæus, lib. i. cap. 3, to act, συμφώνως, "with one accord and consent," is to act as having, μίαν ψυχὴν, καὶ τὴν αὐτὴν καρδίαν, καὶ ἓν στόμα, "one soul, heart, and mouth."

[14] Ver. 29. To you it is given not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for his name.] Where note, (1.) that to suffer for Christ's sake is, χάρις, "grace and favour," ver. 7; it is a gift which is matter of great joy, Matt. v. 12, Rom. v. 13, James i. 2. (2.) That they who, from these words, "To you it is given to believe," infer, that faith is so far the gift of God as that men are purely passive in it, have as much reason to infer that we suffer for the name of Christ without the concurrence of our own wills both being said to be equally given.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 3. Let each esteem, &c.] This refers not to judgment, it being not in our power always thus to esteem of others, but to practice; as if he should have said, Be as ready to assist and help others, as if you were their subjects and inferiors: so the example of Christ requires, and so the precept runs, that "he who is the greatest should be a servant" to others.

[2] Ver. 6. Ἐν μορφῇ Θεοῦ, In the form of God.] By this expression most interpreters do understand, that the apostle doth intend Christ was essentially and truly God; but though this be a certain truth, yet I conceive this cannot be the import of this expression in this place.

First, Because the apostle exhorteth his Philippians to humility, after the example of our Lord: now humility consists not in the change of nature, but of condition; and therefore his exinanition of the form of God seems rather to respect our Lord's condition, than his nature.

Secondly, There is no more reason to say, "the form of God" signifies the essence of God, than that "the form of a servant" signifies the essence of a servant; but evident it is, that "the form of a servant" doth not signify the essence, but the state and the condition of a servant, which is a mere relation; nor doth his manumission change his nature, but his state.

Thirdly, According to this import of the phrase, it cannot well be shown how he did "empty himself," or lay aside this form: for though by taking of a body, he concealed, yet could he not be said to empty himself of, or lay aside, the Godhead; especially when in that body he gave such numerous and signal demonstrations of divine power and wisdom, both in his miracles, his doctrine and knowledge of the hearts of men.

Fourthly, This word μορφὴ, "form," both in the Old and New Testament, doth often signify the external shape: as when it is said of Belshazzar,* Dan. v. 6. 10, and of Daniel,† vii. 28, that their "forms were changed;" of Nebuchadnezzar, that‡ "his form returned to him," Dan. iv. 46; of Christ, that he appeared to two of his disciples, ἐν ἑτέρᾳ μορφῇ, "in another form," Mark xvi. 12, and that μετεμορφώθη, "he was transfigured" before three of them, Matt. xvii. 2; but it nowhere seems to signify the essence of a man either in the Old or the New Testament.

Grotius and the Socinians say, that Christ is said to be "in the form of God," by reason of the miracles he wrought on earth, they being indications of the power of God residing in him. But this interpretation cannot stand. For,

First, Christ is here plainly said to have been "in the form of God," before he took upon him "the form of a servant," or the similitude of a man; for as these words, "being found in the fashion of a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death," do show that he was "found in the fashion of a man" before "he humbled himself to become obedient to the death;" so, by parity of reason, these words, "Being in the form of God, &c., he emptied himself, and took upon him the form of a servant, being found in the likeness of man," do show that he was first in the form of God, before that, being found in the likeness of man, he took upon him the form of a servant.

Secondly, It is plainly here asserted, that Christ "emptied himself" of this "form of God" at his humiliation; whereas he never laid aside his power of working miracles, but did continue to exert it to his death.

Thirdly, This power of miracles is never in the scripture styled "the form of God;" and were this all that was intended by that phrase, both Moses and Elias, and our Lord's apostles, might upon that account be said to have been "in the form of God;" seeing both Moses and Elias wrought many miracles on earth, and Christ declared concerning his disciples, that they should work "greater miracles than those which he had done," John xiv. 12.

I therefore by this "form of God," do understand that glorious form in which God on his throne is represented; that majesty in which he is said to appear in scripture, and in which the Λόγος, or the Word, did show himself of old to Moses and the patriarchs. For explication of this sense, I shall show, (1.) how God in the Old Testament is represented as appearing, showing his form and glory to the sons of men.

Secondly, That Christ did in this form appear to Moses and the patriarchs of old.

Thirdly, That since our Lord's ascension he hath been invested with the form of God, he hath appeared in it, and hath declared it belongs to him; though, for the time of his humiliation, he was pleased to dispose, or put it off. And,

First, The appearance or similitude of God is represented in the Old Testament in a bright shining cloud or light, a flame of fire, or the attendance of a host of angels. Thus in that vision of the prophet Daniel, "The Ancient of days did sit; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire; a stream of fire did issue from before him, thousand of thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him," Dan. vii. 9, 10. Thus God appeared on mount Sinai, where his presence was attended with a host of angels, according to that saying of the psalmist, "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels, and the Lord is among them as in Sinai," Ps. lxviii. 17, where the Targum adds, "The Word of the Lord desired to place his majesty upon it;" Jehovah dwelleth only in the heaven of heavens for ever. He appeared there also in a bright shining cloud, or flame of fire; for "the glory abode upon mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days, and the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire," Exod. xxiv. 16, 17. And seeing of these majestic symbols, is to see God, ver. 12, to "see the God of Israel," ver. 10; that is, say Onkelos and Jonathan, "the glory of God." And when Moses doth again repeat the decalogue he adds these words, Deut. v. 22. 24, "The Lord spake to all your assembly in the mount, out of the midst of the fire of the cloud: and you said, Behold, the Lord God hath shown us his glory, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire. We have seen this day that God doth talk with man, and he liveth."—"The Word of the Lord our God showed the divine majesty of his glory," saith the Targum of Jonathan; and "We heard the voice of his words," saith Onkelos. And the prophet Habakkuk, in his song of God, saith thus, "His glory covered the heavens, his brightness was as the light, and bright beams came out of his side," Hab. iii. 3, 4. There he discovereth "his Shechinah," i. e. "his glorious majesty," saith the Targum. When Jacob had a vision of angels ascending and descending, he presently cries out, "This is no other than the house of God; this is the gate of heaven: surely Jehovah is in this place; and I knew it not," Gen. xxviii. 17; שכינתי דיי, "The glory of the Lord is here," say the Targums. And when God showed himself to the people in the cloud, then did the glory or similitude of God appear, as the expression is, Numb. xii. 8, τὴν δόξαν Κυρίου, "The glory of the Lord," saith the Septuagint; so 1 Kings viii. 11. Thus doth the scripture represent that God who dwelleth in light inaccessible, before whose face the angels do continually stand as ministering spirits. And this also is the rabbinical exposition of the כבוד דיי,* "the glory of the Lord;" that it is either a ray of divine light, or a guard of angels.

Secondly, That Christ was in the form of God, even before he took upon him human nature, will be apparent, if we consider, that even before he purged our sins, he was "the brightness of his Father's glory," light of light, Heb. i. 3, and, in the language of the book of Wisdom, "A pure stream flowing from the glory of the Almighty, the brightness of the everlasting light," Wisd. vii. 25, 26, and that he at the conclusion of his humiliation prays, that God would "glorify him with the glory, which he had with him before the foundation of the world," John xvii. 5. (2.) That it was the opinion both of the ancient Jews and of the Christians, from the beginning, that it was the Λόγος, or the Messiah, who appeared to the patriarchs of old in light and splendour, and sometimes with the attendance of holy angels. And, (3.) that we have great evidence of this matter, both in the Old and New Testament. In the books of Exodus and Numbers we read, that the children of Israel tempted the Lord, saying, "Is the Lord among us, or not?" Exod. xvii. 7, Numb. xxi. 6, and that the Lord sent therefore fiery serpents among them; but in the tenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, we are informed that "they tempted Christ, and were destroyed of serpents." See this reading justified, note on 1 Cor. x. 9. Christ, therefore, as to his divine nature, was then present with, and tempted by them. God also saith to his people thus, Exod. xxiii. 20. 23, "Behold, I send an angel before thee to keep thee in thy way, and to bring thee to the place which I prepared. Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not; he will not pardon your transgressions: for my name is in him." Now the ancient rabbins† say, this was "the Angel, the Redeemer;" or an uncreated angel, in whom was Jehovah: and the words plainly seem to intimate this to us, seeing the power of remitting sins, ascribed here to him, belongeth only to that God against whom they were committed. Moreover, when God, being incensed against Israel for making the golden calf, had threatened to withdraw himself, and only send an angel before them to drive out the inhabitants of Canaan before them, Exod. xxxiii. 2, this seems an evil word to the people, and they mourn because of it, viz. of those words, "I will not go up in the midst of thee;" that is, say Onkelos and Jonathan, "I will not cause שכינתי, my glorious presence to go up with thee." Nor doth Moses himself rest in this answer, but speaks thus to God, "If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence," ver. 15; "If the Shechinah go not with us," saith Onkelos, εἰ μὴ αὐτὸς σὺ, "If thou thyself go not with us," say the Septuagint, R. Salomon, and Aben Ezra: which sense the following words require, "For wherein shall it be known that I and thy people have found grace in thy sight, is it not in that thou goest with us?" ver. 16. Whence it is evident, that they were not contented with the promise of a created angel, but peared to the patriarchs), [3] thought it not robbery to be [4] equal with God (Gr. did not covet to appear as God):

7 But (divesting himself of his former glory) made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the [5] form of a servant (by ministering to others), and required God's presence to go with them; and that God granted this request, ver. 17. Thus Philo Judæus* often informs us, that the angel who went before them was no created angel, but the divine Word, or God himself: "For," saith he, "Moses prays to God himself to be his governor, in the way that leadeth to himself, saying, If thou go not with us, carry us not up hence." And again, "He uses the divine Word for a guide, for so speaks the oracle, Behold, I will send my angel before thy face, to lead thee in the way," Exod. xxiii. 20.

Thirdly, That after his ascension to the right hand of majesty and glory, the Lord Christ did again reassume this form, and appear in his majestic splendour, is evident from the New Testament: thus he appeared to Stephen, who, looking up steadfastly to heaven, "saw the glory of God, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God," Acts vii. 55. Thus he appeared to a persecuting Saul, in "a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, saying to him, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest," Acts xxvi. 13. Thus in the vision of John, Rev. i. 14. 16, "His eyes were as a flaming fire, and his countenance as the sun shining in its strength." Thus he declared he would appear at the destruction of Jerusalem, to punish that rebellious people, "The Son of man," saith he, "will come in the glory of his Father, with his holy angels," Matt. xvi. 27, Luke ix. 26. 28. And his second advent shall be with the same tremendous glory, for "he shall be then revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire," 2 Thess. i. 7, 8.

Fourthly, Seeing then this splendour, and this attendance of holy angels, is represented in scripture as the similitude, the shape, the face, and majestic presence of God; seeing it is evident, before the incarnation, the Λόγος, or divine Word, had this glory, and in it did appear to Moses and the patriarchs, and that in order to the exercise of a regal power over his church; seeing it is certain from the New Testament, that after his ascension he again reassumed this form and power, it is highly probable this was the form of God here mentioned; this was the likeness to God in which, at his humiliation, he "did not covet to appear," but rather chose to lay it aside, that so he might appear amongst us, not as the Lord of heaven, attended with a host of angels, or in the dazzling brightness of his Father's glory, but in the fashion of a man.

[3] Οὐχ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ, Thought it no robbery to be equal with God.] This Greek phrase is only to be met with in Plutarch, saith Grotius (though I cannot find it there), and in Heliodorus; in which writer it plainly signifies, to "covet earnestly," or look upon a thing as much to be desired, and snatched at. Thus when Cybele went about to allure Theagenes to the lustful embraces of Arsace, finding him out of the temple, in a bye apartment, she did† ἅρπαγμα ποιεῖν τὴν ξυντυχίαν, i. e. "she snatched at the occasion," or looked upon it as a thing desirable for her purpose; and when none of her proposals or allurements would prevail with Theagenes to gratify the queen's desires, she brake forth into this admiration,‡ "What adverseness from love is this! A young man in the flower of his age thrusts from him, or refuses a woman like unto himself, and desirous of him, καὶ οὐχ ἅρπαγμα οὐδὲ ἔρμαιον ἡγεῖται τὸ πράγμα, and does not look upon this as a great offer, and a thing very desirable:" and when she had found out that his affection to Chariclea was the cause of this averseness, she proposes to Arsace the death of Chariclea, as an expedient to gain his affection, and§ ἅρπαγμα τὸ ῥηξεῖν ἐποιήσατο ἡ Ἀρσάκη, "Arsace embraces the motion as a thing very desirable, or to be coveted." So that ἅρπαγμα ἡγεῖσθαι, saith Semidius, is rem optatam persequi, et studiosissimè occupare.

[4] Τὸ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ.] Is to be, or appear as God, or in the likeness of God: so the word ἴσα is adverbially used frequently in the Septuagint, answering to the Hebrew כ, Job v. 14, "They grope in the noon-day, ἴσα νυκτί, as in the night," x. 10, "Hast thou not curdled me, ἴσα τυρῷ, as cheese;" xi. 12, "Man is born, ἴσα ὄνῳ ἐρημίτῃ, like a wild ass's colt;" xiii. 12, "Your remembrance is, ἴσα σποδοῖ, like unto ashes;" and, ver. 20, "He consumeth, ἴσα ἀσκῷ, as a bottle;" xv. 16, "Man drinketh in iniquity, ἴσα ποτῷ, as drink;" xxiv. 20, "Wickedness shall be broken, ἴσα ξύλῳ, as a tree;" xxvii. 16, "He prepareth raiment, ἴσα πηλῷ, as the clay;" xxviii. 2, "Brass is molten out of the stone, ἴσα λιθῷ, as the stone;" xxix. 14, "I put on judgment, ἴσα ἐπιλοίδι, as a robe," xl. 15, "He eateth grass, ἴσα βουσίν, as an ox;" Isa. li. 23, "Thou hast laid thy body, ἴσα τῇ γῇ, as the earth;" Wisd. vii. 1, "I myself am a mortal man, ἴσον ἅπασι, like to all men; and the first voice I uttered was πᾶσιν ἴσα κλαίων, weeping as all others do," ver. 3. So that the sense of these words seems to me to be this, That though Christ in his former appearances still represented himself in the form and likness of God; yet coming now into the world for the salvation of mankind, he did not covet or desire to appear in that majestic splendour and authority, but rather chose to come in the similitude or a man, and in the form of a servant. Nor doth this exposition give any advantage to the Socinians, but equally confutes their heresy, and gives a better answer to their arguments than the usual exposition can give. For,

First, Hence the pre-existence of Christ, before his being born of the blessed virgin, is proved to a demonstration.

Secondly, Hence also it is evident, that there must be two natures in Christ; that of the Λόγος, which appeared from the beginning to the patriarchs; and that which he received, when as man he was conceived in the virgin's womb.

Thirdly, Hence it appears that this nature in which he appeared before his conception in the virgin's womb must be divine. For what other nature could appear in the form of God, and challenge to itself the glory, which by the Jews was still a certain indication of the divine presence, and in the New Testament is styled "the glory of the Father?" Especially if we consider, that he who thus appeared hath the incommunicable name Jehovah so oft ascribed to him, is styled "the Judge of the whole earth," and either challengeth to himself the divine attributes and offices, or never doth refuse them when they are offered to him by men. Moreover, where is the humiliation, or the exinanition here mentioned in that Christ would not be, or appear as God in the world, if having only a human nature, he could not do so without being guilty of the blasphemy the Jews laid to his charge, "That he, being a man, made himself God?" Whereas he differed in nothing from an ordinary man, but only in the extraordinary gifts conferred by God upon him. And if his nature was divine, it of necessity must be eternal, since the divine nature can have no beginning of existence.

[5] Ver. 7. Μορφὴν δούλου λαβών. He took upon him the form of a servant.] This phrase cannot import only his taking of the human nature, that being sufficiently expressed by saying that "he was made in the likeness of man:" besides, he still retains the human nature, but doth not now retain the form of a servant, but of "the Lord of all things." Nor are we to understand by it "his outward poverty, which equalled him to servants," saith the learned Grotius, "as having nothing of his own;" for that is not the state of a servant only, but of a son in his minority, and of many unfortunate persons who were never servants. Nor, thirdly, must we understand by it, as the Socinians do, his submission to be used as a slave or servant, by being whipped, and bound, and crucified; for that is the humiliation which he suffered after he had taken upon him the form of a servant, as those words plainly show, "He took upon him the form of a servant, and being found in the fashion of a man, he became obedient to the death;" nor is this proper to a servant, but to a malefactor; for a servant is not less a servant when he is not whipped or scourged; he therefore may be rather said to have taken upon him the form of a servant, by ministering to men, and being among them "as one that

8 And being found in fashion as a (n ordinary) man, he humbled himself (yet more), and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.

9 Wherefore [7] God also hath highly exalted him (even as to his manhood), and given him a name (a dignity and majesty) which is above every name (of majesty, Eph. i. 21, Heb. i. 4):

10 That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, (humbly acknowledging his superiority, even those) of things in heaven (i. e. the holy angels), and things in earth (i. e. men), and things under the earth (the dead, who, being raised by him, shall acknowledge his power; for to them the apostle doth apply these very words of the prophet Isaiah, Rom. xiv. 11, 12, Rev. v. 13, Isa. xlv. 23);

11 And that every tongue (i. e. men of all nations and languages, Rev. vii. 13) should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, [8] to the glory of God the Father.

served;" for as the business of a servant is to do nothing for himself, but for the good of others, and to spend himself in ministering to their advantage; so the Son of man "came not to be ministered to, but to minister, and" at the close of that ministry, "to give his life a ransom for many."

[6] Ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος, And being in the likeness of man.] That our Lord had the real nature, and not only the outward shape or resemblance of a man; that he had a body consisting of flesh, blood, and bones; a soul and spirit; and so all the constituent parts of a man, the scripture plainly testifies. Nor doth this phrase ἐν ὁμοιώματι, "in the likeness of man," contradict it, it being used of a real likeness by the participation of the same nature as to kind. Thus Adam is said to beget a son, ἐν ὁμοιώματι αὐτοῦ, "in his own likeness," who yet was certainly of the same nature with him: and Christ is said, ὁμοιωθῆναι, "to be made like to his brethren," by the participation of the nature of Abraham, and his communion with them in the same flesh and blood, Heb. ii. 14. 16, 17, and it was both proper and elegant for the apostle to use this expression here, by reason of the opposition he designed to show, betwixt Christ's former glorious and his then present humble state, he being then ἐν μορφῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ, "in the form of God," now ἐν ὁμοιώματι τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, "in the likeness of a man."

[7] Ver. 9. Αὐτὸν ὑπερύψωσε, God hath exalted him.] The fathers on this place advise us, εἰς τὴν ἀνθρώποσιν, καὶ οὐκ εἰς τὴν θεότητα ταῦτα διανοεῖν, "to refer these things not to the divine, but to the human nature," the apostle not speaking here of the exaltation of the divine nature of Christ, by the manifestation of his concealed glory and power, but of the exaltation of that nature which had suffered; this exaltation being in scripture represented as the reward of our Lord's salutary passion: for "we see him," saith the apostle, "who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour," Heb. ii. 9; and again, the elders about the throne say, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory," Rev. iv. 11, v. 12. Moreover, John declares, that this dominion and power was given to the Son of man because he was so (John v. 17), though it was given to the man Christ Jesus, because the fullness of the Godhead dwelt in him.

[8] Ver. 11. Εἰς δόξαν, To the glory.] He does not say, as the Socinians contend, that Christ is exalted to the glory of God the Father, though that be true of the advancement of his human nature; but he saith, that being thus exalted, he is to be acknowledged of all tongues and nations as their Lord, to the glory of the Father; nothing more tending to his glory, than that all persons owning Christ as their Lord, and yielding obedience to him, should abound in these works of righteousness, "which are through Jesus Christ to the glory of God the Father," i. 11, Eph. i. 12. Moreover seeing the Father thus exalted the humanity of Christ since he united the Λόγος to the human nature (for "it pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell"), what hinders that this exaltation should be said to be to the glory of God the Father, from whom he received even the divine nature?

[9] Ver. 12. Ἐν τῇ ἀπουσίᾳ μου, In my absence.] i. e. When I was present with you, I by my counsels and exhortations stirred you up to desire and do what was according to the mind of God: he, in my absence, is more immediately present with you, by the inward motions of his Holy Spirit to excite you both to will and to do what is well pleasing to him. Having therefore now all things administered more immediately by God, which are requisite to make you willing and able to perform your duty, it doth more highly concern you to work out your salvation. Thus Ignatius* saith that he being now in chains, and going to Rome to receive the crown of martyrdom, the church of Syria had God, instead of him, to be her pastor, and that Christ alone was bishop over her. This sense I gather from these words, "much more in my absence;" for what other reason can be offered of these words than that which this interpretation gives?

Hence it is evident, that God worketh in us to will and to do, not by a physical operation, which makes it necessary for us to will and to do what he would have us do; for why then doth the apostle admonish his Philippians to "work out their salvation with fear and trembling?" For what is more absurd, than to exhort another to do himself what God doth for him without his concurrence; or to require him to will what he cannot but will and do for this reason, because another renders it necessary for him so to will? and what ground of fear can there be, lest God should fail in his work? That the word ἐνεργεῖν doth not require this sense, is evident, because in scripture it occurs very often, where it must be understood, not of a physical, but only of a moral operation; as when Satan is said, ἐνεργεῖν, to "work in the children of disobedience," Eph. ii. 2, and of the mystery of iniquity, that ἐνεργεῖται, "it now works," 2 Thess. ii. 7. (2.) When it is attributed to those causes which produce not their effects by any physical, but only by moral operations, as when the word is said to be ἐνεργὴς, "powerful," Heb. iv. 12; "The word ὃ ἐνεργεῖται, which effectually works in them that believe," 1 Thess. ii. 13; that "faith that worketh by love," Gal. v. 6; that charity is ἐνεργὴς, "effectual," Philem. 6; and of concupiscence, that ἐνεργεῖται, it "worketh in our members," Rom. vii. 5. (3.) When it is ascribed to God sending upon men ἐνέργειαν πλάνης, "the efficacy of deceit;" for surely God worketh no evil physically. In a word, did God thus work in us to will and to do, the work could no more be ascribed to us, than the motion which was impressed on the body of Lazarus, when he came out of the grave, or upon Paul, when rapt up to the third heavens, could be ascribed to them; and the will would not deserve that name, as being neither free nor praiseworthy. And therefore all the Greek interpreters observe, that the apostle saith, "It is God that worketh in us both to will and to do, οὐχ ὡς ἀφαιρῶν τὸ αὐτεξούσιον, not as denying our free-will, or τοὺς ἄκοντας βιαζόμενος, constraining the unwilling,"† ἀλλ' ὅτι προθυμίαν εὑρίσκων, αὔξει ταύτην διὰ τῆς χάριτος· "but, because finding a readiness of mind, he increaseth it by his grace; and because he works together with those who work out their salvation with fear and trembling, τοῖς γὰρ τοιούτοις συνεργεῖ, for with such he co-operates," saith Œcumenius.

without grudging, and readily, without exacting a reason of every command they lay upon you):

15 That ye may be blameless and harmless, (as becomes) the sons of God, (being) without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world;

16 Holding forth (ἐπέχοντες, holding fast) the word of life (under all persecutions and temptations); that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain.

17 (And as for me, a prisoner, if I not only should continue absent from, ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ,) Yea, and if I be (also) [11] offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith (i. e. that I may present you gentiles an acceptable sacrifice to God, through faith, and the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, Rom. xv. 16), I joy, and rejoice with you all: (I count these sufferings the matter, not of my sorrow, but my joy.

18 And if this come to pass,) For the same cause (or in the like manner) also do ye joy, and rejoice with me.

19 But (though I speak thus) I trust in the Lord Jesus (that he will work such a deliverance for me, i. 19. 25, as that, not needing him so much here, I may be able) to send Timotheus shortly unto you, that (whatever be my condition here) I also may (or I may yet) be of good comfort, when I know your state (i. e. your steadfastness in the faith, and your charity to one another.

20 To send Timothy, I say:) For I have no man (with me) likeminded, who will (so) naturally (and with like affection) care for your state.

21 For all (here) seek their own (interests and safety, and) not the things which are Jesus Christ's (that is, comparatively to Timothy and Epaphroditus, mentioned ver. 25, for I find others too generally more concerned for their own safety, than for advancing the kingdom of Christ with the hazard of their own lives and fortunes).

22 But ye know the proof (ye have had experience) of him, that, as a son with the father, he hath served with me in the gospel (yielding honour and obedience to me, and with the like spirit labouring to promote the affairs of the gospel).

23 Him therefore I hope to send (to you) presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me (i. e. what will be the issue of my bonds).

24 But I trust (or I trust also) in the Lord that I also myself (being set at liberty) shall come shortly (to you).

25 Yet (being not hitherto able to come myself, or to send Timothy,) I supposed it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother, and companion in labour, and fellowsoldier, but your [12] messenger, and he that ministered to my wants.

26 For he longed after you all (i. e. desired much to see you), and was full of heaviness, because that ye had heard that he had been sick (as knowing your affection to him would render you full of sorrow upon his account).

27 [13] For (and) indeed he was sick nigh unto death: but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me also, lest (by his death) I should have sorrow upon sorrow.

28 I sent him therefore the more carefully, that, when ye see him again (recovered), ye may rejoice (on the account of it), and that I may be the less sorrowful (finding your sorrow for him turned into joy).

29 Receive him therefore in the Lord (and for his sake) with great gladness; and hold such (as stand thus affected to his service) in reputation:

30 Because for the work of Christ (i. e. the promotion of his gospel, and the ministration to me, the prisoner of the Lord) he was nigh unto death, [14] not regarding (but freely hazarding) his (own) life, to supply your lack of service toward me.

γισμῶν, and disputings.] That is, say the Greek commentators, without murmuring under your sufferings for the sake of Christ (i. 20), or doubtings, or reasonings, whether you should continue steadfast in the faith, or not.

[11] Ver. 17. Εἰ σπένδομαι, If I offered.] The apostle here hath an elegant allusion to the Jewish sacrifices: they were prepared for the altar, on which they were to be offered, by the Levites and the priests, and this was their λειτουργία, "service," and there was poured upon the sacrifice oil or wine, which was the σπονδή, or "libation:" if then, saith the apostle, whilst I am thus, λειτουργῶν, wholly employed in rendering you gentiles an acceptable sacrifice to the Lord, my blood should be the libation to be poured out upon this sacrifice; I should rejoice even thus to die in your service, and for the confirmation of your faith (see Rom. xv. 16).

[12] Ver. 25. Ὑμῶν ἀπόστολον, Your apostle.] So they were usually styled, who gathered sacred money, and carried it up to Jerusalem: and so, say some, he calls Epaphroditus, because he brought the contributions of the Philippians to him at Rome. But the word apostle is never used in the New Testament, but either of those who were in the strict sense "apostles of the Lord," or else were eminent ministers and preachers of the gospel: thus Titus and the brother of Paul (which is the usual appellation of Timothy, see note on Heb. xiii. 23) are ἀπόστολοι, "the apostles of the churches," 2 Cor. viii. 22, 23, and Andronicus and Junia, who had long preached the gospel, are styled ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις, "eminent among the apostles of Christ." I therefore conclude with Theodoret* upon the place, and upon i. 1, that "the episcopal care of this church was committed to him;" and that this is the import of the word apostle here. This being the note of the same Theodoret, that formerly, τοὺς νῦν καλουμένους ἐπισκόπους, ἀποστόλους ὠνόμαζον, "they who are now called bishops were styled apostles;" and Hilary the deacon saying here, Erat enim eorum apostolus, ab apostolo factus, "He was constituted their apostle (i. e. bishop) by Paul," who therefore commands them to receive him "in the Lord," ver. 28, i. e. for the sake of the Lord Christ, whose minister he was.

[13] Ver. 27.] Note, that here we find Epaphroditus was not recovered by the gift of healing, then frequent in the church, that gift being not exercised by them to whom it was imparted at their own pleasure; but as God was pleased by a special instinct, and a strong faith, to incite them to the exercise of it: these gifts being therefore given for the sake of unbelievers, to convince them of the truth of the Christian faith, God thought not fit that it should be ordinarily exercised upon believers, lest it should be looked upon not as a gift, but as the effect of art or skill, or a thing done among them by confederacy.

[14] Ver. 30. Παραβολευσάμενος, Not regarding his life;] Or as others read, παραβολευσάμενος, or παραβολησάμενος, "hazarding his life;" that is, say the Greek commentators, εἰς κίνδυνον ἐρίψεν ἑαυτόν, "He brought himself in danger of death;" not by venturing on the emperor's displeasure, but by labouring so as to contract a dangerous disease (which he did, saith the apostle, "to supply your lack of service towards me"), which is not so to be understood, as if he charged them with any want of service or affection to him (see iv. 10); but thus, that Epaphroditus did this, being present with him, to supply that service, which they, being absent, were not in a capacity to perform. Note also, that παραβουλευσάμενος is the reading of all the Greek scholia, Photius, and Cod. Alexand., and, say Hesychius and Phavorinus, is in sense the same with παραβολευσάμενος, and so it is not certain that there was ever any other reading. And therefore Theodoret on the place saith, the apostle speaks thus, οὐκ ἐπειδὰν καὶ τοὺς ἄκοντας βιάζεται, ἀλλ' ὅτι προθυμίαν εὑρίσκων αὖξει ταύτην διὰ τῆς χάριτος, "not as if God constrained the unwilling, but because, where he finds a readiness of mind, he increaseth it by his grace."

* Σαφῶς τοίνυν ἐδίδαξεν, ὡς τὴν ἐπισκοπικὴν οἰκονομίαν αὐτὸς ἐπεπίστευτο, ἔχων ἀποστόλου προσηγορίαν.

CHAPTER III.

1 FINALLY (τὸ λοιπὸν, henceforth), my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. To write the same things (which I have delivered) to you (by word of mouth), to me indeed is not grievous, but for you [1] it is safe.

2 (I therefore exhort you again, to) Beware of [2] dogs, beware of [3] evil workers, beware of the [4] concision.

3 For we are the (true and spiritual) circumcision, which worship God in the spirit (of our mind, Eph. iv. 23), and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have [5] no confidence in the (circumcision of the) flesh (as if this would commend us to God).

4 Though (were this any proper ground of confidence) I might also have confidence in the flesh (as well as they who boast of this: for) if any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I (have) more (reason so to do:

5 For I was) [6] Circumcised the eighth day, (the very day prescribed by the law, Gen. xvii. 12,) of the stock of Israel (my parents and ancestors being all of Israel), of the tribe of Benjamin, (that tribe which cleaved to Judah, and revolted not with Jeroboam to the worship of the calves, 1 Kings xii. 21,) an Hebrew of the Hebrews (both by nation and language, 2 Cor. xi. 22, Acts xxi. 40); as touching (the observance of) the law, a Pharisee (one of the strictest sects of our religion, Acts xxvi. 5);

6 Concerning zeal (for the Jewish religion, I have shown that above others, in) persecuting the church (of Christ, Acts xxii. 3, 4, xxvi. 11); touching the righteousness which is in (and by) the law, (I have lived) blameless (as to that, Acts xxxiii. 1).

7 But what things (of this nature) were (then reputed) gain to me, those I (have) counted (as) loss for Christ ('s sake).

8 Yea doubtless, and I count all things (of this world) but loss [7] for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ (i. e. obtain an interest in him, and the blessings purchased by him),

9 And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, (which cannot justify me, but leaves me still under the curse of it, Rom. iii. 20, Gal. iii. 10,) but that which is through the faith of Christ, (viz.) [8] the righteousness which is (approved) of God (i. e. the righteousness which is) by faith (in Christ):

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἀσφαλὲς, It is safe.] viz. Because things only delivered by word of mouth may slip out of memory; litera scripta manet. Here is Paul's judgment against oral tradition.

[2] Ver. 2. Τοὺς κύνας, Dogs.] It is the observation of the fathers,* that the name of "dogs" was anciently given to the gentiles, as being without the covenant, according to those words of Christ, "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and give it to dogs:" but with the things the names are now changed, they being now without the covenant, and the believing gentiles admitted to it; and therefore they are called the children, but the Jews dogs. And it is well noted by Dr. Lightfoot,† that our Lord used this language, Matt. xv. 26, "not to express his own sentiments of the gentiles, but in compliance with the common language of the Jews, who proverbially said, The gentiles are likened to dogs, whereas we are God's peculiar people, even his sons and daughters." Where also is observed by the same worthy person, that even the Talmudists say of the generation in which the Messiah, or the Son of David, should come, that "the synagogues should become stews, and the faces of that generation shall be as dogs.

[3] Evil-workers.] For they labour only to pull down God's building, and to destroy the church of Christ. Elsewhere he styles them "deceitful workers," 2 Cor. xi. 13, not speaking of the Gnostics, as some imagine, but of the Jews; for so it follows: "Are they Hebrews? Are they Israelites? so am I," ver. 22.

[4] Τὴν κατατομὴν, The concision.] For circumcision being no longer a rite of entering into covenant with God, it is no better than a cutting off the flesh; and they, who still insisted on it as a thing necessary to justification and salvation, cut themselves off from Christ (Gal. v. 2, 3).

[5] Ver. 3. No confidence in the flesh.] That the Jews had a great confidence in the merit of circumcision, see note on Rom. ii. 13.

[6] Ver. 5. Περιτομὴ ὀκταήμερος, Circumcised the eighth day.] The Jews themselves say, that circumcision before that time was no circumcision, and after that time it was of lesser value (see Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. 4, p. 109): and Origen* informs us, that "the Jews held, that the circumcision performed on the eighth day was that which was chiefly intended, and that the performing it on any other day was only allowed in case of sickness." Hence they thought it necessary to circumcise a child on the sabbath-day, though all manner of work was forbidden on that day, rather than defer circumcision a day beyond the time (John vii. 22), and made it a rule, that† "the rest of the sabbath gives place to circumcision." And this opinion, as it agrees with the text, Gen. xvii. 12, so it seems to have obtained long before our Saviour's time; for the Septuagint and the Samaritan version read thus, "The uncircumcised male, who is not circumcised, τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ ὀγδόῃ, the eighth day, shall be cut off, he hath broken my covenant," Gen. xvii. 14.

[7] Ver. 8. Διὰ τὸ ὑπερέχον τῆς γνώσεως Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ, For the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus.] There hath been a sharp contention about the import of these plain words; some contending that the apostle here intends the knowledge of the person of our Lord, and of his offices, and of the benefits which he hath purchased for us in his person, and doth convey to us by his offices: and others pleading, that it is the knowledge of the gospel of Christ which is here intended, and the excellency of it which is here commended; whereas I think there is no real difference betwixt these two opinions: for we know nothing of the person and of the offices of Christ, or of the benefits which he hath purchased for us, and conveys to us by them, but by the revelation of the gospel, and so the excellency of his person and offices, and of that gospel which reveals them to us, must be in effect the same; nor would the knowledge of the gospel be so excellent, were it not for the revelation of the dignity of his person and of his offices, and of the benefits we receive from them.

[8] Ver. 9. Τὴν ἐκ Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην, The righteousness of God.] That the righteousness of God, in Paul's style, doth always signify the righteousness by faith in Christ Jesus dying for us, see note on Rom. i. 17. And hence it is evident, that the apostle cannot here speak of the righteousness

10 That I may know him (to be the Messiah, and the Saviour of the world, which knowledge is necessary to life eternal, John xvii. 3, 1 Cor. ii. 2), and the [9] power of his resurrection, and the [10] fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death;

11 If by (these, or) any (other) means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead (promised by him to all his faithful servants and sufferers.

12 [11] For I can) Not (look upon myself) as though I had already attained (or caught hold of the prize of my high calling, ver. 14, the resurrection of the dead, ver. 11), either were already perfect (i. e. crowned with it): but I follow after (or pursue it), if that I may apprehend (or reach) that (prize) for (the obtaining of) which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. (For when I fled from him, he caught hold on me, converted me to the faith, that believing in him I might obtain life everlasting, 1 Tim. i. 15, 16, εἰ καὶ, if that, or that also: see note on 1 Tim. v. 10.)

13 Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended (i. e. caught hold of the prize): but this one thing I do, forgetting (not looking after) those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before,

14 I press toward the mark (the goal) for the (obtaining the) prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

15 Let us therefore, as many as be [12] perfect (or thoroughly instructed in our Christian duty), be thus minded (as I have told you I am, i. e. so as to believe the circumcision of the spirit, not that of the flesh, and the righteousness which is of God by faith, are the things especially to be regarded for the obtaining of this prize): and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded (imagining the Judaical performances may also commend you to God), God shall (in due time) reveal even this unto you (i. e. he will convince you of the no necessity of these things in order to his favour).

16 Nevertheless (in the mean time), whereto we have already attained (i. e. as far as we have attained to the knowledge of it), let us walk by the same rule, (viz. that circumcision availeth nothing, but a new creature, Gal. vi. 15, 16,) let us mind the same thing.

17 Brethren, be (ye) followers together of me (in this matter, who have renounced all my Jewish privileges), and mark them (for your patterns) which walk so as ye have us for an ensample (of the spiritual circumcision, and of minding the prize of our high calling).

18 (For many (zealots of the law so) walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ:

19 [13] Whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.)

of Christ imputed to us: for, (1.) he does not oppose to his own righteousness, which is of the law, the righteousness of Christ imputed to him, but his own faith in Christ "imputed unto him for righteousness," Rom. iv. 5. (2.) He speaks of his faith in Christ dying and shedding his blood for him; and therefore not of his active obedience, constituting us righteous as Christ was, but of his passive obedience, procuring for us justification, or the remission of sins.

[9] Ver. 10. Καὶ τὴν δύναμιν, &c. The power of his resurrection.] i. e. The power exercised in his resurrection, "by which we are begotten to a lively hope of an inheritance incorruptible," (1 Pet. i. 3, 4), and are assured of our own resurrection (2 Cor. iv. 14, Col. ii. 12), this being that knowledge he so earnestly requests for his Ephesians (i. 19, 20), and also the power of it, to assure us of our justification through faith in him (Rom. iv. 24, 25), and of our freedom from condemnation (Rom. viii. 34).

[10] Τὴν κοινωνίαν, &c. The fellowship of his sufferings.] By being conformed to his death: (1.) spiritually, by dying unto sin; as knowing that "if we be (thus) conformed to him in the likeness of his death, we shall be like unto him in his resurrection," and shall live with him (Rom. vi. 5. 8). And (2.) by suffering and taking up the cross for his sake; as knowing that "if we (thus) suffer with him, we shall be also glorified with him" (Rom. viii. 17, 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12, 1 Pet. iv. 13).

[11] Ver. 12—14. Ὡς ἐπὶ ὁρμέως τὰ πάντα λέγει.] He in these verses makes a continual allusion to the race run in the Olympian games, where he that ran was still ἔμπροσθεν ἐκτεινόμενος, "upon the stretch, and pressing forwards," without looking back to those whom he had left behind; and pursuing the goal, that first coming to it, he might catch hold of the prize, and so be crowned with it. And two things are here noted by the fathers, worthy of our observation:

(1.) That if this great apostle, who had suffered so many things, and was "in deaths often," and who had laboured so abundantly, οὕτω ἐθάρρει περὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως ἐκείνης, "was not yet confident of a blessed resurrection, but only striving, if so be he might attain unto it:" such as we must have less ground of confidence.

(2.) What continual diligence and labour this pursuit requires: for you know, saith Chrysostom, with what great stretch the pursuer runs; he looks upon no man, he throws out of the way every thing that might hinder him; he employs his body, eye, strength, soul, and mind, upon the work, πρὸς ἕτερον μὲν οὐδὲν ὁρῶν, πρὸς δὲ τὸ βραβεῖον μόνον, "looking to nothing else, but only to the prize."

[12] Ver. 15. Τέλειοι, Perfect.] That to be perfect, is to be sufficiently instructed in the true grounds and principles of Christian faith, hath been shown, note on 1 Cor. ii. 6, and on Matt. xix. 21, and by comparing this passage with the discourse of the same apostle in his fifth and sixth chapters to the Galatians, we may learn what it is, τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν κανόνι, to "walk by the same rule:" for as there he sharply inveighs against the Galatians, for hearkening to the teachers of the necessity of circumcision; so here he warns his Philippians to beware of them and their doctrine, from ver. 2 to 7, as there he opposeth to circumcision the cross of Christ, in which alone he gloried, Gal. vi. 14, so here he opposeth to it "the fellowship of his sufferings," ver. 8, 9, as there he says, he is persuaded of his Galatians, that οὐδὲν ἄλλο φρονήσουσιν, "they will be no otherwise minded," Gal. v. 10; so here he exhorts his Philippians, τοῦτο φρονεῖν, to "mind the same thing," ver. 16, as there he teaches them by his own example, not to yield to those who urged on them circumcision, Gal. ii. 14. 20, so here he exhorts the Philippians to "walk" in this case, "as they had him for an example," ver. 17; which example he had laid before them, ver. 4. 9, and as there he promised mercy and peace, τοῖς κανόνι τούτῳ στοιχήσασιν, "to them that walked by the rule," or canon, he had laid them down, Gal. vi. 15, 16, so here he admonisheth the Philippians, τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν κανόνι, to "walk by the same rule:" this rule must therefore be that which he there lays down, that "in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature." Those who are fully persuaded of this, he styles "the perfect," requiring of them a life exactly conformed to this rule, from others only as far as they had attained to the knowledge of it, informing them that the time was at hand, when God, by destroying the Jewish temple, and dissolving the Jewish church and economy, would farther reveal this truth to them, and convince them of the vanity of these Judaical performances.

[13] Ver. 19. Ὧν τὸ τέλος, Whose end is destruction.] That the description here given of these men agrees well with the manners of the Gnostics, cannot be denied; but yet that the apostle speaketh not of them, but of the Jews, most ancient and modern commentators do assert: and there seems reason to prefer this latter exposition (1.) because he saith, he had told his Philippians often of these men: now, ver. 1, he informs them, that he then writ to them of the same things which he had before spoken to them by word of mouth, viz. that they should beware of those Jews whom he there styles "dogs," "evil-workers," "the concision." (2.) He opposes his own example, who had renounced all his Jewish privileges, and the example of those who "worship God in the Spirit," and "rejoiced in Christ Jesus," and "had no confidence in the flesh," ver. 3. 17, to the example of these men. And, (3.) the description he gives of them is agreeable to what he elsewhere saith of the same Jews. For,

20 (Imitate us, I say,) For[14] our conversation (or our city) is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ:

21 Who shall change[15] our vile body (now subject to corruption, passions, and sorrows), that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

First, They were "enemies to the cross of Christ;" that being not only a stumbling-block to the unbelieving Jews (1 Cor. i. 23), but being also overthrown by them who preached up the necessity of circumcision and of legal observations to salvation: from hence, saith the apostle, it follows, that "Christ is dead in vain," Gal. ii. 21, and that then, "the scandal of the cross is ceased," Gal. v. 10, and that "Christ would profit them nothing, who were upon this account circumcised," Gal. v. 2, and that they were "fallen from grace," ver. 4. And from the apostle's discourse in the beginning of this chapter, it appears, saith Esthius, that he here speaketh of these men.

Secondly, That their end was to be destruction, the apostle teacheth in these words, "Such are false apostles, deceitful workers, whose end shall be according to their works," 2 Cor. xi. 13. 15. And this he speaks of them who were Hebrews and Israelites, ver. 22, as also here, ver. 4.

Thirdly, That their "god was their belly," i. e. that they chiefly had regard to that, as we learn from the same apostle, saying, "These serve not the Lord, but their own bellies;" which, saith Theodoret, he speaks of the evil defenders of the law (see note on Rom. xvi. 18), and that they were γαστρίμαργοι, "slow bellies," or luxurious people (Tit. i. 12, see note there): and that they devoured those they perverted (2 Cor. xi. 20). Their "glory was in their shame;" that is, say the ancient fathers, in the circumcision of the shameful member: say others, in those evil works (ver. 2) which ought to be the matter of their shame, they being such as "blasphemed the name of God among the gentiles," Rom. ii. 24, they "minded earthly things," "counting gain godliness," 1 Tim. vi. 5, Tit. i. 11.

[14] Ver. 20. Ἡμῶν γὰρ τὸ πολίτευμα ἐν οὐρανοῖς, Our conversation is in heaven.] So Philo* represents God's priests and prophets; for having said of men, οἱ μὲν γῆς, οἱ δὲ οὐρανοῦ, "Some are of the earth, some of heaven," he adds, that of the latter sort are priests and prophets, who transcending all sensual things would not be called κοσμοπολῖται, "citizens of the world;" but translating themselves into the intellectual world, dwell there, ἐγγραφέντες ἀφθάρτων ἀσωμάτων ἰδεῶν πολιτείᾳ, "being enrolled in the polity of incorporeal and incorruptible beings." They, saith the apostle, "mind earthly things," and so are κοσμοπολῖται, "men who have this world for their city;" nos autem civitatem cœlum habemus; "but we have heaven for our city" (as Budæus renders the words), as living in expectation of "a city whose builder and maker is God," Heb. xi. 10.

[15] Ver. 21. Τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν, Our vile body.] "The body of our humiliation;" that is, saith Methodius, our body which ταπεινοῦται ἀπὸ σφάλματος, "is humbled by the fall, and become mortal."—"That body," saith Irenæus,* "which is humbled by falling into the earth, and which shall be transformed from a mortal and corruptible, into an immortal and incorruptible body."

Note here, (1.) what a value is put upon the resurrection and redemption of the body from corruption, as if it were the chief thing which Christians waited for, and expected from our Saviour at his coming (Rom. viii. 23).

(2.) Note, the divine power is Christ, to whom is here ascribed that resurrection, which is frequently made an indication of the Godhead, it being "God who raiseth from the dead" (Rom. iv. 17, Acts xxvi. 6), and which is ascribed to the exceeding greatness and to the energy of his mighty power (Eph. i. 19), and yet is here ascribed to the energy of Christ. And,

(3.) Note the pious observation of the fathers, that their folly can never be sufficiently lamented, who deprive themselves of such a glorious resurrection. So Œcumenius and Theophylact.

Note, (4.) That Philo† and the Platonists so call these bodies, ὡς ταπεινωσιν ἐπάγουτα τῇ ψυχῇ, because these earthly tabernacles do "humble and depress the soul." See also the reading of the text defended, Examen Millii, ibid.

CHAPTER IV.

1 Therefore, my brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved, (as those who do expect his coming to confer these blessings on you, 1 Cor. xv. 58, or, so stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free, as I have taught you, Gal. v. 1.)

2 I beseech Euodias, and beseech Syntyche, that they be of the same mind[1] in (the concerns of) the Lord.

3 And I intreat thee also, true[2] yokefellow, help those women which laboured with me in the (promotion of the) gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellowlabourers, [3] whose names are in the book of life.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 2. Τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, To mind the same thing.] Here, is not to be of the same judgment in all things; for no man can become of the same judgment with another by entreaty, but only by conviction: the exhortation therefore is, (1.) to have the same love to one another (ii. 2), with the same soul and spirit to promote the gospel of Christ (i. 27), to walk by the same rule, as far as they have attained to the knowledge of it (iii. 16, 17).

[2] Ver. 3. Σύζυγε, Yoke-fellow.] That this yoke-fellow cannot be Paul's wife, is certain; because he declares himself an unmarried man, 1 Cor. vii. 7, i. e. either a virgin or a widower. Secondly, Because a woman cannot be styled γνῆσιε, but γνησία σύζυγε· it is unlikely he should mean Epaphroditus, he being not then at Philippi, but with him at Rome (ver. 11): it may be therefore one of the rulers of the church, whom he saluted in the front of this epistle.

[3] Ἐν βίβλῳ ζωῆς, Whose names are written in the book of life.] This is a Judaical phrase, viz. "They are written for life," Isa. iv. 3 (see the Targum there); and "They shall not be written in the book of eternal life, which is written for the just of the house of Israel," Targum in Ezek. xiii. 9; and it doth not signify the absolute election of any to eternal life, but only their present right to that inheritance, by virtue of the obedience of faith (Rev. xx. 15, xxi. 7). For (1.) the apostle declares of all the Jews to whom he writ, that they were come to the general assembly of the firstborn, who "were written in heaven," Heb. xii. 23, and yet he in the following verse saith to them, "See that ye refuse not him that speaketh." (2.) Christ threateneth to some that he would "blot their names out of the book of life," Rev. xxii. 19, and promiseth to him that overcometh, that he would "not blot his name out of the book of life," Rev. iii. 5; and God himself saith to Moses, "Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of the book which I have written," Exod. xxxii. 32, 33, that is, "out of the book of the just," saith the Targum of Jonathan.

The Apostolical Constitutions say,* we come to be written in this book τῇ ἡμετέρᾳ εὐνοίᾳ καὶ σπουδῇ, "by our good affection and industry." Basil,† that "as men are written in this book, when they are converted from vice to virtue; so may they be blotted out of it, when they backslide from virtue to vice," according to the saying of the psalmist, Ps. lxix. 28, "Let them be blotted out of the book of the living and not written with the righteous;" that is, saith Ainsworth, "Let them be cut off from being any longer thy people, or registered in the writing of the house of Israel." And, saith Jerome,‡ "They were written in the book of God, who in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, legem fortissimè defenderant, firmly continued in the law, and they were blotted out of it, qui legis prævaricatores extiterant, who were deserters of it."

[4] Ver. 5. Τὸ ἐπιεικὲς, Your moderation.] Your meekness and patience under all your trials: "Be ye patient," saith James, "for the coming of the Lord is at hand," v. 8 (see Heb. x. 36, 37). This is almost the constant sense of the Greek word in the Septuagint, where it answers to חנן and טוב, and signifies to be gracious and propitious, 1 Sam. xii. 22, Ezra ix. 4, Ps. lxxxv. 4, ἐποίησας εἰς ἡμᾶς κατὰ πᾶσαν ἐπιείκειάν σου, "Thou hast dealt with us according to all thy goodness, and thy great mercy." So Song of the Three Children, ver. 18;—"Let us torture the just man, that we may know, τὴν ἐπιείκειαν αὐτοῦ, his meekness," Wisd. ii. 19; "Thou judgest, ἐν ἐπιεικείᾳ, with mildness," xii. 18; "He will yield to your desires, ἐπιεικῶς καὶ φιλανθρώπως, favourably and kindly," 2 Macc. ix. 27. So the Syriac and Arabic, who render it mansuetudo vestra. So Phavorinus, ἐπιεικὴς, πραΰς, παρὰ τὸ εἴκειν, τὸ ὑποχωρεῖν; and yet that τὸ ἐπιεικὲς is well rendered "moderation," is certain; for, ἐπιείκεια is rendered by Phavorinus, μετριότης, "moderation," ἐπιεικῶς by Suidas and Phavorinus, μετρίως ἤτοι συμμέτρως, "moderately," or "in measure;" ἐπιεικὴς and ἐπιεικὸς by Hesychius and Suidas, μέτριος, that is "moderate," and in the same Suidas, ἐπιεικῶς ζῆσαι, is "to live moderately," that is, temperately; and ἐπιεικῶς γεγράφθαι, is "to be written moderately," without bitterness or passion.

Now because this moderation is much talked of, but neither rightly understood nor duly practised, I shall endeavour to show what is the proper import of the word, and what are the proper objects of it. And,

First, Moderation is not derived from the word medium, but from modus; and that is from the Hebrew, madad, he measured; or middah, a rule, or measure; and in the Greek is styled, μετριότης, from μέτρον, a measure; whence it is evident, that moderation, properly so called, and in the moral sense of the word, belongs only to things in which we are subject to a vicious excess, or to act beyond that rule, or measure, which scripture or religion doth prescribe for the due regulation of our actions and passions; and it respects, first and principally, the government of our passions; whence the due government of them is by philosophers styled μετριοπαθεία, "the moderation of our passions." Now they are either our concupiscible passions, that is passions of desire, and then the moderation required of us must consist in such a government or restraint of our affections and desires, that in our love, desire of, or our delight in, any thing, we never do exceed the worth or excellency of the object, or of the end we do pursue; or,

Secondly, Our angry passions, which render us averse from things or persons, or displeased with them, and then we moderate these passions, when,

(1.) We have no aversion from, or hatred to, or displeasure against, those things, which have no real evil in them, and so can be no proper objects of our aversation, or displeasure; or, (2.) when we are not more displeased at, or grieved for, any thing, than reason, or the laws of Christianity permit us so to be; for then we can never exceed the measure of that aversation and displeasure, which reason and Christianity allow, and so we never should offend in the exertion of our angry passions. And with respect to this, the wise man saith, "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city." (3.) This moderation must be extended to the effects of these passions; (1.) in the tongue, by evil speeches; whence the good man is said to "moderate his words with discretion," Ps. cxii. 5. (2.) In his actions proceeding from those appetites, as in our pursuit of temporal good things; and in our strife and contentions about them. And, (3.) in the effects of our angry passions, that is, in our deportment to, and our punishment of, offenders. Now, hence it follows,

First, That moderation can have only place in things which are not always evil in themselves, but become so by exceeding that rule and measure which is prescribed for the due management of them. This word must therefore be abused, and falsely used, when it is applied to things which are always evil in themselves, in what degree soever they are done. They therefore abuse this word, who talk of whoring moderately, or being moderately wicked; for what we neither ought to be, or do at all, can never be done moderately, or without exceeding the rule we ought to walk by.

Secondly, Hence it is demonstratively evident, that moderation is always a virtue, it being always virtuous to restrain the excesses of our passions and appetites, and the exorbitances of our angry passions, and to regulate our words and actions according to the rule and measure by which we ought to act.

Thirdly, Hence observe, that they who render the word ἐπιείκεια, here used, meekness and patience, mildness or gentleness, mean the same thing as they who render it moderation; for meekness, gentleness, mildness, is only the due moderation of our angry passions, in respect to those injuries and provocations which we meet with in this world. And patience is that virtue which teacheth us to suffer any worldly evil without murmuring, discontent, or discomposing our spirits, and results evidently from a due moderation of our affections to these things; and this seems clearly to be the import of the word in this text: for, saith the apostle, ver. 4, though you are sufferers with me for the sake of Christ, yet "rejoice always;" and, ver. 6, μὴ μεριμνᾶτε, "Be not anxious about any temporal concerns," or events; let not either your care for them, or fear of losing them, distract your spirits, but "let your moderation," as to these things, "be known unto all men," ver. 5, "for the Lord is at hand," to protect, preserve, support you, and to reward your patience and resignation, as to these affairs.

Fourthly, And whereas, by a late author, this moderation of the passions, and of our concerns about things, suitably to their nature, is commended highly; but, saith he, "the moderation pleaded for by many hath no affinity with this virtue:" in this he is exceedingly mistaken, for all the moderation that hath, or can be pleaded for by men of sense and reason, is only this, that men would be concerned for things suitably to their natures; that as for things indifferent and mutable, they would be indifferent in their concerns about them; neither quarrelling with the church established, nor refusing communion with her, because she doth enjoin them; nor being so stiff in the retaining of them, as not to suffer mutable things to be changed by the same power by which they were at first appointed, when the wisdom of our governors shall think this fit for the good of the church, which is the moderation of the church of England;* and that men would set such a true value upon peace, union, and charity, which are great Christian virtues, and very beneficial to the church, as to let indifferent and circumstantial rites give place to those more necessary things, when these governors, the proper judges in that case, think there is ground of hope, that they may be promoted by a little yielding in those things which do not commend us to God, or by a change of some doubtful, and even innocent expressions, into expressions which remove the doubt, and minister no occasion of offence to the weak.

This I conceive is the true import of the word moderation, when it refers to actions and passions, words and censures, subject to a vicious excess.

Sometimes the adjective moderate, or adverb moderately, hath respect to measures either of things dry or liquid; and then it is not a measure of things moral, or as they are capable of being good or evil; but as they are more or less, great or small, high or low, long or short, or of a middle nature betwixt both; and in this sense, a man is said to be moderately learned, wise, or rich; and hence you may perceive the fallacy they put upon us, who say moderation is not always a virtue, because it is no virtue to be moderately learned, or wise; this being that which logicians call μετάθεσις εἰς ἄλλο γένος, or "a transition from one meaning of the word to another," which always makes the syllogism to consist of four terms, and therefore the conclusion false: for whensoever moderation is required, or commendable, there the excess is always vicious and blameworthy; whereas it is rather commendable, and an ornament of the mind, to be more than moderately wise and learned, and no disparagement to be more than moderately rich.

[5] Ὁ Κύριος ἐγγύς, The Lord is at hand.] "So the apostles thought," saith Grotius upon the place; tacitly insinuating that they were mistaken in this matter: but this exposition reflecting very injuriously upon the authority of the apostles, and the Spirit by which they spake; and that of the fathers, ἡ κρίσις ἤδη ἐπέστη, "The day of judgment is at hand," being found by experience false, we of necessity must have recourse to some other exposition of their words, when they so often tell the Christians to whom they write, that "the Lord is at hand;" that he "stands even at the door," James v. 9, that "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh," ver. 8, that "the end of all things is at hand," 1 Pet. iv. 7, that "the day of the Lord is near," Heb. x. 25, that "it is but a little while, and ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that is coming will come, and will not tarry:" I say, we must of necessity, for exposition of these places, have recourse to some other advent of our Lord: for it is by no means to be granted, that the apostles were mistaken in their apprehensions of this matter, and that they confidently asserted, that the great day of judgment was then at hand; when after sixteen hundred years it is yet far off, the destruction of antichrist, the calling of the Jews, and the millennium, succeeding these great epochas, being to precede that day. For this bold conjecture shakes the foundations of the Christian faith; it imputes not only fallibility, but actual falsehood, to the writers of these epistles, and makes them guilty of falsehood in the promises of the New Testament, and in the motives which they used, to encourage believers to a Christian patience under the pressures they endured, and renders them deceivers of their hopes. Let it be therefore noted,

First, That these expressions are chiefly used in the catholic epistles, and the Epistle to the Hebrews; that is, in the epistles directed to the Jewish churches, who were no strangers to these phrases, and who were well acquainted with a tremendous advent of the Lord to punish the rebellions and infidelity of that nation: so, for instance, Joel ii. 1, "All the inhabitants of the land (of Judah) shall be confounded, ὅτι πάρεστιν ἡμέρα Κυρίου ὅτι ἐγγύς, because the day of the Lord is at hand, a day of darkness and gloominess; a day of clouds and of thick darkness." And, ver. 11, "The day of the Lord is great and very terrible; who can abide it?" And, ver. 31, "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come;" Zech. xiv. 1, 2, "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, and I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle;" Mal. iii. 2, "Who may abide in the day of his coming, and who shall stand when he appeareth?" And iv. 1, "Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven."

Secondly, There is also frequent mention of this time and day in the New Testament, when the Lord would come to destroy the unbelieving Jews, and also of the nearness of that time; for the Baptist calls them to repentance from this very motive, that "the axe was then laid to the root of the tree," Matt. iii. 10, that "one was coming whose fan was in his hand," ver. 12. Our Saviour spends a whole chapter in speaking, περὶ ἡμέρας ταύτης, "of that day," Matt. xxiv. 36, and "of the coming of the Son of man" to the destruction of that nation, ver. 27. 37, "of the coming of the Lord," ver. 42, of the age in which he would thus come, ver. 34, of the signs when his coming was, ἐγγύς, "near at hand, καὶ ἐπὶ θύραις, and at the door" (which are the very words, both of Paul and James); when there would be a τέλος, "an end of all things" belonging to the Jewish temple and constitution, ver. 14. Now to this coming of the Lord, foretold by his own self in the very expressions of the prophets, and in the words used here by the apostles, in their writings to the Jewish converts, we may very well refer the words forecited, and if there be any other of like nature.

And the fitness of these exhortations to meekness and patience, on the account of the nearness of this day, and the advent of the Lord to punish the unbelieving Jews, will be apparent from this consideration, that they were the chief persecutors of those of their own nation who embraced the Christian faith (Rom. xv. 31, 1 Thess. ii. 14), and they also sent out their messengers to other nations, to represent the Christians to them as the worst of men, and to excite them to join with them in the persecution of them, as Justin Martyr doth inform us; and therefore it must be very acceptable to the poor persecuted Christian Jews, to hear that these enemies of the cross of Christ, these instigators of the heathen to persecute them, should, by the coming of the Lord to destroy their church and nation, be disabled from doing them any farther mischief; and also, that those deceitful workers of the same nation, who troubled the churches with preaching the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the law of Moses, should not be able long to instil those doctrines, their church and temple being to be shortly ruined, and they themselves being no longer able to observe the law.

[6] Ver. 7. Εἰρήνη Θεοῦ, The peace of God.] As ἀγάπη Θεοῦ and χάρις Θεοῦ do generally signify the love and favour of God to us, so εἰρήνη Θεοῦ, "the peace of God," most naturally imports the peace and reconciliation which we have with God through faith in Christ; for "being justified by faith, we have peace with God:" hence is the gospel, which proclaims this pardon and justification to believers, styled "the gospel of peace," Eph. vi. 15, "the preaching peace by Jesus Christ," Acts x. 30, Eph. ii. 17, "who is our peace," ver. 14, and in the preface to all the epistles, the apostle wisheth to the Christians, χάριν καὶ εἰρήνην, "grace and peace through God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ:" and this peace is styled, εἰρήνη ψυχῆς, "the peace of the soul," Hag. ii. 9. So that the sense of these words seemeth to be this; The sense and experience of the divine favour, and the inward peace and security which arise from it, shall be sufficient to keep you steadfast in the faith of Christ. He promiseth not deliverance from calamities, but inward peace and tranquillity of mind under them, and that as the effect of constant prayer, and a sense of the divine favour to them.

[7] Ver. 8.] Hence two things may be noted: (1.) That there are things naturally honest, just, lovely, and praiseworthy. (2.) That there is no virtue, nothing praise-are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any (thing) praise (-worthy), think on these things (to do them).

9 Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and heard (from me), and seen in me, do: and the God of peace (the giver of internal peace) shall be with you.

10 But[8] I rejoiced (ἐχάρην δὲ, for this cause I rejoiced) in the Lord greatly, that now at the last your care of me (i. e. to supply my wants) hath flourished again; [9] wherein ye were also careful, but ye lacked opportunity.

11 Not that I speak (this) in respect of (any desire in me, that you, or others, should supply my) want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content.

12 I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need.

13 [10] I can do all (these, and other) things (required by Christianity) through Christ which strengtheneth me.

14 (But) Notwithstanding (this my proficiency) ye have well done, that ye did (thus) communicate with (me in) my affliction.

15 Now ye Philippians know also (for your honour), that in the beginning of (my preaching) the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only (i. e. I have received supplies from no other church but yours.

16 You indeed kindly did it;) For even (when I was) in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto (supply) my necessity.

17 (And of this I remind you) Not because I desire a (farther) gift (for my own benefit): but (because) I desire fruit that may abound to your account (in the day of the Lord, who will not then forget your labour of love, in ministering to his saints, Heb. vi. 10.

18 I say, not that I desire more:) But I have (received) all (that can be needful for me), and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, (which are) an odour of a sweet smell, [11] a sacrifice acceptable, wellpleasing to God.

19 But (and) my God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory (i. e. his glorious riches) by Christ Jesus (i. e. he shall return you a supply of your spiritual wants, for your charity to me in temporals).

20 Now unto God and (i. e. who is) our Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

21 Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren which are with me greet you.

22 All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Cæsar's houshold.

23 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

worthy, but what falls under the compass of this general precept.

[8] Ver. 10. I rejoiced in the Lord.] i. e. In your liberality, not as a thing tending only to supply my wants, but as a thing highly acceptable to the Lord (ver. 8), and as a fruit of your affection to him, which he will reward (ver. 17).

[9] Ἐν ᾧ ἐφρονεῖτε, ἠκαιρεῖσθε δὲ, Of which thing you were still mindful, but you wanted ability.] Οὐκ εἴχετε ἐν χερσὶν, οὐδὲ ἐν ἀφθονίᾳ ἦτε, "You had it not in your hands, you were not in a condition to help me;" so Theodoret, Chrysostom, Theophylact, though Œcumenius and Phavorinus render it, with our translation, καιρὸν οὐκ εἴχετε, "You lacked opportunity."

[10] Ver. 13. Hence the fathers observe three things: (1.) That the art of contentment requires much learning, exercise, and meditation. (2.) That it is as difficult to learn how to be full, as to be hungry; abundance having destroyed more than penury, and exposed them to more pernicious lusts. (3.) That our proficience in this, or any other virtue, is to be ascribed not to ourselves, but to the divine assistance.

[11] Ver. 18. Ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, A sacrifice acceptable.] There were two altars, saith Dr. Hammond, in the temple of the Jews, the altar of incense within the temple, and that of sacrifice without in the court: on these two were offered all things that were offered to God, and under these two heads, an odour of incense and a sacrifice, are works of charity here represented, as being the prime things now under the gospel to obtain God's favour and acceptation.

EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

That St. Paul writ this Epistle to the Colossians when he had not yet seen them, is the opinion of most of the ancient scholiasts: this is confessed even by Theodoret, though he saith this doth not follow from the words cited to confirm this opinion, but the contrary. The words are these: "I would have you know what great solicitude I have for you, and for them of Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh," Col. ii. 1, which he renders thus; "Not for you only, and for them of Laodicea, but also for them that have not seen my face in the flesh:" but the connective particle being not ἀλλὰ, or ἀλλὰ καὶ, but also, but only καὶ, and, seems to favour our translation, and the opinion of the ancients.* He adds, that the apostle went from Phrygia, of which Colosse was the metropolis; whence he collects he must have preached there: but this will not follow; since the first time he only went through Phrygia en passant, Acts xvi. 6, and the second time, xviii. 23, he only stayed to confirm the brethren already converted; but that he came to Colosse, is not said. The arguments offered to prove he had not seen them seem stronger, as appears not only from the words now cited, but from other expressions in the same epistle; for he intimates, i. 4, that he had only "heard of their faith in Christ;" and, ver. 7, that they had learned the faith not from him, but Epaphras, whom he styles, "to them a faithful minister of Jesus Christ."

Note also, that this epistle was writ at the same time with that to the Philippians, and so A. D. 62.

As for the occasion of it, Theodoret* informs us, that it was writ against those Jewish Christians who endeavoured to impose the observation of the law upon the gentile converts, as is apparent from his caution to them, to beware of them who "spoiled them after the rudiments of the world," ii. 8, and that because they were "circumcised in Christ, ver. 11, and he had "blotted out the hand-writing of ordinances which was against them," ver. 14, and from the inference thence made, "Let no man judge you therefore in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holiday, or of the new moons, or of the sabbath-days; which are a shadow," ver. 16, 17. The rest say that it was written against them who sowed among them Jewish and heathenish doctrines;* and in particular against them who endeavoured to bring in the worship of angels;† of the Gnostics, here mentioned by Esthius, they have not one word to say.

CHAPTER I.

1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother,

2 [1] To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colosse (writeth thus): Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We give thanks to God [2] and (who is) the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you,

4 Since [3] we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints,

5 (which love is still the fruit of a true faith, 1 Cor. xiii. 2, Gal. v. 6.

We give thanks, I say,) For the hope (of an eternal inheritance, 1 Pet. i. 3) which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before (from Epaphras) in the word of the truth of the gospel (preached by him);

6 Which (gospel) is come unto you, as it is (also heard of) [4] in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit (in them), as it doth also in you, since the day ye (first) heard of it, and knew (ἐπέγνωτε, acknowledged) the grace (and favour) of God (to you) in truth (and sincerity):

7 As ye (have) also learned of Epaphras our dear fellowservant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ;

8 Who also declared unto us your love (to me) in the Spirit (your spiritual and affectionate love to me, wrought in you by that Spirit whose fruit is love).

9 For this cause we also, since the day we heard of it (i. e. this your affection to us), do not cease to pray for you, and to desire (of God) that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will (advancing) [5] in all (the gifts of) wisdom and spiritual understanding;

10 That (having thus attained to the knowledge of the things of God) ye might walk worthy [6] of the Lord unto all pleasing (i. e. so as to please him in all things), being fruitful in every good work, and increasing (still more) in the knowledge of God;

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 2. To the saints.] See note on 1 Cor. i. 1. Note also, that the Holy Ghost is mentioned in these places, because he is the fountain of this grace, and by him God the Father and the Son dwell in us (John xiv. 23); so that praying for this grace is praying for the communion of the Holy Ghost.

[2] Ver. 3. Εὐχαριστοῦμεν, We give thanks.] From this and the ninth verse note, that the good shepherd should not only feed his flock, but pray continually for them, and give thanks for the spiritual blessings conferred on them.

Καὶ.] As the Hebrew ו hath oft the import of id est in the Old Testament (see Noldius, p. 280. 27); so Matt. xxiii. 5, "Thy King cometh, sitting upon an ass, καὶ πῶλον, i. e. a colt, the foal of an ass" (see Matt. xi. 2. 7, Luke xix. 30. 35, John xii. 14, 15): and frequently it signifies nempè, to wit: so, "That mountain, יהלבנן to wit, Lebanon," Deut. iii. 25; so Judg. vi. 25, 2 Sam. xx. 14, Jer. xxi. 7. So John xii. 23, "We stone thee for blasphemy, καὶ ὅτι, to wit, because thou, being a man, makest thyself God;" Rom. xv. 6, "That with one mouth ye may glorify God, καὶ πατέρα, who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" so Gal. i. 4, Phil. iv. 20, Col. ii. 2, James vii. 3. 9. As therefore God, who is "the God of Israel," was the characteristic of the true God to the Jewish nation; so God, "who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," is the characteristic of the same God to the Christians, who worship him under that title, as being "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," and in him, "our Father," we being the sons of God through faith in him, and deriving all our blessings from the Father through him.

[3] Ver. 4. Ἀκούσαντες, Hearing.] From this verse, and from ii. 1, it is evident that Paul did not in person preach to the Colossians, and indeed that he never had seen them, they being converted by Epaphras (i. 7. 23), and perhaps also by the means of Timothy, who therefore is mentioned in the beginning of this epistle, as saluting them together with Paul.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἐν παντὶ τῷ κόσμῳ, In all the world.] And "which is preached to every creature under heaven," ver. 23. This, by a usual hyperbole, is to be understood of the most noted parts of the world, from which the rest might hear of it. In which sense Cyrus saith, that God had given him "all the kingdoms of the earth," Ezra i. 2, and God, saith Jeremiah, will call for a sword upon "all the inhabitants of the earth," xxv. 29, i. e. of the whole kingdom of Babylon; "and the slain of the Lord shall be from one end of the earth to the other, over all the kingdoms of the world," ver. 26, and the Romans, Asiatics, Egyptians, &c. are styled, "devout men of every nation under heaven," Acts ii. 5.

[5] Ver. 9. Ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ, In all wisdom.] Among the spiritual gifts vouchsafed for the edification of the church, are reckoned "the word of wisdom and of knowledge," 1 Cor. xii. 8, whereby they were enabled, "through the Spirit, to know the things which are given them of God," 1 Cor. ii. 12, and to "compare spiritual things with spiritual," ver. 13. For the abundance of these gifts vouchsafed to the churches, he sometimes gives thanks, as 1 Cor. i. 4, 5. 7, Eph. i. 3, and for the increase of them he sometimes prays, as here, and Eph. i. 17.

[6] Ver. 10. Περιπατῆσαι ὑμᾶς ἀξίως τοῦ Κυρίου, &c. That you may walk worthy of the Lord, to all well-pleasing.] enabled constantly to suffer all afflictions you endure for the sake of Christ, and of the glory he hath promised, with patience and joy ;)

12 Giving thanks unto the Father, [7] which hath (thus prepared and) made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light (for which we suffer, 2 Thess. i. 5):

13 Who hath delivered us from the [8] power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son (or the Son of his love):

14 [9] In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of (our) sins (see note on Eph. i. 7):

15 [10] Who is the image (and representation to us) of the invisible God, [11] the firstborn (or Lord) of every creature:

Note here the end of all our Christian knowledge, viz. a conversation fruitful in good works, and a life acceptable and well-pleasing to God.

[7] Ver. 12. Ἱκανώσαντι ἡμᾶς εἰς τὴν μερίδα τοῦ κλήρου τῶν ἁγίων ἐν φωτί, Who has made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light.] The other reading, viz. καλέσαντι, "who hath called you," for ἱκανώσαντι, "who hath made you meet," is contrary to all the old versions, the Syriac, Arabic, and Vulgar, and all the Greek scholiasts; and therefore not to be admitted as a various lection, but only as the mistake of some copyist. Note also, that here is an allusion to the inheritance of the Jews in Canaan, styled "the land of their inheritance;" for it was divided into so many μερίδες, or places measured out by line, to be possessed by the several tribes, excepting that of Levi, and then by lot assigned to every respective tribe (Josh. xiii.), according to God's commandment, Numb. xxvi. 55, xxxiii. 54, and that division which thus came to any of them by lot, was his μερὶς κλήρου, "the portion which by lot befell him;" but, saith the apostle, We are made meet, not for an earthly inheritance, as that was in Canaan, but for that heavenly portion God hath allotted us in heaven, the region of light and happiness, we being already translated into the kingdom of his Son Christ, become his subjects, and so under his care and conduct and protection, ruled by his word, which is "the word of life;" and by his Spirit, the earnest of this inheritance, and shall hereafter be advanced by him into his heavenly kingdom.

[8] Ver. 13. Ἐκ τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ σκότους, The power of darkness.] That "darkness" signifies the state of heathen ignorance, see note on Rom. xii. 2. The power of it, is that power which Satan, the prince of darkness, had over the heathen world, to keep them in idolatry and brutish lusts: (Eph. ii. 2): hence the apostle saith, he was sent unto the gentiles, "to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God," Acts xxvi. 17 (see Luke xxii. 53).

[9] Ver. 14. Τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν διὰ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ.] That these words do indeed belong to the text is evident, not only from Theodoret, Œcumenius, Iren. lib. v. cap. 2, p. 395, and the Arabic, but from Paul himself, Eph. i. 7.

[10] Ver. 15. Εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ, The image of the invisible God.] The Socinians contend that Christ is here styled the image of the invisible God, because he, by his gospel, hath made known the will of God unto us: in this sense, say they, he is styled the image of God, 2 Cor. iv. 3, and in this sense he saith to Philip, "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father." Schlictingius notes, that he is called the image of God, now that he is in heaven, and so not according to any thing appertaining to him which is invisible, but according to something by which he may be seen and known, i. e. saith he, as he hath made himself known to us in the gospel.

But the more natural import of the phrase seems to be this, that Christ is "the image of God," as making him, who is invisible in his essence, conspicuous to us by the divine works he wrought, they being such as plainly showed that in him "dwelt the fullness of the Godhead bodily;" for an invisible God can only be seen by his effects of power, wisdom and goodness, by which, saith the apostle, "from the creation of the world, the invisible things of God, to wit, his power and Godhead, have been made known by the things that are made," Rom. i. 20. He therefore who, in the works both of the old and new creation, hath given us such clear declarations of the divine power, wisdom, and goodness, is upon this account as much an image of God as any thing can be. To this sense the image of God here seems necessarily restrained by the connective particle ὅτι, He is the image of God, "for by him all things were created." Moreover, that this place is parallel to that in the Epistle to the Hebrews, the words sufficiently declare: here he is "the image of God," there "the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person:" here he is the first-born, or Lord of every creature; there, "the heir of all things:" here it is said, that "all things were created by him;" there, that he "made the world:" here, that "by him all things do consist;" and there, that "he supporteth all things by the word of his power:" now that there he is styled, "the image of God's glory," and "the character of his person," by reason of that divine power, wisdom, and majesty, which shined forth in his actions, Schlictingius is forced to confess. It is not therefore to be doubted, that he is here styled "the image of God" in the same sense; and it is highly probable that he is called the image of the invisible God, as appearing to the patriarchs, and representing to them that God, who lives "in light inaccessible, to which no mortal eye can approach," according to these frequent descants of the Ante-Nicene fathers,* that "God the Father being invisible, one whom no man hath seen, or can see, he appeareth to the patriarchs by his Son:" and that in this sense Christ saith to Philip, "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father," he himself intimates, by adding, that "the Father, abiding in him, did the works" he performed, John xiv. 9—11, and that they ought to believe "he was in the Father, and the Father in him, for the works' sake." And in the Epistle to the Corinthians, he is plainly styled "the image of God," for the like reason, viz. because that God, "who at first created light out of darkness, had shined upon the gentiles, to make known to them the glory of God, in the person of Jesus Christ." Now this glory of God is, ch. iii., those miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, by which the gospel was confirmed, and, iv. 7, ἡ ὑπερβολὴ τῆς δυνάμεως τοῦ Θεοῦ, "the excellency of the power of God."

[11] Πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, The first-born of every creature.] Since, say the Socinians, the first-born is of the order and number of those things of which he is the first-born: Christ therefore being here styled "the first-born of every creature," must be in the order and of the number of creatures. But this inference is neither consistent with their own principles, nor with the words of the apostle. Not with their own principles: for, in what rank of creatures will they place Christ? if among the old, then they must allow him an existence before the beginning of the world, which yet they peremptorily deny; if among the new, they must confess he had a nature which wanted to be renewed, changed, and reformed; that in him, as well as in us, though in him before us, all "old things passed away, and all things became new;" since otherwise he cannot be of the order and number of them who underwent this change.

Secondly, This opinion cannot consist with the words of the apostle, who styles Christ "the first-born of every creature, because by him all things were created," ὃς ἐστι πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ ἐκτίσθη τὰ πάντα. Now he, who is therefore the first-born of the whole creation, because he created all things, cannot himself be any part of the creation, either in heaven or earth, or be numbered amongst his creatures; but only be so called, because he was πρὸ πάντων, "before all things:" so is אני מקך πρωτότοκος ἐγὼ ἤ σν, 2 Sam. xix. 43, "I am before thee." (2.) Christ, saith our excellent primate, is here styled ὁ πρωτότοκος, the first-born, as being the Lord of all things. For, first, it is reasonable to conceive, that ὁ πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, "the first-born of every creature," should be the same in sense with that of the same apostle in the parallel place, where he is styled, ὁ κληρονόμος πάντων, "heir of all things." Now thus it will signify in this sense, according to that of Justinian, "To act as an heir is to act as lord; for the ancients used the word heir for a lord," Pro hærede se gerere, est pro domino gerere; veteres enim hæredes pro dominis appellabant (Instit. lib. ii. tit. 19, §. 6).

16 For [12] by him (who is the first-born of every creature) were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible (the sun, moon, and stars,) and invisible (the whole host of angels), whether they be (named) thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him (as the cause), and for him (as the end of their creation):

In this sense also is the word primogenitus used in the scriptures; for because the dominion and principality anciently followed the primogeniture, according to those words, "He gave the dominion to Joram, ὅτι οὗτος ὁ πρωτότοκος, because he was the first-born," 2 Chron. xxi. 5, it came in common use to signify that dominion. So of David, saith God, "I will give him to be בכור, πρωτότοκον, the first-born, high above the kings of the earth."—"I will give him τῶν βασιλέων ἁπάντων τὴν ἐξουσίαν, power over all kings," saith Aquila;* "I will set him ἀνώτατον τῶν βασιλέων τῆς γῆς, the supreme over the kings of the earth;" so Symmachus. No, saith Mr. Clerc, "this doth not signify a lord over other kings, but a most excellent and glorious king." But for this we shall not acquiesce in his bare word against the opinion of all the ancient commentators on the place, seeing the foregoing words, ver. 26, "I will set his hand in the sea, and his right hand in the river," are equivalent to these;—"I will give him power over the kings of the Philistines," on the one hand (see 2 Sam. viii. 12), and over the Syrians on the other (ver. 6); "He shall have," saith the Chaldee, שלטנותי, "his empire over the kings of the earth;"—"I will elevate him over them," saith the Syriac; and so accordingly we find he did; exalting him over the Syrians, who were tributaries to him (2 Sam. viii. 6), "and over all the kings," which were servants to Hadarezer (2 Sam. x. 19); and this was necessary to be done, to render him a fit type of that "Son of David," who was to be "King of kings, and Lord of lords." And thus he is also πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, "the first-born from the dead" (ver. 18), as being "Lord over the dead," since "for this cause he died, and rose again, ἵνα κυριεύσῃ, that he might be Lord over the dead, and over the living" (Rom. xvi. 9), and so might be ἐν πᾶσιν πρωτεύων, primas tenens, imperium habens in omnibus, "pre-eminent in all things." Since then the first-born is naturally the heir, and so the lord of the family, and therefore the word heir amongst the ancients did signify lord; seeing Paul, who here styles him "the first-born," doth in a place parallel to this, style him "the heir of all things," why may we not conceive the person of whom David was a type, may be also here styled "the first-born," as being Prince over, and high above, all creatures, they being all the work of his hands? for so the reason follows.

[12] Ver. 16. Ἐν αὐτῷ ἐκτίσθη τὰ πάντα ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, καὶ τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, All things were created by him, that are in heaven, and that are in the earth.] The gloss of Grotius,† and the Socinians,‡ runs thus: That "to Christ is here ascribed, not the creation of the old world and all things that are in it, but only the creation, that is, the renovation of all things under the gospel-state, or the reformation of mankind by Jesus Christ," and the gospel preached to them, and the reconciliation of angels to men. But this interpretation is so forced and remote from the most usual sense of the words, and it is so flat and mean to say, that "Jesus Christ was before every new creature;" that is to say, before the renovation made by himself, or rather by his apostles after his exaltation; and to prove this by that very renovation, that even Mr. Clerc is forced to reject it as evidently false, which it will certainly appear to be from these considerations:

* Vide Theodor. in locum.

† Rectius est ἐκτίσθη interpretari, ordinata sunt, novum quendam statum sunt consecuta, angeli hominibus, homines inter se reconciliati sunt sub Christo. Grotius.

‡ Quia ex Christi exaltatione, et divino quod accepit imperio, consecuta est hæc angelorum hominumque reformatio, ac renovatio, per illum et in illo facta esse dicitur, seu illi creati, id est, renovati dicuntur. Crell. in loc.

First, That the apostle speaks here of the creation of such things as are not capable of this moral creation, viz. the creation πάντων τῶν ὁρατῶν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, "of all things visible upon earth." Now the τὰ ὁρατὰ, Rom. i. 20, and τὰ βλεπόμενα, Heb. xi. 31, i. e. "the things which are made and seen," comprise the whole visible creation, all things without life, metals, stones, elements, all vegetables, and all beasts; and did the gospel come to make a moral renovation among these? did Christ and his apostles preach to stones and trees? (2.) Under "all things in heaven," and "all things invisible," must be comprised all the good angels, which are therefore elsewhere styled κυριότητες, ἀρχαὶ, καὶ ἐξουσίαι, Eph. i. 21, iii. 10, 1 Pet. iii. 22. Now they cannot be proper subjects of this new creation, or moral renovation; for of this new creation the scripture never speaks, but in relation to an old, which was to be abolished, changed, and done away by it; for in them who are made καινὴ κτίσις, "a new creation, all old things are passed away, and all things are become new" in them, 2 Cor. v. 17. They "put off the old man, and put on the new, which is created after God in righteousness and holiness," Eph. iv. 22. 24, Col. iii. 9, 10. Now it is manifest that nothing of all this can agree to the good angels, and much less to the evil angels, who are still creatures, and therefore not to be excluded from expressions so general as these are.

Secondly, The words in this sense were far from being true when the apostle spake them; for a very small remnant of the Jews were then converted to the Christian faith, and of the gentiles few, in comparison of those multitudes which afterward embraced the faith; and yet the apostle plainly speaks of a creation wholly past already, using the aorist in these words, ἐν αὐτῷ ἐκτίσθη τὰ πάντα, "By him have all things been created;" and the perfect tense in these words, δι' αὐτοῦ πάντα ἔκτισται, "By him all things were created."

Thirdly, Though the Socinians may be able to produce some few instances where the words κτίσις and κτίζειν are to be taken in a moral sense, yet cannot they show one instance where the creation of "all things in heaven and in earth, visible and invisible," is ever used in a moral sense, or concerning any other creation than that of which Moses speaks, saying, "Thus the heavens and the earth were made, and all the host of them," Gen. i. 2.

Fourthly, The apostle afterward begins his discourse of this moral creation or reconciliation of the world to God by Christ, and the renovation of his church, in these words, ver. 18—21, "And he is the head of the body of the church, &c. For it pleased the Father——by him to reconcile all things to himself, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven. And you that were sometimes alienated, and enemies in your minds by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh by death, to present you holy and unblameable, and unreprovable in his sight." Now these things being thus connected by the particle καὶ, to what he had before said of the creation of all things by Christ, demonstratively show that he was not then speaking of that renovation which he begins to speak of in the following words.

Fifthly, This exposition of this place touching a true and proper creation of all things by Jesus Christ, is by the fathers,* from the beginning, laid down as "a rule, to which the orthodox keeping close, might easily show that the heretics, who held the world was created by angels, deviated from the truth." Now this was the heresy of Simon Magus* and Cerinthus, as Irenæus there informs us.

[13] Ver. 18. Πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, The first-born from the dead.] Εἰς γὰρ ἀθάνατόν τε καὶ ἀφθαρτὸν ζωὴν οὔπω γέγονέ τινος ἡ ἀνάστασις, πλὴν τοῦ σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, "For none besides our Saviour ever yet rose to an immortal and incorruptible life" (Author. Quest. Resp. ad Orthod. qu. 85). See the following note.

[14] Ver. 19.] For explication of these words it is to be noted, That the great end of our Saviour's sufferings was to rescue our bodies, condemned for sin unto death, from that mortality, and to bestow on all, whom God shall give him, eternal life, by raising of their bodies to a state of incorruption; for, "because the children were partakers of flesh and blood," and thereby subject to mortality, "he also took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and might deliver them who, through the fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

That therefore the church, which is his body, is represented as "the church of the first-born, enrolled in the heavens," Heb. xii. 23, a church against which "the gates of hades," or of death, "shall not prevail" to hinder their enjoyment of this resurrection to a life of happiness; they are the sons of God, and therefore "children of the resurrection," Luke xxi. 36; therefore "heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ," who shall be glorified with him, Rom. viii. 17, "shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God," ver. 21, shall have "the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body," ver. 23; and they are also represented as persons forordained to be conformed to the image of Christ, by having their "vile bodies changed into the likeness of Christ's glorious body," ver. 29.

Note, Secondly, That to this end was Christ raised, that he, "the first-born from the dead," might raise up his whole body from the dead, he being raised from the dead as "the first-fruits of them that slept," 1 Cor. xv. 20; for "to this end Christ both died and rose again, that he might be Lord both of the dead and of the living," Rom. xiv. 9, and God hath therefore exalted him, that "at the name (i. e. the power) of Jesus, every knee should bow, of things in heaven, in the earth, and under the earth," Phil. ii. 10; that is, the bodies of the dead; for by this argument, and from these very words, the apostle proves the resurrection, and a future judgment, Rom. xiv. 10—12. He is therefore so "the first-born of the dead," as to be the Lord of them, according to our former interpretation of the word "first-born," and as to have power to "raise them up who sleep in him, and bring them with him," 1 Thess. iv. 14, to "give eternal life unto them, and raise them up at the last day," John v. 28, 29, xvii. 2. And thus hath he the pre-eminence in all things, being Lord of all creatures dead and living, and giving both their first and their new being to them, and rendering his members conformable to his glorious image, that so they may be joint-heirs with him in glory: and this is the constant doctrine of Irenæus,* who informs us, that "Christ died, that he might be the first-born from the dead, and the prince of life. That the death of this just man gave him the principality of things under the earth, he having before the principality in heavenly things; that they who denied the resurrection of the flesh, contradicted the salvation of that for which the whole dispensation of the Son of God was designed; that he died, that exiled man might be delivered from condemnation, and might return without fear to his inheritance."†

* A quibus et mundum hunc factum dicit. Cap. 20, de Cerinth. cap. 25, V. lib. ii. cap. 9.

[15] Ver. 20. Ἀποκαταλλάξαι, To reconcile.] This word, say Hesychius, Suidas, and Phavorinus, signifies φιλοποιῆσαι, "to make friends," or "to reduce persons to their former amity." This by the fathers,‡ is thus explained, That whilst man continued in his obedience to God, angels and men were in a perfect friendship; but when men became disobedient to their sovereign Lord, the angels became averse to them, because their Lord was dishonoured by them. But God being reconciled to us by the death of his Son, they also became friends and ministering spirits to us, and we became of the same church and body with them, under the same head Christ Jesus (Heb. xii. 22); and so "all things in heaven and earth were gathered into one Christ," Eph. i. 10.

[16] Ver. 23.] Note, hence it follows, that they who have true faith, and just ground of hope, may fall away from them.

[17] Ver. 24. Τῶν θλίψεων τοῦ Χριστοῦ, The afflictions of Christ.] Christ having told us that what was done to his members is done to him, Matt. xxv. 40. 45, the afflictions of his members are styled "the persecutions and afflictions of Christ," Acts ix. 4, 5. Now the Jews speak much of the afflictions of Christ and his disciples, comprehending both

Of these afflictions of Christ, I, saith the apostle, have already had a share, and I go on to fill up the residue of these my sufferings in the flesh, which I am to bear in the discharge of my ministry, for the benefit of his church. And suitable to this interpretation is that of Lyranus on the place, Passiones Christi dupliciter accipiuntur, uno modo pro illis quas sustinuit in corpore proprio, et sic nihil ibi restat ad implendum; alio modo quas in finem usque seculi patietur in corpore mystico, et sic restant multarum passionum reliquiæ adimplendæ.

CHAPTER II.

1 (I say, I labour, ἀγωνιζόμενος, striving to make every man perfect in Christ Jesus:) For I would that ye knew what great conflict (γλίκον ἀγῶνα, what contention in prayer, iv. 2) I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh;

2 (Praying) That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in (mutual) love, and (that they may advance) unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, [1] to the acknowledgement of the [2] mystery of God, and (i. e.) of the Father, and of Christ;

3 [3] In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

4 And this I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words (see note on ver. 8).

5 For though I be absent (from you) in the flesh, yet am I (present) with you in the spirit (by which I discern your affairs, as Elisha did his servant, 2 Kings v. 26, see 1 Cor. v. 3), joying and beholding (beholding with joy) [4] your order, and the stedfastness of your faith in Christ.

6 As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord (by the teaching of Epaphras, i. 7), so walk ye (steadfastly) in him:

7 Rooted and built up in him, and stablished in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving (to him who called you to it).

8 Beware lest any man spoil you (or make a prey of you) through (heathen) [5] philosophy and vain deceit, (leading you) after the tradition of men, (or) after

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 2. Εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν, for ἐν ἐπίγνωσει, In the knowledge.] See note on i. 20.

[2] Τοῦ μυστηρίου τοῦ Θεοῦ, The mystery of God, even the Father, and of Christ.] i. e. The dispensation of the divine grace of God, in offering salvation to the gentiles by Christ, and conferring on them, equally with the Jews, the blessings of the gospel. This is the mystery which, saith he, "in the former ages was hid, but now is manifested to the saints, to whom God would make known what was the riches of the glory of this mystery among the gentiles, which is Christ (preached) among you (as) the hope of glory," ver. 26, 27. "This," saith he, "is the mystery, which from the beginning hath been hid in God," Eph. iii. 9, "the mystery of God and of Christ," ver. 3—5, "That the gentiles should be fellow-heirs (with the believing Jews) and of the same body, and partakers (with them) of his promises in Christ by the gospel," ver. 6 (see also Rom. xvi. 25, 26, Col. iv. 3). And that the gentiles might have a perfect knowledge of this mystery, and of the riches of divine grace, and love to them in it, is the apostle's prayer, Eph. iii. 16—19. But whereas Crellius and Schlictingius here note, that the particle καὶ, "and," added to the word "Christ," distinguishes him as well from God as from the Father: it doth no such matter, but only distinguisheth the mystery of the Father, sending his Son into the world to be a Saviour to the gentiles, from the mystery of Christ, procuring this salvation for them by his blood. "The ecclesiastical tradition," saith Irenæus,* "teaches us to believe in God the Father omnipotent, who made heaven and earth, and in one Jesus Christ the Son of God, incarnate for our salvation, our Lord, God, Saviour, and King." And so these words may be construed, "the mystery of both the Father and Christ" (see note on i. 3).

[3] Ver. 3. Ἐν ᾧ, In whom.] Some make these words relate to the mystery mentioned in the foregoing verse: but it seems rather to respect the person of Christ as Mediator, the knowledge of whom, saith the apostle, hath an excellency beyond all other knowledge (Phil. iii. 8). For ἐν ᾧ περιετμήθητε, "In whom ye are circumcised," ver. 11 of this chapter, and ἐν ᾧ, "In whom ye are risen again," ver. 12, plainly relate to Christ's person and his performances as Mediator; and the whole following chapter speaketh of him, and of the benefits we have received, ἐν αὐτῷ, by him. The apostle also doth apply this to him, by saying, ver. 8, "As you have received the Lord Jesus Christ, so walk in him:" and by warning us against the deceit of vain philosophy, because "in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead." But yet seeing these hid treasures of Christ's wisdom are revealed to us by his gospel only, and thence alone we obtain all our knowledge of him as Mediator, and of all the offices he sustains as such, there seemeth to be no great difference betwixt referring this to his person, and referring it to his doctrine.

[4] Ver. 5. Τὴν τάξιν ὑμῶν, Your order.] As, to "walk disorderly," in the apostle's style, is not to walk according to the traditions they had received from the apostles, or preachers of the gospel (2 Thess. iii. 6), so their order may import their compliance with them in manners, discipline, and union.

[5] Ver. 8. Διὰ φιλοσοφίας, By philosophy, &c.] What is the πιθανολογία, the "enticing speech," ver. 4, and the "philosophy and vain deceit," which the apostle warns them against, is not so easy to determine. Some good interpreters refer what follows in this chapter to the heresy of Simon Magus, and the Gnostics, to which many passages in this chapter may be well applied. Others refer them to the Jewish doctors, who had then mixed the philosophy of the heathens with their ceremonial worship, and had thence the rudiments of the world, (the Jewish rudiments and traditions, Gal. iv. 3,) and not after (the doctrine of) Christ.

9 (Of which philosophy you can have no need;) For in him dwelleth [6] all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.

10 And ye are complete in him (as to all saving knowledge and virtue, 1 Cor. i. 30), which is [7] the head of all principality and power (Eph. i. 20):

11 In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, (as that of the Jews is, but consisting) in [8] putting off the body of the sins of learned to allegorize it; and others divide the matter betwixt Jew and gentile. And that the Jewish doctors are very much concerned in this chapter, we learn from ver. 14 to 16, and "the rudiments of the world," relate to the legal observations, as being common to them with the gentile world (see note on Gal. iv. 8). "The commandments of men," or their traditions, may also have respect to them who were the zealous assertors of them (Matt. xv., Acts xxi. 21). And indeed this verse seems to be the key to, or the foundation of, all that follows in this chapter, ranking the discourse of the apostle under these two heads, viz. cautions against the seductions of the Jews, zealous for the observation of their rites and ceremonies; and against the seductions of heathens by their "vain philosophy," dressed up by them anew, both as to its doctrines and morals, and set off with the most specious pretences, styled here πιθανολογία, "enticing speech."

[6] Ver. 9. Πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα τῆς Θεότητος, All the fullness of the Godhead.] This fullness, according to the Gnostics, was made up of their thirty æons. The heathens, besides the Supreme God, owned many other local gods, presiding over nations, and so made up the plenitude of the Godhead of them all, as of so many partial deities. Against such opinions the apostle here asserts, that "the whole fullness of the Godhead dwelt" in Christ, and that "bodily," i. e. in his body, as its temple: and, say the fathers, as the soul dwelleth in the body; say others, bodily, that is, essentially. The apostle doth not roundly say that Christ is God, but expresses his divine nature thus, partly to represent to the Jews the divinity of Christ, with allusion to the God of Israel dwelling in the temple; partly to oppose him to the πλήρωμα of the Gnostics, and to the partial deities of the heathens. Here therefore it is to be observed,

First, That the apostle doth not here say that the divinity is assistant to Christ, but that the fullness of it doth κατοικεῖν, "reside in him;" which is never said in scripture of any other person, but of him alone, who having styled his body a "temple," John ii. 19. 21, "the fullness of the Deity" may be properly said to dwell in him bodily, as it dwelt symbolically in the ark.

Note, Secondly, That Christ is not here said to be "filled with the fullness of God," as the church is, by reason of the gifts with which she was replenished, and the doctrine she had received from God, Eph. i. 23, but "the whole fullness of the Godhead" is here said to reside in him. Now Θειότης and τὸ Θεῖον do never signify the gifts of God, or the doctrine of the gospel, but the divine nature only; nor can the will or revelation of God be said to "dwell bodily" in any person. I conclude, therefore, that* "the body born of the virgin, receiving the whole fullness of the Godhead bodily, was immutably united to the divinity, and deified; which made the same person, Jesus Christ, both God and man."

[7] Ver. 10. Κεφαλὴ πάσης ἀρχῆς καὶ ἐξουσίας, The head of all principality and power.] Epiphanius informs us,† that Simon Magus devised some names of principalities and powers, saying, that "none could be saved, who learned not the sacred discipline, and how to offer his sacrifice to the Father of all things, by these principalities and powers." In opposition to these things, say some, the apostle asserts that Christ created all these principalities and powers (i. 15), and was the Head and Lord of them, and so in him, without their assistance, the Colossians were complete, and fully instructed to salvation.

Or else these things may be referred to Cerinthus and his followers. For,

First, He lived in the apostle's times, and was a great opposer of the truth of the gospel, and particularly an enemy to Paul,* because he contended it was not necessary for the Jews, nor lawful for the gentiles, to observe the law of Moses, for which Cerinthus was a zealot. And he, saith the same Epiphanius,† "reproved Peter for going in to the uncircumcised, and raised the tumult in Antioch about circumcision."

Secondly, He lived long in Egypt,‡ and was instructed in philosophical sciences, and from thence went and set up his sect in Asia the Less, and Syria, say Theodoret and Epiphanius.§ Being therefore skilled in philosophy, and setting up his heresy in Asia Minor, where Colosse was, he may well be here reflected on by St. Paul, especially if we consider how much his opinions agreed with those which are here censured by him. For,

Thirdly, He was zealous for circumcision, and other observances of the law of Moses, and so concerned in what is here said, ver. 11. 14—17. (2.) He said,‖ "The world was made by angels, or inferior virtues, and not by the supreme God; and that he himself received his doctrine by the revelation of angels." (3.) He held Jesus to be born of Joseph and Mary, as other men, and Christ to have "descended upon him, and at his passion to have returned to his pleroma."

And John refuted him, saith Irenæus, "by establishing the principle of one God omnipotent, who made all things visible and invisible by his Word;" which is the very thing the apostle in this chapter doth assert.

[8] Ver. 11. Τῇ ἀπεκδύσει, &c. The putting off the body of the sins of the flesh.] Thus Philo informs us,¶ that circumcision imports "the cutting off our sinful pleasures and passions, and our impious opinions" (see Rom. ii. 28, 29; and the reading of the text defended, Examen Millii).

16 Let no man therefore judge (or condemn) you in

The apostle here plainly discourseth against those heretics, or false apostles, who laboured to introduce the necessity of circumcision. Now that Cerinthus was one who pleaded for the necessity of it, Epiphanius, St. Austin, and others, do inform us; but that Simon Magus did so, I find not in church history. The Apostolical Constitutions* speak of some false apostles, who held it necessary περιτέμνεσθαι νομίμως, "to circumcise men according to the law;" but then they are distinguished from the impure heresy of Simon Magus, who was so far from contending for the observation of the law and prophets, that he taught his followers,† νόμῳ καὶ προφήταις μὴ χρᾶσθαι, "not to regard them,‡ μηδὲ φρίττειν, not to fear the threats of the law," as being not the law of God, ἀλλ' ἀριστερᾶς δυνάμεως, "but of some evil power," saith Theodoret; and declaring, saith Epiphanius,§ that "whosoever believed the Old Testament incurred death." Note,

Secondly, That the apostle speaking here of the circumcision made without hands, and of the circumcision made in baptism, and consisting in the putting off the sins of the flesh, cannot, by the circumcision of Christ, mean his own personal circumcision which was made with hands, but that which he hath instituted in the room of it, viz. baptism. Note, Thirdly, That baptism therefore is a rite of initiation to Christians, as circumcision was to the Jews; for, by virtue of our spiritual circumcision in baptism, he proves we have no need of the outward circumcision to be a type of the purity obtained by baptism.

Fourthly, Hence I infer, that baptism is Christ's ordinance for infants of believing parents, as circumcision was of old for the infants of the Jews; for if it had been otherwise, and infants under Christianity had not been received by any federal rite into covenant with God, the objection of the necessity of circumcision as to them would have still held, they entering into covenant by no other rite, and so remaining strangers from the church, and as much aliens from the adoption, the covenant, and promises, as the gentiles were; which sure the Jews would have objected, if truly they could have done it, to the reproach of Christianity. That institution therefore must, for the comfort and satisfaction of their parents, afford some way of sanctifying these infants, or of admitting them among the number of God's children, which being confessedly no other than that of baptism, it must be supposed to allow that to them, that by it, in the phrase of Irenæus,‖ infantes et parvuli renascantur in Deum, "infants and little children may be regenerated."

[9] Ver. 13. Καὶ τῇ ἀκροβυστίᾳ τῆς σαρκος, And the uncircumcision of the flesh.] By the defect of circumcision, they being, saith the parallel place, on that account without Christ, being "aliens from the commonwealth of Isreal, and strangers from the covenant of promise," Eph. ii. 11, 12.

[10] Ver. 14. Χειρόγραφον τοῖς δόγμασιν, The hand-writing of ordinances.] Δόγμα is a rescript or ordinance concerning any thing, a royal or imperial decree (Dan. ii. 13, iii. 10. 12. 29, vi. 8. 10. 13. 15. 26, Luke ii. 1, Acts xvii. 7). Hence ritual prescriptions are called δόγματα, Ezek. xx. 26. "The hand-writing of ordinances," in the parallel epistle, Eph. ii. 15, is "the law of commandments, ἐν δόγμασι, in ritual ordinances," or the ceremonial law; and it is said here to be against and contrary to the gentiles, as being "a middle wall of partition," hindering them from coming to God, and putting an emnity betwixt them and God's people (ver. 14, 15), which Christ hath taken away by abolishing and dissolving the obligation of it, and admitting the gentiles "fellow-heirs of the same promises" and blessings with the Jews without it; or it is contrary to us, as being the ministration of death and condemnation (2 Cor. iii. 7. 9).

[11] Ver. 15. Τὰς ἀρχὰς καὶ ἐξουσίας.] The principalities and powers here mentioned, are the powers of wickedness, the spirits of Satan, who is styled ἡ ἐξουσία τοῦ σκότους, "the power of darkness," Luke xxiii. 53, and "of the air," Eph. ii. 2; ὁ ἄρχων, "the prince of the world," John xii. 31, xiv. 30; whose emissaries are "the principalities and powers, the rulers of the darkness of this world, the spiritual wickednesses in high places," against which we wrestle, Eph. vi. 12. These powers Christ destroyed by his cross, because, as the apostle saith, "through death he destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and delivered them who, through the fear of death, were all their lives subject to bondage," Heb. ii. 14, 15. Moreover, the heathen lay under two great infelicities; (1.) That they were "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise, and without God in the world." The remedy which divine wisdom found out, and our Lord's salutary passion effected, with respect to this, is discoursed of in the preceding verse. (2.) That they were subject to the power and delusions of evil and apostate spirits, "walking according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience." These principalities and powers Christ despoiled on the cross, by the name of a crucified Jesus, and by the very sign of the cross, casting out the prince of the world from his dominions, temples, and oracles, and from those human bodies he possessed; and so openly convincing the heathens, that the deities they so long had worshipped, were evil spirits, and, by the miracles wrought in his name, drawing them from their heathen worship to him. And this exposition is confirmed from these words, "He made a show of them openly," which plainly seemeth to refer to this conquest over them. Moreover, it may be noted, that Simon and Cerinthus held, εἶναι τὸν αἰῶνα ἀπὸ ἀρχῶν τούτων καὶ ἐξουσιῶν τῆς κακίας κατεσκευασμένον, "that the world was made by these evil spirits," and men were subject to the power of them; "and were per eum et Helenam suam ex illis angelicis potestatibus liberandos,* to be delivered by Simon and his Helen from them." This, saith the apostle, our Lord hath fully done upon the cross, and so we need no assistance of Simon or Cerinthus to perform this work; and much less need we the assistance of those demons which the heathens worshipped as good angels, who had the government of the inferior world committed to them, Christ having triumphed over them, and wholly spoiled them of that power. And from these heathen deities he passes on again to the rudiments of the Jews, making that inference from what had been discoursed from ver. 11 to the 14th, which we see in the following verses.

[12] Ἐν αὐτῷ, In it.] It is certain that Origen† and others of the ancients read, ἐν ξύλῳ, "on the wood;" so did the Arabic version; others read, ἐν ἑαυτῷ, "in himself;" but seeing that reading, as St. Jerome testifies, is only in the Latin copies, and since Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, read as we and most copies do, without taking notice of any other reading, we may rely securely on it.

[13] Ver. 17. Σκία τῶν μελλόντων, A shadow of things to come.] Dr. Spencer well observes, that there is no necessity from these words, of asserting that these, and all the ritual constitutions of the law of Moses, shadowed forth some Christian mystery: but only that they were but as mere shadows, compared to that solid and substantial truth Christ by his gospel hath discovered to us, as Josephus, speaking of Archelaus, who exercised the kingly power without the title of it, saith, ἦκει παρὰ τοῦ δεσπότου σκίαν αἰτησάμενος βασιλείας, τῆς ὕστερον ἑαυτῷ τὸ σῶμα, "He came to request of Cæsar the shadow of that kingdom, the body of which he had usurped or snatched to himself before" (De Bello Jud. lib. ii. cap. 4, p. 777).

Note, Secondly, That ἐν μέρει ἑορτῆς, is well rendered "in respect," or "on account of a feast;" as when the apostle saith, "That which was made glorious was not glorious, ἐν μέρει τούτῳ, in this respect," 2 Cor. iii. 10, and, "I have sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be found vain, τούτῳ μέρει, in this respect," ix. 3; and when Peter saith, "If any man suffer as a Christian, let him glorify God, ἐν τούτῳ μέρει, on this account." So 2 Macc. xv. 18, "The care they took for their wives and children, was ἐν ἥττονι μέρει, of no account with them, their chief care being for the temple." Now hence, to make out the argument against the Sabbatarians, note,

First, That the hand-writing of ordinances here mentioned respecteth ceremonial ordinances; for of them only it can be truly said, they were "against us," and were "contrary to us;" they were blotted out, and "nailed to the cross" of Christ, and were "shadows of," or in respect of "things to come."

Secondly, That when it is said, "Let no man judge you in respect of those things," the meaning is, Let no man censure or condemn the Christian for not observing these new moons, feasts, or sabbaths.

Thirdly, That the apostle here by "sabbaths" does not mean the first and last days of the great Jewish feasts, which were by them observed as sabbaths; or the sabbath of the seventh year, or of the year of jubilee: but only, or chiefly, the weekly sabbaths of the Jews.

First, Because the apostle having said before, "Let no man condemn you" for not observing the Jewish festivals, or any part of them, cannot rationally be supposed in the words following to condemn only the same thing.

Secondly, In the New Testament the word "sabbath," or "sabbaths," is used above sixty times, and in fifty-six of those places it doth unquestionably signify the Jewish weekly sabbaths, and in the other the whole week. Since, then, the "sabbath" in the New Testament is never used for the first or last days of the Jewish feasts, but is there ordinarily used for their weekly sabbath, we ought in reason to conclude, it here imports that seventh-day sabbath which it doth usually import in other places; and not those solemn days of the Jewish feasts, those jubilees, or seven years' sabbaths, which it doth never elsewhere signify in the New Testament.

Thirdly, Where the word "sabbath" is mentioned in the Old Testament, in conjunction with new moons, or Jewish feasts, it doth import the seventh-day sabbath distinctly from all others; as will appear from the persual of all the places where these things are jointly mentioned, as 2 Kings iv. 23, Isa. i. 13, lxvi. 23, Lam. ii. 6, Ezek. xlv. 17, xlvi. 1, Hos. ii. 2, Amos viii. 4. Being then here mentioned with new moons and Jewish feasts, it is reasonable to conceive it signifies the seventh-day sabbath.

Fourthly, The sabbath-day in the Old Testament is often contradistinguished to all other solemn feasts, and more particularly to new moons and anniversary feasts; and therefore, being here mentioned with them, we may presume it cannot signify them, or any portion of them, but rather that it doth import that Jewish sabbath which in other places is put in opposition to them, as 1 Chron. xxiii. 31, 2 Chron. ii. 4, xxxi. 3, Neh. x. 32, 33. Seeing then the word "sabbath," wherever it is used in conjunction with new moons or feasts, in scripture, still signifies the Jewish weekly sabbath, we cannot doubt, but, in conjunction with them here, it signifies the same thing. Seeing the word is often put in opposition to new moons and solemn feasts, indefinitely taken, what reason have we to conceive, that in this place it should be taken for any part or portion of them? Hence then I argue thus:

No man ought to condemn the Christian for not observing the Jewish sabbath, because Christ hath "blotted out the hand-writing of ceremonial ordinances which was against them;" wherefore the Jewish sabbath being a ceremonial ordinance, therefore it is blotted out; therefore the Christian is not obliged to observe it. Again, that which is joined with meats and drinks, and with new moons, which are things confessedly ceremonial, no difference at all being observed by the apostle, as to their being named hand-writings, things cancelled, shadows, and the like, that must be ceremonial. Lastly, That which is a shadow of, or in respect of things to come, of which Christ by his advent exhibited the body, that must be ceremonial, that must be cancelled and abolished by Christ, and then the Jewish sabbath must be so.

[14] Ver. 18. Καταβραβευέτω, Let no man beguile you of your reward.] So Suidas, παραλογιζέτω, "Let no man put a cheat upon you." So Phavorinus, ἐπηρεαζέτω, "Let no man damage you" (Chrysostom and Theophylact).

Καταβραβεύειν.] This word signifies to give the prize to one, when the victory was obtained by the other; so Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact; accordingly Suidas* saith, This is the thing which the apostle means by the word, and because, by this unjust sentence, the person to whom it is due is deprived of his reward, hence it comes to bear that sense; and so the whole is by Stephanus rendered, Nemo vos debito brabio fraudet; which, as it justifies our translation, so it shows the damage Christians will sustain by thus worshipping angels, even the loss of that crown of glory, which Christ hath purchased for his faithful subjects.

[15] Θέλων ἐν ταπεινοφροσύνῃ, Pleasing himself in his humility.] Or, affecting it, and so not addressing to God immediately, but by angels; for so the word θέλειν answers to the Hebrew חפץ, which imports pleasing or delighting ourselves in any thing. So 1 Sam. xviii. 12, θέλει ἐν σοὶ ὁ βασιλεὺς, "The king is pleased with thee;" 2 Sam. xv. 26, "If he say, οὐκ ἐθέλησα ἐν σοὶ, I am not pleased with thee;" Matt. xx. 26, 27, ὃς ἂν θέλῃ ἐν ὑμῖν, "Who among you affects to be great or first;" and, xxvii. 43, "Let him deliver him, εἰ θελεῖ αὐτόν, if he delighteth in him." As for the persons here referred to, note,

First, That the Greek commentators affirm generally, that the apostle doth through this whole epistle oppose himself to some false Christians, who held δεῖν συνάγεσθαι ἡμᾶς πρὸς τὸν πατέρα διὰ τῶν ἁγίων ἀγγέλων, "that we ought to address to the Father by the holy angels." But then some of them add, that the pretence of humility was this,† "that it was too much for us to come to God immediately by Christ, this being above our infirmity." But this, though it agrees well with the humility here mentioned, it seems not to accord either with the principles of Simon Magus, who held himself to be both the Father and the Son; or of Cerinthus, who account) worshipping of angels, [16] intruding (or searching) into those things (by the strength of his natural reason) which he hath not seen, (being) vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind (as if he were able by it to know the nature and the offices of angels), held Christ was only a man, born after the common way of generation, and so could not exalt him thus above the angels; and much less doth it accord with the sentiments of the heathens. Œcumenius saith, the apostle speaketh here of them who did, τὰς νομικὰς παρατηρήσεις τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ ἐπιμιγνύειν, "mix legal observances with the gospel;" and Theophylact, that he speaks περὶ τῶν Ἰουδαιζομένων, "of the Judaizers." And Theodoret* explains this more fully thus: "They who were zealous for the law, persuaded men to worship angels, because, say they, the law was given by them: this they advised men to do, pretending humility, and saying, that the God of all things was invisible, and inaccessible, and incomprehensible, and that it was fit we should procure the divine favour by means of angels." Now if this be so, this passage cannot well agree to Simon Magus and his followers; for though they worshipped angels, as Irenæus,† Tertullian,‡ Epiphanius,§ Theodoret‖ note, and held that their proarche or propator, was so inaccessible and incomprehensible; yet did they not seem to worship God by angels, but rather to perform their magical operations by invoking them. He also, and his followers, as hath been shown, were enemies to the law, and so could not introduce the worship of good angels upon this account, that the law was given by them.

But then as for Cerinthus, and other false apostles of the Jews, they owned Christ Jesus as the Messiah, and yet were stiff assertors of the obligations of the law; and they by their philosophy had introduced the worship of angels, after the heathen manner. For Epiphanius informs us of Cerinthus, that he said,¶ "The law and the prophets came from the angels; and that he who gave the law was one of the angels that made the world." They had imbibed the philosophy of Plato, which saith, "The demons are of a middle nature betwixt gods and mortals; that they brought our prayers and offerings to them, and their commands to us, and were to be worshipped and invoked upon that account:" that God had no immediate commerce with men, but all his converse with us was by the mediation of these demons. And suitably to this philosophy we find the angel, Tobit xii. 12. 15, saying that he was "one of the seven angels οἱ προσαναφέρουσι τὰς προσευχὰς τῶν ἁγίων, who offered up the prayers of the saints:" and that when Tobit and Sara prayed, he "brought the memorial of their prayer before the Holy One." And Philo,†† in several places declares, that as the philosophers said of their demons and heroes, so Moses "introduces the angels, πρεσβευομένας, doing the office of ambassadors, καὶ διαγγελλούσας τάτε παρὰ τοῦ ἡγεμόνος τοῖς ὑπηκόοις ἀγαθὰ, καὶ τῷ βασιλεῖ ὧν εἰσιν ὑπήκοοι χρείας, and being messengers of good things from God to his subjects, and carrying back to God their needs." In his book of the Giants* he styles them "ambassadors of good communications of men to God, and of God again to men." And in his book de Somniis,† he represents them as "the ears and eyes of the great King, seeing and hearing all things, for," saith he, "they bring the commands of the Father to his children, and the needs of the children to the Father: not that God needs their ministry, but that it is very needful and beneficial for us frail men to have such mediators, as being unable, not only to receive God's chastisements, but even his very benefits, should he immediately confer them on us by himself." If Cerinthus had imbibed this philosophy, which had then obtained among the Jews, and was so well known in the world, that one so much instructed in it, as Theodoret saith he was, could not well be ignorant of it, here is a sufficient foundation for his introducing the worship of those angels which gave the law, under pretence of humility; Philo‡ declaring, that when the law was first given, "the people desired it might be so, and requested of God these mediators; saying, Speak thou to us, and let not God speak to us, lest we die."

[16] Ἃ μὴ ἑώρακεν ἐμβατεύων, Intruding into those things he hath not seen.] So read all the Greek and Latin copies now extant; Esthius. Now this did the philosophers, and those Christians, which embraced their sentiments, in all their inducements to worship these angels and inferior spirits; as, v. g.

First, In their pretence that§ "the divine nature could not immediately be conversed with, but that all the intercourse betwixt God and men was by the intermediation of these demons; it being a debasing of the divine nature, to think we could converse with him without their intervention."

Secondly, In saying that they were to be worshipped, χάριν τῆς εὐφήμου διαπορείας, "for their laudable intercession; and, διὰ τῆς εἰεργεσίας, for the benefits of common life we receive from them."‖

Thirdly, As having from the supreme Deity their power and authority, and presiding over us, κατὰ τάξιν ἥ ἕκαστος ἐτάχθη, "according to the order appointed to them;" and being therefore worshipped, θείῳ νόμῳ καὶ θείᾳ βουλήσει, "by the divine law and counsel;" and only, saith Celsus, as he will have them to be honoured (Plato in Phædro, p. 264. Hierocles in Carm. Pythag. p. 9, 18. Celsus apud Orig. lib. viii. p. 381).

Fourthly, Because, by worshipping these ministers of his, we do a thing, φίλον ἐκείνῳ, "grateful to him," saith Celsus.¶ Now in all these things they did manifestly ἐμβατεύειν, "intrude into things" of which they neither had, nor could have, any knowledge from the light of nature. And so do also the Romanists, in saying that saints and angels see all things, or perceive our prayers, by seeing him who seeth all things; that they are worshipped by the divine law and counsel; and that by invoking them we do a thing grateful to him: it being certain that nothing of this nature can be proved from scripture, or from primitive tradition.

Moreover, Theodoret and Œcumenius here observe, that this worship of angels continued long in Pisidia, Phrygia, and Laodicea, near to Colosse, where they had εὐκτήρια τοῦ

19 And (so) [17] not holding the Head (Christ), from which all the body [18] by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and (being) knit together, increaseth with the increase of God.

20 Wherefore if ye (by your profession) be dead with Christ from the [19] rudiments of the world (which he hath nailed to his cross, and took out of the way, ver. 4), why, as though living (yet) in (conformity to) the world, [20] are ye subject to (the) ordinances (and decrees of men?

21 Such as these are,) [21] (Touch not (what is offered to an idol; or, touch not a woman, 1 Cor. vii. 1); [22] taste not (forbidden meats); [23] handle not (an unclean thing);

22 [24] Which all are to perish with the using) (or tend to corruption by the using or abusing them); after the commandments and doctrines of men?

23 Which (are) [25] things have indeed a shew of wisdom in will worship, and humility (ver. 8), and neglecting of the body (ver. 21); (and) not in (giving) any honour (to it) to the satisfying of the flesh.

ἁγίου Μιχαὴλ, "oratories of St. Michael, the captain of the Lord's host," as he is called, Josh. v. 14; which leads us to the very rise of this worship, both among Jews and Christians. For the Jews generally held, that he who is styled "the captain of the Lord's host," was the angel Michael (see note on Heb. ii. 5). And his office, saith Origen,* is mortalium preces, supplicationesque curare, "to present the prayers of men;" and in the book of the Pastor we read, saith he, that Christians, ἅμα τὸ πιστεύειν ὑπὸ τοῦ Μιχαὴλ γίνονται, "as soon as they believe are under the government of Michael."—"The good messenger," saith Hermas,† "being Michael, qui populi hujus habet potestatem, et gubernat eos, who hath the government over his people." Whence by Nicephorus,‡ he is styled, ὁ τῆς Χριστιανῶν πίστεως ἔφορος, "the president or overseer of the Christian faith."

[17] Ver. 19. Καὶ οὐ κρατῶν τὴν κεφαλὴν, And not holding the head.] Hence it appeareth, First, That the apostle here speaks of such persons as had embraced Christianity, owning Christ Jesus to be the head of the church, and being by profession "dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world," ver. 20.

Secondly, That the fault they were guilty of, was not the worshipping angels, as mediators of redemption, but of intercession only; i. e. as mediators to bring us to God, and to present our prayers to him, as appears from the foregoing note.

Thirdly, That Jesus Christ is represented in the holy scripture as he by whom we have, προσαγωγὴν πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν, "access to God" in prayer with confidence (Eph. ii. 18, iii. 12, Heb. x. 19—22); and so having access to him by prayer, through any other mediator of intercession, must be intrenching on the office of the head of the church, and so not holding the head: and that the practice of the church of Rome in praying to angels is here condemned, I have fully proved in a discourse of the idolatry of the church of Rome, ch. xi.

[18] Ἐπιχορηγούμενον, By joints and bands having nourishment ministered.] i. e. From which head communicating the gifts of the Spirit to his mystical, as the head doth its spirits to the natural body, the whole body of Christians (duly compacted together, by the assistance which every part of it gives to the whole; some sustaining the office of inferior heads, some of an eye, some of a hand or foot, 1 Cor. xii. 15—17,) increaseth in that love which proceedeth from the God of love, which he requires and approves, and which tends to his glory, and is therefore styled "the increase of God;" as that righteousness which he approves and accepts of, is styled "the righteousness of God," Rom. i. 17, 2 Cor. v. 21, Phil. iii. 9, Jam. i. 20 (see the note on Eph. iv. 15, 16).

[19] Ver. 20. Ἀπὸ τῶν στοιχείων τοῦ κόσμου, From the rudiments of the world.] That these rudiments signify the Mosaical institutions, as being, for matter, mostly the same with the rites used by the heathens, is proved by the note on Gal. iv. 3. And this is also evident from the argument here used to restrain the Colossians from being still in bondage to them, viz. that they are blotted out, cancelled, and done away by the death of Christ, to which we profess to be conformed (ver. 14). To "live in the world," is to live after the prescripts of the men of the world, by whom these rites were used.

[20] Δογματίζεσθε; Are ye subject to ordinances?] Δογματίζεσθαι is to make rules and constitutions concerning these things. Thus of the feast of dedication of the temple purged from defilement, ἐδογμάτισαν μετὰ κοινοῦ προστάγματος, "they ordained by a common statute and decree, that every year those days should be kept" (2 Macc. x. 8). So when Judas had slain Nicanor, ἐδογμάτισαν πάντες μετὰ καινοῦ ψηφίσματος, "they ordained all with a common decree, in no case to let that day pass without solemnity" (xv. 36, see Esth. iii. 9, 3 Esdr. vi. 34). And so that may be rendered here, "Why, as living yet in conformity to the world, are ye subject to the decrees and constitutions about them?" Such as are,

[21] Ver. 21. Μὴ ἅψῃ, Touch not.] This may refer either to what is mentioned by Paul, as the aphorism of some philosophers or heretics, "It is good for a man, μὴ ἅπτεσθαι, not to touch a woman:" or it may be referred to things suffocated, or dead of themselves, or offered to idols; which, as Clemens of Alexandria saith,* the Jews were not allowed to touch.

[22] Μηδὲ γεύσῃ, Taste not.] This, doubtless, refers to meats and drinks, either flesh and wine, which some of the philosophers, particularly the Pythagoreans, would not taste of. And some false apostles, mentioned by the Apostolical Constitutions,† forbade marriage, and "required men to abstain from flesh and wine; representing marriage, and the procreation of children, and the eating of flesh, as things abominable."

[23] Μηδὲ θίγῃς, Handle not] Any thing which may pollute you by touching it, or being offered to idols.

[24] Ver. 22. Ἅ ἐστι πάντα εἰς φθορὰν τῇ ἀποχρήσει, All which things perish in the using.] The word φθόρα is used often by Peter speaking of such men, not for a natural, but a moral corruption, as when he saith, they were partakers of the divine nature, "who have escaped τὴν φθορὰν, the pollution which is in the world through lust," 2 Pet. i. 4, and that "they, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things they understand not, and shall perish, ἐν τῇ φθορᾷ αὐτῶν, in their own corruption," 2 Pet. ii. 12, and ver. 19, "Whilst they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants, τῆς φθορᾶς, of corruption." And so the meaning of these words may be, That when these things are observed in compliance with the commands and doctrines of men, as things necessary, they corrupt men who use them thus. But I prefer the other sense, which saith, that these meats perish in the using, according to that aphorism of the civil law,§ "We use those things which remain after the use of them;" his verò abutimur, quæ nobis utentibus pereunt.

[25] Ver. 23. Ἅτινά ἐστι λόγον μὲν ἔχοντα τῆς σοφίας, Which things have a show of wisdom.] These words plainly refer to the former verses; ἐθελοθρησκείᾳ, "will-worship," to the θέλων ἐν θρησκείᾳ τῶν ἀγγέλων, "pleasing themselves in the worshipping of angels;" and so it must be as bad as that; the "show of humility," to the doing this from a pretence of humility, ver. 18, the "neglecting of the body, and making no provisions for it, to the satisfying of the flesh," to the abstinence from flesh, wine, and women, and from things offered to idols.

It remains only to consider who were the persons here intended. That they were not the Gnostics, or followers of Simon Magus, is evident: "For they," saith Irenæus,§

§ Ταῖς τῆς σαρκὸς ἡδοναῖς κατακόρως ἐουλεύοντες, καὶ λάθυν

"were men who indulged to the flesh, and who privily corrupted the women whom they taught; they were carefully to meditate upon the mystery of wedlock, and upon that account enticed other men's wives to themselves." And Epiphanius adds,* that "they participated of all manner of flesh: that they indulged to drunkenness and venery, execrating them who were used to fastings." They therefore could not be the men who neglected the body, by abstaining from meats, and made no provision for the flesh. They therefore seem to me to have been partly the Essenes, and partly the Pythagorean philosophers. For,

First, Of the Essenes, Josephus saith, that οὐτὲ γαμετὰς εἰσάγονται, &c.,† "they neither would have wives nor servants:" as thinking servitude an injury to our common nature, or tending to injustice: and marriage, to sedition. And again, γάμου μὲν, ὑποψία παρ' αὐτοῖς,‡ "They contemn marriage, not because they would have marriage taken away, or the succession of mankind to cease; but to avoid the intemperance of women, and because they think none of them can keep their faith to one." Philo says,§ "They have women with them, but they are only such as are γηραιαὶ, old women, or, παρθένοι τὴν ἁγνείαν, virgins as to their chastity, not out of necessity, but, διὰ ζῆλον καὶ πόθον σοφίας, from their zeal to, and desire of, wisdom." He adds, σιτοῦνται δὲ πολυτελὲς οὐδὲν, ἀλλὰ ἄρτον εὐτελῆ καὶ ὄψον ἁλῆς, &c.,‖ "They eat nothing that is delicate, having only mean bread, and salt for their meat; and if they be delicate, hyssop for their sauce, and river-water for their drink. ¶They use no wine in their feasts, οἶνος μὲν γὰρ ἀφροσύνης φάρμακον, for wine (say they) is the incentive to madness." He goes on, τράπεζα καθαρὰ τῶν ἐναίμων, "Their table is pure from all things that have blood in them, or from the flesh of living creatures; for such things (say they) irritate concupiscence." And of this abstinence from certain meats they are so tenacious, saith Josephus, that "they will rather endure all sorts of torments, ἢ φάγωσί τι τῶν ἀσυνήθων, than eat any thing they were not accustomed to eat." Moreover, there were some things they must not touch, as oil;†† "for κηλίδα ὑπολαμβάνουσιν τὸ ἔλαιον, they look on oil as a defilement; so that if any of them be unwillingly anointed with it, he must wash it off from his body. The younger amongst them must not touch the elders,‡‡ ὥστε εἰ ψαύσειαν αὐτῶν ἐκείνους ἀπολούεσθαι, καθάπερ ἀλλοφύλῳ συμβέροντας, and if they touched them, the elders washed themselves as if they had touched an alien." They were such strict observers of the sabbath, that they would provide no meat for themselves, nor go to stool on that day. They had also* τὰ τῶν ἀγγέλων ὀνόματα, "certain names of angels which they held in veneration;" and also proper δόγματα, "opinions or decrees, which they swore never to deliver to others, otherwise than as they had received them." And thus they dogmatized. And, lastly, all this was the effect τῆς περὶ φιλοσοφίας ὁρμῆς, "of their passion for philosophy," of which Philo† so often speaks in his description of them. So great reason is there to conceive they may be concerned in this chapter.

Secondly, These things being introduced as the rudiments of the world, and living according to these δόγματα, "prescriptions," being living as in the world, I chiefly incline to refer these things to the abstinence from touching and tasting flesh and wine, and handling women, and from all the objects which gratify the senses, the taste, the eye, the touch, taught by the followers of Pythagoras and Empedocles; and defended with such variety of learning by Porphyry, the very title of whose book is, De Abstinentiâ ab Esû Animalium, "Of abstinence from eating the flesh of any living creature." This he founds upon this principle, that τὸ ζῆν κατὰ τὸν νοῦν,‡ "to live the intellectual life, and to enjoy the contemplation of the most perfect Being, it is necessary we should abstract our minds, as much as is possible, from all sensual objects;" from the pleasures which arise, διὰ γεύσεως, "from the taste," particularly of wine; and from the touch: for, saith he, ἁφαὶ, "the sensual objects which we touch are not only σωματοῦσαι τὴν ψυχὴν, such as transform the soul into the body, but also such as stir up swarms of lusts and passions in it." Hence he infers, that all these things are, τὰ αἰσχρὰ, "filthy and polluting, and such as hinder τῆς ψυχῆς καθαρὰν ἐνέργειαν, the pure operations of the soul;" therefore, he that would live the intellectual life, must abstain§ "not only from the use of women, but from all sensual things, they being such as do defile the soul." Moreover, what the apostle speaks of the deceit of philosophy, exactly agrees with the sentiments of those men. Doth he say, that it is κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν ἀνθρώπων; i. e. "according to the tradition of men?" this abstinence is styled by Porphyry,‖ νόος ἄγραφος καὶ θεῖος, "a divine, but unwritten law." Doth he say of them, δογματίζονται, "They make decrees and ordinances?" this opinion is by Porphyry¶ styled δόγμα παλαιὸν καὶ θεῖος φίλον, "an ancient decree, and acceptable to the gods;" and, τὸ διοριζόμενον, "a constitution," or a thing defined. Doth the apostle style it ἐθελοθρησκεία, "will-worship?" it is also by Heraclides Ponticus styled δεισιδαιμονία, "superstition;" and said by Porphyry especially, to be done on the account of wisdom, and the subduing of the body: so full an agreement is there betwixt this philosophy, and that which the epistle hath here said concerning it.

CHAPTER III.

IF ye then be risen with Christ (through faith, ii. 12, and by newness of life, Rom. vi. 4, 5), [1] seek those things which are above, where Christ (now raised from the dead) sitteth on the right hand of God.

2 Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth.

3 For ye are dead (to sin, Rom. vi. 6—8, and to the world, Gal. vi. 14, and from the rudiments of it, ii. 20), [2] and your (future) life is hid with Christ in God.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1, 2. Τὰ ἄνω ζητεῖτε, ver. 1, φρονεῖτε, ver. 2.] These phrases seem to import (1.) that we should put the highest estimate and value on things above. (2.) That we should have them fixed on our spirits, and familiarly occurring to our thoughts, by fervent meditations and serious reflections on them. (3.) That we should have our wills inclined to them, and our affections possessed with frequent love, and passionate desires of them; for φρονεῖν is, saith Phavorinus, λογίζεσθαι, καὶ ἐνθυμεῖσθαι, στέργειν καὶ ἀποδέχεσθαι. (4.) That we should employ our faculties and members in pursuit of them with diligence and constancy; for ζητεῖν is niti, curare, summo studio quærere, as ζητῶ ποιῆσαι in Demosthenes, ζητῶ ἀφελεῖσθαι, nitor auferre, Plutarch, ζητεῖν δὲ πολυπραγμονεῖν, Schol. Aristoph. p. 289.

[2] Ver. 3. Ἡ ζωὴ ὑμῶν ἐν τῷ Θεῷ.] i. e. Your true life,

4 [3] When Christ, who is (the author and purchaser of) our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.

5 [4] Mortify therefore (in order to the enjoyment of this life with God) your members which are upon the earth (i. e. your earthly carnal members); fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, [5] evil concupiscence, and [5] covetousness, which is idolatry:

9 (And) [9] Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds (see note on Eph. iv. 22); which consists in fruition of God, and which you shall live for ever with him, is hid with Christ, who is now removed from your sight, and placed at the right hand of God; for "it doth not yet appear what we shall be," 1 John iii. 2.

[3] Ver. 4.] Note, hence we learn that Christians are not to expect to reign with Christ on earth a thousand years, because they are not to mind or seek, τὰ ἐπὶ γῆς, "the things upon earth," but only "those above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God:" whereas, were this life on earth a blessing and reward, which God had promised to them for their sufferings, they might mind it, and set their affection on it: as also from all those places where the hope, reward, inheritance of Christians, is said to be reserved in the heavens for them: for, as Œcumenius notes, εἰ ἐν οὐρανοῖς ἡ κληρονομία μυθώδης ἡ χιλιοέτης ἀποκατάστασις, "if our inheritance be in heaven, the supposed millennium on earth must be but a fable." "Great is your reward in heaven," saith Christ to the Christian sufferer, Matt. v. 12, Luke ix. 23, "Your hope is laid up for you in heaven," Col. i. 5 (see 1 Pet. i. 4).

[4] Ver. 5. Νεκρώσατε οὖν, Mortify therefore your earthly members.] There being in us naturally "the old man," ver. 9, Eph. iv. 22, and "the body of sin;" the inordinate affections and lustings of it are styled the members of that body; partly, because they exert themselves by the members of the natural body; and partly, because, as the members of the body are employed to fulfil and accomplish the desires of the natural body, so these affections are employed to gratify the desires of the body of sin: these members are styled "earthly members," because they respect only earthly things, they fix our hearts upon, and employ our minds about them; to mortify them is to resist and to suppress their motions, that we do not obey them, or gratify them in their inordinate desires and affections, but carefully shun all the occasions of sin, and use those means which tend to the subduing of it. And this exhortation being directed to believers, shows that as they are, by profession and by baptismal obligation, dead to sin, so have they continual need to proceed in the practice of this duty, that they be not overcome by the deceitfulness of sin, by their fleshy lusts, which tend to fornication and uncleanness, their desires of worldly honours and vain-glory, which are evil concupiscences, and by the inordinate love of the world, which is styled "covetousness."

[5] Ἐπιθυμία κακὴ, Evil concupiscence.] If hence it follows that all concupiscence is evil, then from διαλογισμοὶ κακοὶ, mentioned Mark iii. 21, it follows, that all thoughts and reasonings are evil: and from ὁμιλίαι κακαὶ, mentioned 1 Cor. xv. 33, it also follows, that all our conversation with one another must be evil: so certain is it, that this place doth not prove that all concupiscence is evil. And to be sure the very first motions of concupiscence, which arise naturally in the sensual appetite, and prevent our reason and deliberation, cannot be here intended, because the apostle reckons this concupiscence among those members of the body which must be mortified, which the first motions of the body can never be.

Secondly, Because he adds, that "because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience:" now these first motions, if suppressed, and not consented to when they arise, can never render us "children of disobedience," and much less subject to the wrath of God. And if Satan hath the power to inject such motions, or raise such ideas in the brain, if they be our sins, though not consented to, it must be in his power to make us sin, whether we will or no. From all which considerations, it seems necessary to understand this of deliberate fleshly lustings indulged to, and not restrained by us.

[6] Ἥτις ἐστιν εἰδωλολατρεία, Covetousness, which is idolatry.] Because, as heathens place their confidence in idols, even so the avaricious man doth place his confidence in gold and silver, which are the matter of their idols; he chiefly doth pursue them, and for their sakes only doth other matters. And that such actions do partake of the true nature of idolatry, reason as well as scripture will evince; for reason shows that love, hope, trust, obedience, are parts of that internal worship which we owe to God in the most excellent degrees, and which he more regards than building temples, or erecting altars, the bending of the knee or body, or any act of outward worship; and therefore in those acts doth more especially consist God's worship; wherefore he that confers them upon any creature in that degree, or in those actions in which they only ought to be ascribed to God, must be as truly an idolater, as he that payeth to a creature any outward act of religious and divine worship; and as the covetous person, though he doth not indeed believe his riches or his money to be a god, yet by so loving, and so trusting in them, as God only ought to be loved and trusted in, he is as truly guilty of idolatry as if he so believed. So, though the Roman catholics do not believe their saints and angels to be God, yet by addressing to them even mental prayers,* and giving them the inward worship of the soul, which, as Austin† well observes, "the catholic church always reserved to God," they are as guilty of idolatry, as if they did believe them to be gods, since thereby they ascribe to them the knowledge of the heart, and of the inward motions of the soul, which only do belong to God.

[7] Ver. 7.] The Colossians dwelling in Phrygia celebrated the sacra of Bacchus,‡ and of the mother of the gods, called therefore Phrygia Mater, and doubtless complied with all the luxury of Asia Minor, of which they were a part.

[8] Ver. 8. Αἰσχρολογίαν, Filthy communication.] This is usually referred to obscene and impure words; but Hesychius, Phavorinus, and J. Pollux, lib. ii. cap. 4, have informed us, that the word signifies "reproachful words," such as tend to put a man to shame; and to this sense the words preceding make it most proper to refer it, "wrath, anger, malice," or evil machinations of the heart, being the inward dispositions which render us disaffected to, and prone to do evil to others; railing and opprobrious speeches, which tend to render our brother infamous to others, being the usual effects of these evil dispositions.

[9] Ver. 9.] Hence it appears, that to be addicted to lying is an evidence that we have not yet put off the old man.

[10] Ver. 10. Εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν, In knowledge.] The Christian faith being "the knowledge of the truth which is after godliness," Tit. i. 1, it being that by which "we escape the pollutions of the world through lust," 2 Pet. ii. 20, and "recover out of the snare of Satan," 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26; that by which we have "all things given us which appertain to life and godliness," 2 Pet. i. 3, and that, saith the apostle here, by which we are enabled to "walk worthy of the Lord unto all well-pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in them," as we increase, εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν τοῦ Θεοῦ, "in the knowledge of God:" the being "renewed in this knowledge," may well import our being "renewed in righteousness and true holiness," as the apostle speaks, Eph. iv. 24; especially if we consider, that whilst the judgment still continues to "approve the things which are most excellent," the will still chooses, and the inferior faculties will be employed in prosecution of them.

[11] Ver. 12. Ὡς ἐκλεκτοὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ, As the elect of God.] That the apostle speaks not here of any absolute election of some particular persons to eternal life, but of their being chosen out of the heathen world to be his church and people, is evident, because he speaks to the church in general; and yet to these elect he promiseth the blessings of Christianity, only if they "continue in the faith rooted and grounded, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel," i. 23, ii. 2. 4. 18, expressing his care and fear, lest they should "be deceived, and robbed of their rewards."

[12] Ver. 15. Βραβευέτω, Rule.] Μεσιτευέτω, ἰδυνέσθω, saith Phavorinus; i. e. Let that peaceable disposition which God requires from all Christians be the umpire and director to compose all differences among you, for peace hath God for its author. He hath called us to it, he hath made us all one body, and nothing is more unseemly or pernicious, than that the members should be at discord with each other. In Josephus* it signifies, "Let him have the chief place:" thus of Jehoshaphat he saith, he did βραβεύειν, ὕπασι ἴσος, "excel, as being equal to them all."

[13] Ver. 16. Ὁ λόγος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, The word of Christ.] The word dictated by the Holy Spirit is therefore the word of Christ (1 Pet. i. 11), as proceeding both from the Father and the Son.

[14] Ἐν χάριτι, Singing with grace.] That is, say some interpreters, χαριέντως, בחן, so as that their hymns may be grateful to others, and be received by them with spiritual delight; which is, say they, the import of the phrase, Eph. iv. 29, Col. iv. 6, but this seems rather to depend on others than ourselves. Say others, he exhorts them to sing with a grateful mind, full of the sense of divine goodness, in which sense, χάρις τῷ Θεῷ is often used (see 1 Cor. xv. 27, 2 Cor. ii. 14): but according to the ancients,† he exhorts them, ἀπὸ χαρίσματος ᾄδειν "to sing by the gifts given them by the Holy Ghost," of which one is the word of wisdom; and this exposition is confirmed by the parallel place, Eph. v. 18, 19, "Be ye filled with the Spirit, speaking to one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs." Now these gifts being chiefly exercised in their assemblies, where especially they did ψάλλειν τῷ Πνεύματι, "sing in the Spirit," 1 Cor. xiv. 15, 16, and every one had his psalm, and his διδαχὴν, "doctrine," ver. 26, I conceive these spiritual songs, in which they were to teach and to admonish one another, may refer chiefly to their assemblies, then managed by their prophets, in which they met together for that end. So Pliny doth inform us, that the Christians used to meet together on a certain day, carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem, "and sing a hymn to Christ as God," lib. x. ep. 97.

[15] Ver. 17. Ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου, In the name of the Lord.] To do all in the name of the Lord, is, First, To have respect in all things to his will, as knowing we are obliged to live to him (2 Cor. v. 14), to the honour of his name and doctrine. Secondly, To be desirous that our actions may be well-pleasing to him (2 Cor. v. 8, 9). Thirdly, To expect acceptance of our actions, prayers (John xiv. 13—16), and praises, through him (Heb. xiii. 15), and a recompense of them hereafter (Eph. vi. 8, here, ver. 25). And, saith Chrysostom,* ἐπὶ πάντων πρότερον αὐτῷ εὐχόμενος, "Praying to him before we begin our work."

[16] Πατρὶ δι' αὐτοῦ, To the Father by him.] "It is the manner of the scriptures," saith Bishop Davenant, "to refer our prayers and praises to the person of the Father, because he is the fountain of the Deity;" add, and because they are to find acceptance through the intercession of, and the presenting of them by, the Son (Rev. viii. 3, 4). Our prayers must be offered to the Father in his name (John xvi. 23), and yet the blessing asked is to be given by him (John xv. 16); that the Father may be glorified in the Son (John xiv. 13, 14). Our praises must be offered up to the Father in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ (Eph. v. 20), by him we must "offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually" (Heb. xiii. 15), these spiritual sacrifices being "acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. ii. 4). And yet it is very frequent in these epistles to pray as well to our Lord Jesus Christ as to God the Father (see note on Rom. x. 13); and in the Revelation, to give praise and glory to him (iv. 9. 11, v. 12, 13): but it is especially to be noted, that all the Greek interpreters here observe that this is spoken against the worship of angels or demons, which the philosophers, and especially the Platonists, had introduced, as thinking them the persons who carried up all our prayers and praises to God, and conveyed down all his blessings to us.

Do all, ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου, in the name of the Lord.] It is well worth the observation, that all the ancient commentators on this epistle do frequently inform us, that it was written to "prevent the worship of angels," and to fix Christians to the worship of Jesus Christ only. Hilary's preface to this epistle saith, it is an exhortation to the Colossians, ne alicui præter Christum aliquam esse spem putarent, "to place no hope in any other but in Christ." Chrysostom notes on the first verse of the first chapter, that the disease of the Colossians being this, that δι' ἀγγέλων προσάγεσθαι ᾠοντο τῷ Θεῷ, "they thought they were to come to God by angels," the apostle endeavours to correct this distemper, by telling them that what he said in this epistle to them was according to the will of God: and Œcumenius brings in the apostle speaking thus; "Know, therefore, that it is according to the will of God: ὑπὸ υἱοῦ ὑμᾶς προσάγεσθαι, that you should come to him by his Son;" and then, πῶς δι' ἀγγέλων προσαγωγὴν εἶναι ὑπειλήφατε; "How is it that you think you should come to him by angels?" And again, "This is the will of the Father, δι' υἱοῦ προσάγεσθαι αὐτῷ τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, καὶ μὴ δι' ἀγγέλων, that men should have access to him by the Son, and not by angels." The same words he repeats on ver. 16, and on ii. 3. Chrysostom notes, that by saying that "all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in him," he teaches πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ αἰτεῖν, "to ask all things by Christ:" Œcumenius, that "the mystery of the Father and the Son is this, τὸ τὴν προσαγωγὴν, τὴν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ γίνεσθαι, καὶ οὐ διὰ τῶν ἁγίων ἀγγέλων, that the introduction to the Father should be by the Son, and not by the holy angels." Theodoret upon this verse saith thus, ἐπειδὴ γὰρ ἐκεῖνοι τοὺς ἀγγέλους σέβειν ἐκέλευον, αὐτὸς τὸ ἐναντίον παρεγγυᾷ· ὥστε καὶ τοὺς λόγους καὶ τὰ ἔργα κοσμῆσαι τῇ μνημῇ τοῦ ἐσσπότου Χριστοῦ, καὶ τῷ Θεῷ δὲ καὶ πατρὶ τὴν εὐχαριστίαν δι' αὐτοῦ ἀναπέμπειν, "Because they (who perverted the Colossians) persuaded them to worship angels, he enjoins the contrary, that they should adorn their words and deeds with the commemoration of the Lord Christ, and send up thanksgiving to God the Father by him, μὴ δι' ἀγγέλων, and not by angels." Chrysostom here having said that "he commands us to do all things according to God, μὴ τοὺς ἀγγέλους ἐπεισαγαγεῖν, and not to introduce the angels," adds that "the devil, envying our honour, τὰ τῶν ἀγγέλων ἐπεισήγαγε, hath introduced the worship of angels;" and concludes thus, "Be he an angel, an archangel, or a cherubim, endure it not, ἐπεὶ οὐδὲ αὐτοὶ οἱ δαίμονες καταδέξονται, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀποσείσονται, for neither will they receive but reject it when they see their Lord dishonoured; ἐγώ σε ἐτίμησα καὶ εἶπον, ἐμὲ κάλει, καὶ σὺ ἀτιμάζεις αὐτόν, I have honoured thee, and said, Call upon me, and thou dishonourest me."

[17] Ver. 19. Ἀγαπᾶτε, Love your wives.] Delighting in their conversation (Prov. v. 18, 19), desiring to promote their welfare both temporal and eternal; for this is surely comprehended in loving her as we do ourselves (Eph. v. 33), providing for her all things necessary to the happiness and comfort of her life; for this is loving her as Christ did love his church (ver. 25). This, say the very heathens, is the property of a *sincere affection in the general, and therefore much more of that affection which we are to bear to our own flesh and body, as the wife is to be esteemed (Eph. v. 28, 29).

[18] Καὶ μὴ πικραίνεσθε πρὸς αὐτὰς, And be not bitter against them.] For, as Ambrose saith, Non es dominus, sed maritus; non ancillam sortitus es, sed uxorem; gubernatorem voluit te esse Deus sexûs inferioris, non tyrannum, Hexam. v. 7. Hence they who sacrificed to Juno Nuptialis, saith Plutarch,* "did separate the gall from the sacrifice, and throw it away, signifying, τὸ μηδέποτε δεῖν χόλην μηδὲ ὀργὴν γάμῳ παρεῖναι, that there should be no bitterness or wrath betwixt those that were married."

[19] Ver. 22. Servants, obey, &c.] In omnibus ad quæ jus domini quod in servum habet, extenditur, et in quibus dominus carnis Domino spiritûs contrarius non est. Hieron.

Κατὰ πάντα, and κατὰ σάρκα, iv. 2, ἐν εὐχαριστίᾳ, ver. 3, τοῦ λόγου, ver. 10, ὁ συναιχμάλωτός μου, are all defended from the censure of Dr. Mills, that they are additions to the text; see Examen Millii.

[20] Ver. 24.] Note, "We are," saith Schlictingius, a Socinian, "to serve Christ as our heavenly Lord, which," saith he,† "comprehends faith in him, obedience in him, and worship and adoration of him, the giving him the honour which agrees to him, and invocation of him." Now, saith Christ, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve," Matt. iv. 10, and God alone is worthy of religious invocation from all Christians, as being only omniscient, omnipresent, and the searcher of all hearts; Christ therefore must be truly God. Moreover, the apostle reckons it part of the idolatry of the heathens that they served or paid religious worship "to them which by nature were no gods," Gal. iv. 8. The Socinians therefore either must confess Christ is by nature, as well as by office, God; or else acknowledge that they are guilty of idolatry, in giving this religious worship to him.

[21] Ver. 25. Προσωποληψία, Respect of persons.] Christ, in judging men at the last day, will have no respect to the quality or external condition of any man's person; but whether he be bond or free, he shall receive recompense "for the good that he hath done" in obedience to him; whether he be master or servant, he shall be punished "for the wrong that he doth" in those relations. It being certain from the second chapter, that the Judaizers were got into the church of Colosse; and that many of them denied that the Jews ought to be servants to any; and the Essenes judging all servitude unlawful (see note on 1 Pet. ii. 15, 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2), this might be the reason why here, and Titus ii., the apostle is so large in charging this duty upon servants.

5 Walk in wisdom (or discretion) toward them that are without (the church, i. e. the heathens, 1 Thess. iv. 12), redeeming the time (i. e. endeavouring to avoid, as much as you are able, by careful circumspection and inoffensive carriage, the dangers you may be exposed to from them. See the note on Eph. v. 15.)

6 Let your speech be alway [3] with grace (mild and courteous), seasoned with salt (wise and discreet), that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man, (so as conduceth to the credit of Christianity, 1 Pet. iii. 15, and to your own safety in these evil times, Eph. v. 16, 17.

7 And as for what concerns me,) All my state shall [4] Tychicus declare unto you, who is a beloved brother, and a faithful minister and fellowservant in the (work of the) Lord:

8 Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that he might know your estate, and comfort your hearts (under your pressures;

9 And) With (him I have sent) [5] Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you (being servant to Philemon, a chief man in Colosse). They shall make known unto you all things which are done here (at Rome).

10 Aristarchus my fellowprisoner saluteth you, and [6] Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, (touching whom (i. e. which Marcus) ye received commandments: if he come unto you, (to) receive him) (kindly);

11 And Jesus, which is called Justus (Acts xviii. 5—7), who are of the circumcision. These [7] only (of the Jews) are my fellowworkers unto (the promotion of) the kingdom of God, which have been a comfort unto me.

12 [8] Epaphras, who is one of you (a citizen of Colosse, see ver. 9), a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God.

13 For I bear him record, that he hath a great zeal for you, and them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis (two other cities in Phrygia).

14 Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. Τὸ δίκαιον, What is just and equal.] Hence it is evident, that justice is to be observed towards servants, and that there be offices of humanity and charity due to them: as, (1.) that we do not look upon them as vile persons, but as partakers of the same grace and nature with us, and so not only servants, but as brethren, Philem. 16. (2.) That we do not always punish all their miscarriages, but sometimes do remit the punishments which in anger we threatened to inflict, Eph. vi. 9. (3.) That we do not make them serve with rigour; οὐ κατατενεῖς αὐτὸν ἐν τῷ μόχθῳ, "Thou shalt not oppress, afflict, or wear him out with labour, but shalt fear the Lord," Lev. xxv. 43. (4.) That we permit them to plead their cause, and to defend their right; provided they do it with humility, not contradicting or speaking against the commands of their masters, Tit. ii. 9. "If I did despise the cause of my man-servant, or maid-servant, when they contended with me; what then shall I do when God riseth up? and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him?" Job xxxi. 13, 14. (5.) That to well-deserving servants we give something even above their wages; and after a long and profitable service, we do not suffer them to go empty from us: "When thou sendest him out from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty; thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy wine-press; of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee, thou shalt give unto him," Deut. xv. 13, 14. These things the Lord commanded under the Old Testament, because their servants were his servants also, redeemed by him out of Egypt (Lev. xxv. 15, Deut. xv. 15): and therefore they seem as strongly to oblige under that economy where we are all the servants of Christ, our common Lord, and redeemed by his precious blood (Eph. vi. 6, 1 Cor. vii. 22, 23).

[2] Ver. 3. Προσευχόμενοι περὶ ἡμῶν, Praying for us.] That this apostle, who so passionately writes to Christians, desiring that they would "strive together with him in their prayers to God," Rom. xv. 30, 31; "that they would always with all perseverance pray for him;" that they would "continue in prayer, that God would open to him a door of utterance to speak the mystery of Christ" (Eph. v. 18, 19, Col. iv. 2, 3), and that he might be "delivered from unreasonable and wicked men" (1 Thess. v. 25, 2 Thess. iii. 1, 2), should never pray to the Virgin Mary, and to angels, or to saints departed, for any of these things, is an evidence that he approved not of those prayers.

[3] Ver. 6. Ἐν χάριτι, With grace.] i. e. "With sweetness and courteousness," saith Theodoret, "that it may be acceptable to the hearers;" ἵνα αὐτοῖς κεχαριτωμένους ἐργάζοιτο, "that it may render you gracious to and favoured by them;" so Theophylact. "Seasoned with salt;" salt is the symbol of wisdom, and in this sense the word is used, Matt. v. 13, Mark ix. 15. "Have," saith Theodoret, σύνεσιν πνευματικὴν, "spiritual wisdom, that ye may know," &c.

[4] Ver. 7. Τυχικός.] That this epistle was written at the same time with that to the Ephesians, is pleaded from this, that it was sent by the same person Tychicus, with the very same words contained in this and the following verse, Eph. vi. 21, 22.

[5] Ver. 9. Onesimus.] Of whom Jerome saith, "We read, that of a servant he was made a deacon."*

[6] Ver. 10. Μάρκος.] It seems evident hence, that Paul's displeasure against him, mentioned Acts xv. 38, lasted not long; for he desires Timothy to bring him with him, as being "profitable to him for the ministry," 2 Tim. iv. 11, and styles him his "fellow-labourer," Philem. 24.

[7] Ver. 11. These only are my fellow-workers in the (promotion of the) kingdom of God which have been a comfort to me.] Hence it is evident, that either St. Peter was not at Rome when St. Paul was, or that he was no comfort to him, no promoter of the kingdom of God with him: which sure is no compliment to St. Peter.

[8] Ver. 12. Ἐπαφρᾶς.] That Epaphras was about this time prisoner at Rome, is concluded very probably from Philem. 23, where he is styled by Paul his "fellow-prisoner;" for that the Epistle to Philemon and this were written at the same time, may be conjectured, by the naming Timothy at the beginning, and all the same persons, save only Justus, viz. Epaphras, Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, at the end of both

* Legimus Onesimum, inter Pauli renatum vincula, diaconum esse cœpisse à servo. Contra Error. Joh. Hieros.

15 Salute the brethren which are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, [9] and the church which is in his house (i. e. his Christian household).

16 And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and (see) that ye likewise read [10] the epistle from Laodicea.

17 And say to [11] Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it.

18 The salutation (written) by the hand of me Paul (is in token that this is my epistle, 2 Thess. iii. 17). Remember my (being in) bonds (so as to pray for my deliverance, ver. 3, and to prepare for patient suffering, by my example). Grace be with you. Amen.

of them; but that he was bishop of Colosse, is not said by any of the Greek commentators on the place: he might have this zeal for them mentioned in these two verses, either as being one of them (ver. 12), or as being employed in preaching the gospel to them.

[9] Ver. 15. The church which is in his house.] i. e. His Christian household; for all the brethren are mentioned before. So Theodoret, Œcumenius, Chrysostom, and Theophylact, note, that, τὸν οἶκον πάντα πιστοὺς εἶχεν, ὥστε καὶ ἐκκλησίαν καλεῖσθαι, "he had made his whole family Christians, so as to be called a church."

[10] Ver. 16. Καὶ τὴν ἐκ Λαοδικείας, And that from Laodicea.] Some say, that the epistle here mentioned, as from Laodicea, was the First Epistle of Paul to Timothy, because the postscript saith it was written from Laodicea; but that subscription is easily confuted, both from this consideration, that the First Epistle to Timothy was written two or three years after this (see the preface to it); and from this very epistle, in which the apostle mentions them of Laodicea among those who had not seen his face in the flesh, ii. 1. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, understood by it some epistle writ by them of Laodicea to Paul; but the apostle doth not say, Read the epistle sent from me to Laodicea; nor doth he mention one word of such an epistle sent from them to him here, or elsewhere; nor is it to be doubted but he would have answered their epistle, had they sent any, as he did that which the church of Corinth sent to him. Others understand this of an epistle sent by Paul to them which is now lost; but all the ancients are not only silent in this matter, but some of them expressly do explode this imagination, observing, that the apostle proposes to their reading, not τὴν πρὸς Λαοδικείας, ἀλλὰ τὴν ἐκ Λαοδικείας γραφεῖσαν, "an epistle writ to the Laodiceans, but only from Laodicea, to be sent to Colosse." I therefore acquiesce in their opinion, who understand this of the Epistle to the Ephesians, sent, by the admonition of Paul, from Ephesus, the metropolis of Laodicea, subject to it; as the epistles to the church of Corinth belonged to all the churches of Achaia, 2 Cor. i. 1. For Tertullian* witnesseth, that this Epistle to the Ephesians was, by Marcion, styled the Epistle to the Laodiceans; and the place which Marcion cites in Epiphanius,† as from the Epistle to the Laodiceans, is in the Epistle to the Ephesians, iv. 5, 6, viz. "There is one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." Moreover, the Epistle to the Colossians, as I have shown, and as Theodoret notes, was writ soon after that to the Ephesians, and sent to them both by the hands of Tychicus; and there is a great resemblance observable betwixt them, both in the doctrines and exhortations, and in the very expressions: so that it is not to be wondered, that the apostle would have that epistle also read to the Colossians, to let them see, that he writ the same doctrine, and gave the same instructions, to other churches of the saints.

[11] Ver. 17. Ἀρχίππῳ, Archippus.] That this Archippus should be then bishop of Colosse, as Jerome, on the Epistle to Philemon, thinks; and that Paul should not write one word, or send one salutation to him, but send to the people of Colosse to admonish him of his duty, is not very credible in itself, nor do the ancients testify that he bore that character.

FIRST EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

That Paul laid the foundation of the gospel among the Thessalonians,* ἀντιλεγόντων μὲν Ἰουδαίων, "the Jews contradicting, and openly contending against it," we learn from the history of the Acts; and this church consisting, as Œcumenius† notes, "partly of Jews, and partly of gentiles," they were persecuted both by the unbelieving Jews and gentiles; the Jews exciting the gentiles to this persecution (Acts xvii. 5). The apostle therefore writes to confirm them in the faith, and to prevent their being shaken by these persecutions: informing them that it was nothing strange they should thus suffer from those Jews, who had "killed the Lord Jesus, and had persecuted both the apostles and their own prophets:" or that they should suffer from their own countrymen, as the Jews in Judea did from theirs (ii. 14).

Moreover, concerning this epistle, the first note of the fathers is this;* "Thessalonica was the metropolis of Macedonia, whence we may certainly conclude that Philippi was not so."

This epistle must be written after the council held at Jerusalem, A. D. 49. From thence Paul goes to Antioch, Acts xv. 30; stays there some considerable time, ver. 35; from thence goes through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the brethren, ver 41; thence to Derbe and Lystra, xvi. 1, through Phrygia and Galatia, ver. 6; then to Troas, ver. 8, to Samothracia and Neapolis, ver. 11; and so to Philippi, ver. 12; then to Amphipolis and Apollonia, and so to Thessalonica, xviii. 1, there planting the gospel: thence they are expelled by the Jews and gentiles, and go to Berea, ver. 10; thence to Athens, ver. 15; and from thence to Corinth, xviii. 1, where Timotheus coming to him, and giving him a comfortable account of their faith and constancy, he writes this epistle to them, iii. 6. Whence it appears that it could not be written in less time than a year or two after that council; and that the inscription of it running thus, "Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, to the church of the Thessalonians," it must be written after their return to him; and so not from Athens, as the subscription hath it, but from Corinth, Acts xviii. 1. 5, A. D. 51 or 52; for it was written after he had been "separated from them but a little while," ii. 17.

CHAPTER I.

1 (I) PAUL, (the apostle of Jesus Christ), and Silvanus, and Timotheus, (my fellow-labourers, write) [1] unto the church of the Thessalonians which is (established) in (the knowledge and worship of) [2] God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ: (wishing) grace (may) be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and (from) the Lord Jesus Christ.

2 (And advertising you, that) We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers;

3 [3] Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, (ver. 10, when we appear) in the sight of God and (even) our Father;

4 (And) Knowing, brethren beloved, (by your proficiency in the Christian virtues,) [4] your election of God.

5 For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in (the) power (of miracles), and in (or with the distributions of) the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance (or full conviction both to you of the truth of our doctrine, and to us, that God had chosen you to be his church and people); as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake (or how we were enabled by these things to give full proof of our ministry).

6 And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord (in your sufferings for his sake), having received the word in much affliction, (Acts xvii. 5, and yet) [5] with joy of the Holy Ghost:

7 So that ye were ensamples (of faith and patience) to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia.

8 For from you sounded out the word of the Lord not only in Macedonia and Achaia (and so they could not be ignorant of your good works), but also in every place (the fame of) your faith to God-ward is spread abroad (or hath gone forth); so that we need not to speak any thing (to others of the grace of God given us towards you, Eph. iii. 3, Col. i. 25).

9 [6] For they themselves shew of us what manner of entering in we had unto you (i. e. with what power and assistance of the Holy Ghost we preached the gospel to you, ver. 5), and how (thereupon) ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God;

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ Θεσσαλονικέων, To the church of the Thessalonians.] "He names not the presbyters and deacons," saith Grotius, "because the church was newly planted, and had not received its full form:" and yet in his note on those words, v. 12, "I entreat you, brethren, know them that labour among you, and are over you in the Lord," he saith, οἱ κοπιῶντες, "the labourers are the princes of the assembly, called bishops; οἱ προϊστάμενοι, they that are over you, are the presbyters;" but against this, see the note there.

[2] Ἀπὸ Θεοῦ πατρὸς, From God the Father, ver. 1, and in the sight of God and our Father, ver. 3.] The Spirit of God vouchsafed under the gospel, enables us to cry "Abba, Father," i. e. to come to God with the assurance of his fatherly affection to us, as being now the sons of God through faith in Jesus Christ; on which account is God "our Father," or the Father of us Christians (Eph. iii. 15), so often mentioned for their consolation in those times of peril.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἀδιαλείπτως μνημονεύοντες, Remembering without ceasing.] i. e. As often as we appear before God our Father, thankfully remembering your faith, fruitful in good works; your love to the saints making you laborious to promote their good, and your hope in the Lord Jesus (ver. 10), rendering you patient in all tribulations for his sake, ver. 17 (see note there).

Your labour of love and patience.] Œcumenius here notes, that it is the property of true love, τὰ πάντα ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἠγαπημένου πάσχειν, "to suffer all things for the sake of the beloved."

[4] Ver. 4. Τὴν ἐκλογὴν ὑμῶν, Your election of God.] The gospel came to some in word only, i. e. they heard the sound of it, but did not believe and obey it, and so "the word did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it," Heb. iv. 2, and these were only κλητοὶ, "called," but not ἐκλεκτοὶ, "chosen," Matt. xxii. 14. To others, the preaching of the apostles was attended with a greater power of miracles, and extraordinary effusions of the Holy Ghost, prevailing on many to embrace it as the word of God; so that from hence the apostles had a full assurance, that it was the good pleasure of God to gather a church of believers, and faithful people there; and these were called the elect, ἐκλογὴ Θεοῦ, "the election of God," "the election of grace," i. e. men chosen to be partakers of the blessings of the gospel, and to be God's peculiar church and people. For the apostle doth not here speak of any absolute election of the whole church of the Thessalonians to eternal life, because he could have no certain knowledge of it; or if he had, he could not have been under any just grounds of fear, as we find he was, "lest by some means the tempter should have tempted them, and his labour be in vain among them" (iii. 5). Moreover, the reason of his knowledge here assigned, viz. the miracles and gifts of the Holy Geost, with which his preaching was attended, gave him a certain knowledge that God designed to gather there a church of Christians; but it was no certain indication of their election to eternal life, seeing the apostle informs us, that they who had "tasted of these powers of the world to come," and received these gifts of the Holy Ghost, might "fall away," so as not to be "renewed to repentance" (Heb. vi. 4—6), and many of the converted Jews actually did so afterward.

[5] Ver. 6. Μετὰ χαρᾶς, &c. With joy of the Holy Ghost.] In the foregoing verse he lays before them the outward testimonies of the truth of Christianity from the miracles wrought, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost exercised among them: here he appeals also to the inward testimonies they had received of it, even a strong spiritual joy wrought in them by the Holy Ghost, under the sharpest sufferings, according to those words of Peter, "If ye suffer for the sake of righteousness, and be reproached for Christ's sake, happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory and of God rests upon you" (1 Pet. iv. 14).

[6] Ver. 9.] These words, saith Theodoret,* instruct us

* Οὐ γὰρ τῷ υἱῷ συγκρίνων, ἀλλὰ τοῖς οὐσι θεοῖς, τὸν ὄντα Θεὸν, Θεὸν ζῶντα, καὶ ἀληθινὸν, αὐτὸν προσηγόρευσε.

10 And to wait for (the coming of) his Son from heaven (to be glorified in his saints, 2 Thess. i. 10), whom he (hath already) raised from the dead, even Jesus, which (by his death hath) delivered us from the wrath to come.

how to expound our Saviour's words, "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God," teaching us that he is so styled, in opposition not to Jesus Christ, but to idols only.

CHAPTER II.

1 (We need not, I say, speak any thing farther of the effectual working of God with us in our entrance in unto you:) For yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not [1] in vain (i. e. not without demonstration of divine assistance, i. 5):

2 But (we had such assurance of God's call to preach to you, that) even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi (Acts xvi. 23), we were (still) bold in (the strength of) our God to speak unto you the gospel of God (though this we did) with much contention (and opposition from the unbelieving Jews, Acts xvii. 5).

3 For our exhortation (made to you to embrace the gospel) was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile (as are the exhortations of the philosophers among you, and the deceitful workers of the Jewish nation, who endeavour to corrupt you):

4 But as we were allowed (Gr. have been approved) of God (as persons fit) to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak (the truth sincerely); not as pleasing men, but (as approving ourselves to that) God, which trieth our hearts (Gal. i. 10).

5 For neither at any time used we [2] flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness; God is witness (2 Cor. ii. 17):

6 Nor of men sought we glory (or high estimation), neither of you, nor yet of others (provisions), when we might (not only with a fair pretence, but with just reason) have been (thus) [3] burdensome, as (being) the apostles of Christ.

7 (I say we sought not high esteem, or rich provisions:) But we were [4] gentle (meek and unburdensome) among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children (bearing herself the burden of them, and giving them her milk, as we dispense to you the sincere milk of the word freely:

8 And) So being affectionately desirous of you (your good), we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, but also our [5] own souls (i. e. to have spent our lives in your service), because ye were dear unto us.

9 (And of this affection you cannot well be ignorant;) [6] For ye remember, brethren, our labour and travail: for labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you (freely) the gospel of God.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Οὐ κενὴ, Not vain.] I grant that the apostle doth not intend to signify by this phrase, only that his word was not ineffectual among them, but also to declare the reason why it was not so; to wit, because it wanted not a demonstration of divine authority and power to confirm them in the faith that heard it, and those that heard it in their expectations of success, and their assurance that the Thessalonians were by God designed to receive the faith; as it would have been had it come to them in word only, and not "in power, and the Holy Ghost, and much assurance." For the word "vain," when it is applied to God's message, signifies the not accomplishing the great ends for which it was designed; so Isa. lv. 11, "The word that goeth out of my mouth shall not return to me in vain, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the things whereto I sent it:" and, Jer. viii. 8, "How do ye say, We are wise, and the law of the Lord is with us? Lo, certainly in vain made he it; the pen of the scribes is in vain:" and, Jer. ii. 33, "In vain have I smitten your children, they have received no correction." "Our entrance therefore to you was not in vain;" that is, it was not without such divine assistance as was sufficient to work conviction in you, and to embrace the truth to you.

[2] Ver. 5. Ἐν λόγῳ κολακείας,] Here signifies "in flattering words," or words that are flattery, as λόγος ἀκοῆς, ver. 13, is "the word heard;" λόγος ἀληθείας, "the word which is the truth," 2 Cor. vi. 7, Col. i. 5, and πρόφασις πλεονεξίας, is "a pretence to gratify their covetousness:" for that the apostles never were under a defamation or accusation of these things, neither could the Thessalonians know, nor was it a thing proper to call God to witness to; but that no such guilt could truly be charged upon them, the Thessalonians might know, and that they inwardly designed no such thing God only could be witness, as being alone the searcher of the heart.

[3] Ver. 6. Ἐν βάρει εἶναι, Be burdensome.] This seems not to refer to the censures of the church, but to the apostles living at the charge of their converts; for he saith, ver. 9, that he and his companions "laboured night and day, πρὸς τὸ μὴ ἐπιβαρῆσαί, that they might burden none of them." So 2 Cor. xi. 9, "Other churches supplied my wants, so that in all things I have kept myself, ἀβαρῆ, unburdensome to you:" and 1 Tim. v. 16, "If any man or woman that believeth have widows, let them relieve them, καὶ μὴ βαρείσθω ἡ ἐκκλησία, and let not the church be burdened with them."

When we might have been burdensome.] Here Theophylact cries out, βαβαὶ τῆς προθυμίας καὶ τῆς ὑπὲρ τοῦ μὴ σκανδαλίσαι τίνα σπουδῆς, "Oh the study and sedulity of the apostle, not to scandalize any person!"—And the descant of Esthius upon the words is this, We accommodated ourselves to you in all things, neque jus nostrum, neque imperium urgentes, ut vestram promoveamus salutem, "forbearing our own right to promote your happiness." And if the apostles forbore to exercise their own power, that they might not be burdensome to the weak Thessalonians, how much more would they have done it to prevent their ruin?

[4] Ver. 7. Ἤπιοι, Meek.] If the various lection noted by Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, who here read νήπιοι, "children," were the original, the sense would run thus: "But, we, O children, were among you as a nurse that cherisheth her children" (see ver. 11). And that Origen read so is certain from his commentary on Matthew, p. 372. 375.

[5] Ver. 8. Τὰς ἑαυτῶν ψυχὰς, Our own souls.] i. e. Our own lives; as when Christ is said to give τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, "his life a ransom for many," Matt. xx. 28, to "lay down, τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, his life for his sheep," John x. 11. 15. 17, xv. 13, 1 John iii. 16; and when we are bid to "lay down, τὰς ψυχὰς, our lives for the brethren," 1 John iii. 16, or said to lose or gain, τὴν ψυχὴν, "our life," Luke ix. 24, John xii. 15 (see Acts xx. 10, Rom. xi. 3, xvi. 4, 2 Cor. xii. 15, Philem. ii. 13, 1 Pet. iv. 19).

[6] Ver. 9.] It is the opinion of Dr. Hammond, that the apostle here, from the third to the fourth verse, refers to the Gnostics, and clears himself from the vile arts they used, and ill designs they had in promoting their delusions. But this epistle being writ, saith the same reverend person, about the year 50, and whilst Simon Magus was yet living, it cannot be proved that these Gnostics were then in being, much less that they ever were at Thessalonica.

10 Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily (towards God) and justly and unblameably we behaved ourselves (whilst we conversed) among you that believe:

11 As (and likewise) ye know [7] how we exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children, (Gr. how we loved every one of you as a father doth his children, exhorting you to the performance of your duty, comforting you under your tribulations, and testifying)

12 That ye would (ought to) walk [8] worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.

13 For this cause also (or, and for this thing) thank we God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men (speaking from their own human wisdom), but as it is in truth, the word of God, [9] which effectually worketh also in you that believe (the fruits of Christian patience).

14 For ye, brethren, (in this) became followers of the churches of God which in Judæa are in Christ Jesus: for ye also have suffered (patiently) like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews (their countrymen):

15 Who both killed the Lord Jesus, and (before him) their own prophets, and have (since) persecuted us (his apostles); and they please not God, and are [10] contrary to all men (who are not of their own nation or religion:

16 And this they show in) Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved (by the preaching of the gospel), [11] to fill up their sins alway (i. e. which they are given up to do, to fill up the measure of their sins, which, being thus disposed, and thus deserted by God, they will do): for the wrath (of God) is come upon them to the uttermost.

17 But we, brethren, being (by their impatient malice) taken from you for a short time (Acts xviii. 5, 10, and this) in presence (only), not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face (again) with great desire.

We read in scripture of some teachers of the law, who "gave heed to fables," 1 Tim. i. 4. 7, and who "counted gain godliness," vi. 5; of some Jews who were "deceitful workers," 2 Cor. xi. 13. 22, 1 Cor. iv. 2, and had their πανουργίαι, "subtleties," 2 Cor. xi. 3; and who were given to uncleanness, Rom. ii. 22, and taught unclean doctrines, 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17, vi. 13. 19, 2 Cor. xii. 21 (see the note there): and it is likely the apostle might in these words respect those deceivers.

Or we may refer these thing to the philosophers of those times, who did συλαγωγεῖν, "make a prey of men by philosophy and vain deceit," Col. ii. 8; who were, saith the poet in Athenæus,* μειρακιεξαπάται, "deceivers of young men, and δοξοματαιόσοφοι, desirous of vain-glory," whose business it was χαριτογλωσσεῖν, "to speak to please men,"† who taught only "for stipends," or ἐργολαβίας ἕνεκεν, as Diodorus Siculus‡ saith of the Grecian philosophers; and τοῦ κατὰ τὴν ἐργολαβίαν κέρδους σοχαζόμενοι, "philosophized," saith Plato,§ "out of love of gain;" and who are every where represented as "given to impurity,"‖ and exercising the vilest practices with those they taught their vain philosophy. Whence they were sometimes banished from the places of their abodes, saith Athenæus,¶ ὡς διαφθείροντες τοὺς νέους, "as corrupters of the youth," and did κυνικῶς ζῆν, "lead the lives of cynics." And Plato himself confesseth, That one reason why they were so generally decried, was this, that most of them were παμπόνηροι, "the worst of men."

[7] Ver. 11, 12. Οἴδατε ὡς ἕνα ἕκαστον ὑμῶν, ὡς πατὴρ τέκνα ἑαυτοῦ παρακαλοῦντες ὑμᾶς, You know how we exhorted, and comforted, and charged every one of you, as a father does his children.] Here our translation puts the μαρτυρούμενοι, "persuading," testifying, or charging, which begins the twelfth verse, before the beginning of the eleventh, which is an unusual transposition, and changes the participles into verbs, which, though it be usual, cannot here be admitted, because of the ὑμᾶς following παρακαλοῦντες. I think therefore it is better to own an ellipsis or deficiency of the word ἐφιλήσαμεν, or ἠγαπήσαμεν, or ἐθάλψαμεν, from ver. 7, of which ellipsis we find many instances; v. g. there is an ellipsis of the verb ἐποίει, Rom. viii. 3, of ἐλπίζετε, Eph. i. 13 (see 1 Cor. iv. 15, Gal. ii. 7, 2 Thess. ii. 7, 1 John ii. 19, Matt. xx. 23). And then the words may be thus translated, "Ye know how I loved every one of you, as a father doth his children," exhorting and comforting you (ver. 12), and charging you.

[8] Ver. 12. Ἀξίως τοῦ Θεοῦ, Worthy of God.] i. e. That you would walk, (1.) so as is best pleasing to him: (2.) as becomes them who are called to enjoy a glorious kingdom: (3.) as most conduceth to his glory: and, (4.) so as to resemble his imitable perfections in your conversation.

[9] Ver. 13. Ὃς ἐνεργεῖται, Which effectually worketh in you.] For, saith Theodoret, προφητικῆς καὶ αὐτοῖ χάριτος ἀπολαῦσαντες, καὶ προεφήτευον, καὶ γλώσσαις ἐλάλουν, καὶ Σαῦματα ἐπετέλουν περίδοξα· "They, partaking of the prophetical grace, both prophesied, and spake with tongues, and did great miracles;" for to those who in those times embraced the gospel, were granted χαρίσματα καὶ ἐνεργήματα, "the gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost," 1 Cor. xii. 6. 10—12, Eph. iii. 20. So that as Satan was πνεῦμα ἐνεργοῦν, "a spirit working in the children of disobedience," Eph. ii. 2, and they that were possessed by him were styled ἐνεργουμένοι; so they who had the afflatus of the Holy Spirit found him effectually working in them (James v. 16). And as the antichrists, or adversaries of the truth, wrought "lying wonders, κατ' ἐνέργειαν τοῦ Σατανᾶ, according to the deceitful working of Satan," in and by them (2 Thess. ii. 9. 11), so had the Christians, from the Holy Spirit, their ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων, "miraculous operations," by which they were enabled to confirm their faith: and these spiritual gifts were to them strong confirmations of the faith, the seals, and earnest of the blessings promised; and that which did enable them not only to suffer patiently, but also to "rejoice in tribulations," Rom. v. 3—5, 1 Thess. i. 6, 2 Tim. i. 7, 8, 1 Pet. iv. 14.

[10] Ver. 15. Contrary to all men.] Thus Tacitus* saith of them, Apud ipsos fides obstinata, misericordia in promptû, sed adversùs omnes alios hostile odium: "They have great fidelity and kindness towards men of their own nation, but as great hatred to all others." But that which the apostle chiefly here respects, was their fond imagination, that God would grant no salvation to the gentiles upon any other terms than their being circumcised, and obedient to the law of Moses (Acts xv. 1), on which account they became enemies to the gospel, and the preachers of it: because they offered salvation to the gentiles, through faith in Christ, without observation of the law (Rom. xi. 28, Gal. iv. 16). Hence also note, that none are greater enemies to the good of mankind, than they who do obstruct the preaching and the propagating of the gospel through the world.

[11] Ver. 16. Ἀναπληρῶσαι, To fill up the measure of their sins.] Our Lord hath said to them, "Fill ye up the measure of your fathers," by adding to the murder of the prophets the murder of me, and of those prophets and wise men I shall send to you (Matt. xxiii. 32—35), "that upon you of this generation may come all the blood shed from Abel to this present time" (Luke xi. 49. 51). This prediction, saith the apostle, is now fulfilled; and they, by fulfilling it, have filled up the measure of their sins; and God's wrath is so incensed against them, that it will now destroy their church and nation, εἰς τέλος, "to the uttermost;" so that it shall not be now as formerly, when they were sometimes in bondage, and again in freedom from their ene-

18 Wherefore we would have come unto you, even I Paul, once and again; but [12] Satan (by his ministers still) hindered us.

19 For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye (Gr. ἢ οὐχὶ καὶ ὑμεῖς, will it not among others be you also when we stand) in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?

20 For ye are (even at present) our glory and joy.

mies; sometimes were captives, and then returned again, after seventy years, to their own land; found God for awhile angry, and anon reconciled to them: but this wrath shall now remain upon them to the uttermost, "till the times of the gentiles are come in" (Luke xxi. 24, see note on Rom. xi. 25), or εἰς τέλος, "till they be consumed;" so the phrase is used often in the Old Testament, as εἰς τέλος ἀπολώμεθα, "Shall be consumed without dying," Numb. xvii. 13; "They fell by the sword, εἰς τέλος, till they were consumed," Josh. viii. 24, "Slaying them, εἰς τέλος, till they were consumed;" and x. 30; i. e. God's wrath hath begun to fall upon them; and they will still continue under it till they are consumed by it.

[12] Ver. 18. Ὁ Σατανᾶς, Satan.] Hence note, that they who obstruct the progress of the gospel, and persecute the promoters of it, are the ministers of Satan, and therefore bear his name (see iii. 5, 2 Cor. xi. 15, Rev. ii. 10).

CHAPTER III.

1 Wherefore when we could no longer forbear, (μηκέτι στέγοντες, no longer enduring to want the certain knowledge of your affairs, though we had given commandment to Timothy to come quickly to us to Athens, Acts xvii. 15, yet, as for me and Silas,) we thought it good to be left at Athens alone; (rather than to continue ignorant of the state of your faith, ver. 5;)

2 And (therefore) sent Timotheus, our brother (in Christ, Philem. 16, Heb. xiii. 23), and (the) minister of God, and our fellowlabourer in (advancing) the gospel of Christ, to [1] establish you (in), and to comfort you concerning your faith:

3 That (so) no man should (might) be moved (from his steadfastness in the faith) by these afflictions (and not you especially): for yourselves know (from us) that we (Christians) are appointed thereunto; (for hereunto are we called, 1 Pet. ii. 21.)

4 For verily, when we were with you, we told you before (it came to pass) that we should suffer tribulation; even as it (shortly after) came to pass (Acts xvii. 5—10), and ye know (it did so).

5 For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent (χἀγὼ μηκέτι στέγων ἔπεμψα, I also, not bearing longer the uncertainty of your affairs, have sent) to know (the steadfastness of) your faith, lest by some means the [2] tempter (may) have tempted you, and (so) our labour (among you should) be in vain.

6 But now when Timotheus came from you unto us, and brought us good tidings of your faith and charity, and (in particular) that ye have (still) good remembrance of us always, desiring greatly to see us, as we also (do) to see you:

7 Therefore (διὰ τοῦτο, by this), brethren, we were comforted over you (ἐφ' ὑμῖν, concerning you, or in you,) in all our affliction and distress by (reason of) your (constancy in the) faith:

8 For [3] now we live (joyfully), if ye stand fast in the Lord.

9 [4] For what (sufficient) thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God;

10 Night and day (also) praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and might perfect that which is (yet) lacking in your faith (by reason of our very small stay with you, Acts xvii. 1. 10)?

11 [5] Now God himself and (or, who is) our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, direct our way unto you.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 2. Στηρίξαι ὑμᾶς, To establish you] In it, by consideration of that miraculous power and those gifts of the Holy Ghost which accompanied our preaching, and your receiving of it (1 Thess. i. 5, 6), and which are still exercised among you (v. 19, 20), to comfort you concerning it; by consideration of the joys of the Holy Ghost, which you have found already under your afflictions (i. 6); by the salvation you are to obtain by Christ, the life you shall for ever live with him in glory (iv. 17, 18, v. 9—11), the eternal rest you shall have when the Lord Jesus Christ shall come to be "glorified in his saints;" and of which your constancy in the faith under these sufferings will make you to be "accounted worthy," 2 Thess. i. 5—7. 10.

[2] Ver. 5. Ὁ πειράζων.] Here note, First, That the persecutions of the saints are ascribed to Satan the tempter, who by his ministers endeavours to hinder the progress of the gospel (ii. 18), and by their persecutions to terrify men, and seduce them from the profession of it (see Rev. ii. 10).

Secondly, That πειράζειν here doth signify, not barely to tempt, but to succeed in his temptation; for otherwise the labour of the apostle could not be rendered vain among them (see note on Gal. vi. 1).

Thirdly, Note, that it is hence evident, that the apostle did not think them secure (by the election of them, mentioned i. 4), from falling so as that his labour might have been in vain among them.

Fourthly, Note, from Esthius, that a faithful person, truly justified, may so fall from the faith as that it shall become in vain to him.

[3] Ver. 8. Νῦν ζῶμεν, Now we live.] Ζῆν, saith Suidas, "is to live, μετὰ τρυφῆς καὶ πολυτελείας, with delight and magnificence;" according to that of Horace, Vivendum hodiè, which is the frequent import of the Hebrew word חיה, as in that wish, "Let the king live," 1 Sam. x. 24, 1 Kings. i. 25, 2 Kings xi. 12; i. e. let him have a prosperous and happy reign: and in the words of the psalmist, xvi. 11, "Thou wilt show me the way of life; in thy presence is fullness of joy:" xxxiv. 13, "He that would live, i. e. see good days:" so xxii. 26, xxxviii. 19, Eccles. vi. 8, vii. 12; "Our masters teach," saith Maimonides,* "that the just are called living, even in their death: the wicked, dead while they live; because the first are happy in their death; the second, miserable in their life."

[4] Ver. 9.] Esthius observes from the ninth verse, that both the apostle's joy and their faith and constancy were the gift of God; nam gratiarum actio non est nisi de beneficiis acceptis. He might also have observed with others, the excellent pattern the apostle here gives to all the bishops and pastors of the church, to be continually solicitous to know of the welfare of their flock, incessantly praying for it, blessing God daily for it, and looking upon it as the very felicity of their own lives.

[5] Ver. 11.] Here the note of Schlictingius runs thus: "You see that our Lord Jesus takes care of our affairs and actions, and therefore we deservedly invoke him in our necessities;" as the apostle again doth, ver. 12. But since this invocation of him by all Christians in all places must suppose him omniscient, omnipresent, and the searcher of the heart; and these are the properties of God alone; it also must suppose him to be truly God.

* More Nevoch. lib. i. cap. 43.

12 [6] And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and [7] toward all men, even as we do (abound in love) toward you:

13 [8] To the end he may stablish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father (τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Πατρὸς ἡμῶν, our God and Father), at the (glorious) coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

[6] Ver. 12. Ὑμᾶς δὲ ὁ Κύριος πλεονάσαι καὶ περισσεύσαι.] These are optative aorists, which signify transitively, μεταβατικῶς, say the grammarians; and therefore are well rendered by our translation, "The Lord make you to increase, and make you to abound" (see note on 2 Cor. ix. 8, Ecclus. xlv. 5).

[7] And towards all men.] "This," saith Theophylact,* "is the character of divine love, to comprehend all; whereas human love hath respect to one man, and not to another."

[8] Ver. 13. Ἀμέμπτους, That he may stablish your hearts unblameable in holiness.] Hence note, that a general and abounding charity to all men, being that by which we become most like to God, and that which tends to cover our own sins (1 Pet. iv. 8), especially if it be charity to the souls of men (James v. 20), tends to "stablish our hearts unblameable before God in love," and to procure our acceptance with him at the great day of our accounts (Matt. xxv. 35, 36).

Note also, that to stablish our hearts unblameable at Christ's coming, is so to confirm us in holy living, that we may be found unblameable by him at that day (see note on 1 Cor. i. 8, 1 Thess. v. 23, 2 Pet. iii. 14).

* Τοῦτο γὰρ τῆς κατὰ Θεὸν ἀγάπης ἴδιον, τὸ πάντας περιπλέκεσθαι· ἐὰν δὲ τὸν δεῖνα μέν, τὸν δεῖνα δ' οὐ, κατ' ἄνθρωπον ἡ φιλία.

CHAPTER IV.

1 Furthermore then we beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus, that as ye have received of us (directions) how ye ought to walk and to please God, so ye would abound more and more (in your care to conform yourselves to them.

2 In which thing you need no farther instructions:) For ye know what (holy) commandments we gave you [1] by the Lord Jesus.

3 For (we have already told you, that) this is the will of God, even your sanctification, (and this sanctification requires) that ye should abstain from fornication:

4 [2] (And) That every one of you should know how (much it is your duty) to possess his (body, which is the) vessel (of the Holy Spirit) in sanctification and honour (i. e. free from those lusts which are πάθη ἀτιμίας, Rom. i. 26, dishonourable passions);

5 Not in the lust of concupiscence, [3] even as the Gentiles (do) which know not God:

6 That [4] no man go beyond (the bounds of matrimony) whom these lusts abounded, and by whom they were allowed. For whoredom was esteemed no crime;* they taught, μὴ πάντως παρὰ τὸ καθῆκον τοῦτο γίνεσθαι. Their orator† speaks thus; Si quis est qui etiam meretriciis amoribus interdictum juventuti putet——abhorret non modò ab hujus seculi licentiâ, verùm etiam à majorum consuetudine atque concessis. Quandò enim hoc non factum est? quandò reprehensum? quandò non permissum? quandò denique fuit, ut quod licet, non liceret? Epictetus‡ advises them who cannot abstain, to use it only, ὡς νομιμόν ἐστι, "as the laws allowed it." Now that, saith Plato,§ was τῶν ἐλευθέρων γυναικῶν μὴ ἐρᾶν, "not to meddle with free-women, but only libertines, and servants, and those that sold themselves to it." And Demosthenes‖ declares of all the Grecians thus: τὰς μὲν ἑταίρας ἡδονῆς ἕνεκα ἔχομεν, τὰς δὲ παλλακὰς τῆς καθ' ἡμέραν παλλακείας, τὰς δὲ γυναῖκας τοῦ παιδοποιεῖσθαι γνησίους.

The τὸ παρὰ φύσιν τόλμημα, as Plato styles it, obtained in Greece without blame, saith Bardesanes;¶ amongst the Grecians and many barbarians, saith Plato; amongst the Cretians and Lacedemonians, saith the same Plato. How prone the Romans, and other nations were to it, Plautus, Petronius Arbiter, Aristophanes, and Athenæus,†† sufficiently inform us, as also that it was the sin of the philosophers especially.

7 Ver. 6. Μὴ ὑπερβαίνειν καὶ πλεονεκτεῖν, Not to go beyond or defraud.] It is the opinion of all the Greek scholiasts, that this verse contains a prohibition of adultery, πλεονεξίαν ἐνταῦθα τὴν μοιχείαν ἐκάλεσε. "By the word πλεονεξία, he denotes adultery," say Theodoret and Theophylact. God hath put bounds to this appetite, say Œcumenius and Theophylact, by tying us to one wife, ὥστε ἡ πρὸς ἑτέραν μίξις, παράβασίς τις καὶ πλεονεξία ἐστὶν, "so that to be familiar with one another is excess and covetousness;" and when this is

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 2. Διὰ τοῦ Κυρίου, By the Lord.] Note hence, that the instructions and commandments which the apostles gave to the churches, are to be looked upon as the commandments of the Lord, and as the will of God; they being dictated by his Spirit (ver. 8), and delivered by his authority who said, "He that heareth you heareth me; and he that heareth me heareth him that sent me" (Luke x. 16).

[2] Ver. 4, 5.] Here note (1.) That these instructions were very necessary for the Thessalonians, ἐκεῖ γὰρ πλείστη ἀταξία, καὶ ἀκαθαρσία, for "there was all manner of disorder and impurity," saith Socrates.* And Athenæus† informs us, τὴν τούτων τρυφὴν, that "their luxury invited the Persians into Greece:" that it was their custom in their banquets to bring in their‡ "wenches dancing naked," and afterward "they enjoyed them at their pleasure."

Secondly, Note also, that having mentioned fornication, ver. 3, he seems, ver. 4 and 5, to advance to other heathenish lusts, desiring them to keep their vessels in sanctification and honour: (1.) By preserving their bodies from unnatural lusts, which are by the apostle styled πάθη ἀτιμίας, "dishonourable passions;" and their matrimonial bed from defilement, by the use of other women (Heb. xiii. 4). Accordingly, these things in scripture are expressed by ignominy and vileness: in the Septuagint, by τὰ ἄσχημα, "things indecorous and dishonourable;" which word the apostle applies to unnatural lusts, Rom. i. 26; and in the language of the Targum and the rabbins, they are styled קלנא, "ignominy and vileness." Thus Shechem is said to have wrought קלנא, saith the Chaldee; τὸ ἄσχημον, the Septuagint; i. e. "ignominy in Israel," by knowing Dinah. This is the name the Chaldee gives to the adultery committed by the men of Benjamin upon the Levite's concubine, Judg. xix. 24, the incest committed by Amnon on his sister Tamar, 2 Sam. xiii. 1, 2; and in the rabbinical language,§ "to abuse boys," בקלן, is to use them to the satisfying of unnatural lusts.

mony) and defraud his brother in any matter (Gr. or exceed towards his brother in this matter): because that the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also have forewarned you and testified.

7 (He is, I say, the avenger of all such Christians, as acting oppositely to their holy calling;) For God hath not called us (Christians) unto uncleanness, but unto holiness.

8 He therefore that despiseth (this command), despiseth not man (only), but God, who hath also given [5] unto us his Holy Spirit.

9 (This I thought necessary to say, to warn you against that uncleanness which so reigneth in the heathen world, and to which you so strongly were addicted, whilst you were without the knowledge of God in the world:) But as touching brotherly love ye need not that I write (so fully) unto you: for ye yourselves are [6] taught of God to love one another.

10 And indeed ye do it toward all the brethren which are in all Macedonia: but we beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more (in this Christian virtue);

11 And that ye study to be quiet, and [7] to do your own business (not meddling with other men's matters), and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you;

12 That (so) ye may walk honestly (εὐσχημόνως, decently, and in good behaviour) toward them that are without, and that ye may have [8] lack of nothing.

13 But (especially) I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning (the state of) them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not (for them), [9] even as others (other gentiles do) which have no hope (of a resurrection of the body).

14 For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again (as the first-fruits of them that slept, 1 Cor. xv. 20), done to another man's wife, it is to accede to the injury of his brother. And as Jerome* hath observed, the words preceding, which speak of "abstaining from fornication, and keeping our vessels in sanctification and honour, and not in the lusts of concupiscence;" and the words following, which give this reason of the precept, that "God hath not called us to uncleanness, but to holiness," seem also plainly to enforce this sense, which the Greek, in the judgment of the forecited fathers, will bear: for,

1. The words ὑπερβαίνειν and ἐπιβαίνειν bear this sense in other authors. Thus Philo,† speaking of unnatural lusts committed by men, saith ἄνδρες ὄντες ἄῤῥησιν ἐπιβαίνουσι. And Plutarch‡ saith of the Egyptians, that "they call that land which Nile ascends, mixing and engendering with it, the body of Isis." And when Nile is thus, ὑπερβαλὼν καὶ πλεονάσας, "filling and ascending, they call this the joining of Osiris with Nephthe." So the Hebrew word בוא, from which βῶ and βάω, and from them βαίνω, is derived, hath this signification, as Josh. xxiii. 12, "If you contract affinity with the heathens, ובאתם בהם, and go in unto them; εἰ ἐπιγαμίας ποιήσητε, καὶ συγκαταμιγῆτε αὐτοῖς, "If you marry and mix with them," saith the Septuagint, "the Lord will not drive them out." And in the Mishna, הבועל אחותו is, "he that revealeth the nakedness of his sister," and may be rendered ὑπερβαίνων τὴν ἀδελφὴν αὐτοῦ.

2. The word πλεονεξία bears the same sense in that verse in which Venus promises to him that finds and brings her Cupid to her, "not a bare kiss, but something more," saying οὐ γυμνὸν τὸ φίλαμά τοι ξένε, καὶ πλέον ἕξεις. And Socrates§ tells Callicles, pleading for those pleasures, that men ought not to be ἐπιθυμίας ἀκολάστους, "of unbounded lusts; οὐ δὲ πλεονεξίαν οἴει δεῖν ἀσκεῖν, but thou," saith he, "thinkest that a man may exceed in these matters." And in the scholiast of Aristophanes,‖ these are put as words equivalent, ὑπερπαίειν, ὑπερβαίνειν, πλεονάζειν.

And whereas against this interpretation it is objected, that the words following, viz. "in any matter," being general, will not admit of this restrained sense:

I answer, that in the Greek the words are ἐν τῷ πράγματι, and may be rendered, "in this matter," or "in the matter;" viz. forementioned; or absolutely, in the matter; for so it plainly signifies in these words, 2 Cor. vii. 11, "You have approved yourselves clear ἐν τῷ πράγματι, in this matter:" And it being observed by Phavorinus and Suidas,¶ that the word πρᾶγμα is used by the ancients in an evil sense; and the Apostolical Constitutions complaining that the younger widows marrying again, under pretence that they* could not contain, were "engaged in an evil matter;" and by Œcumenius being glossed thus, ἐν τῇ μίξει· I hope I have sufficiently vindicated this interpretation of Dr. Hammond and the ancients, from the exceptions of Mr. Le Clerc.

'Εν τῷ πράγματι, In this matter.] So it plainly signifies in those words, 2 Cor. vii. 11, "You have approved yourselves clear ἐν τῷ πράγματι, in this matter."

[5] Ver. 8. Εἰς ἡμᾶς, To us.] To us apostles, to enable us to give you these commandments; and to us Christians, to render us the temples of the Holy Ghost, which temples we corrupt by our uncleanness (1 Cor. iii. 15, 16, vi. 15—17, xi. 19, 2 Cor. vi. 16).

[6] Ver. 9. Θεοδίδακτοι, Taught of God.] By this new commandment, "that we love one another," 1 John iii. 11. 23, iv. 21, Matt. xxii. 39. Θεοδίδακτοι γὰρ ἡμεῖς ἱερὰ ὄντως γράμματα παρὰ τοῦ νίοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ παιδεύομενοι, saith Clemens of Alexandria,† "We are taught by God, having the holy scriptures; and by the example of that God, who loved us, and gave his Son for us" (Eph. v. 2). Hence they who are taught of God are said to hear his commands, and learn by his example (John vi. 45).

[7] Ver. 11. Τὰ ἴδια, To do your own business.] I follow here the sense of Dr. Hammond, and other interpreters; though the following words, "to work with your own hands," seem to lead to the doing their own business themselves, and not to leave all to slaves and servants, as the idle and luxurious of old were wont to do (see Athenæus, lib. xii.).

[8] Ver. 12. Καὶ μηδενὸς χρείαν ἔχητε, And that ye may have lack of nothing.] i. e. From the heathen. So the Greek scholiasts: for, say they, if Christians, seeing a Christian beg when he is able to live by his work, are scandalized, how much more will heathens be so? And indeed, this was one objection of the heathens against Christians, that they were‡ infructuosi in negotiis, "useless creatures." The apostle therefore doth exhort them so to provide for their necessities by their honest labour, that they may not need the help of infidels, and never may be forced by their wants to ask it of them.

[9] Ver. 13. Καθὼς οἱ λοιποὶ, As do others.] Though many heathens believed the immortality of the soul, none of them had any expectation of the resurrection of the body. This the philosophers, who styled the body "the prison of the soul," and thought it the great hinderance of knowledge and of virtue, represented as a very despicable thing, τὸ σφῶϊρα μιαρὸν, καὶ ἀπόπτυστον ὦμα καὶ ἀξύνατον. So Celsus;§ "It is vile," saith he, "abominable, and impossible; σκωλήκων ἡ ἐλπὶς, a hope fitter for worms than men." And he confutes the possibility of it, not only from the repugnancy of the thing to nature, but also from the vileness of it, declaring even so (are we to believe, that) [10] them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him (when he comes to judge the world, and reward all his faithful servants).

15 For this we say unto you (not from ourselves, but) by the word of the Lord, that [11] we which are (then) alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep (so as to receive our happy change, before their resurrection).

16 For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, [12] and with the trump of God: and (then) the dead in Christ shall rise first:

17 Then we which are alive and remain (on the earth) shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be [13] with the Lord.

18 Wherefore comfort one another (concerning your deceased friends) with these words.

God therefore cannot do it,* "because as he will not do what is against nature, so he cannot do what is vile." Plotinus saith, that such a resurrection would only be ἀνάστασις εἰς ἄλλον ὕπνον, "a resurrection to another sleep." And all the other heathens held it a thing impossible, and without example, and therefore made it a matter of their sport; it being, saith Origen, μυσταγώγιον γελώμενον ὑπὸ τῶν ἀπίστων (see Justin. M. Apol. 2, p. 57, C, D. Theophilus ad Autol. 1. p. 77. De Minuc. p. 11. Arnob. lib. ii. p. 51. Lact. lib. vii. cap. 22).

[10] Ver. 14. Τοὺς κοιμηθέντας διὰ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, Those that sleep in, or through Jesus.] That the martyrs are not here excluded is certain; but I see no reason to grant that this expression should peculiarly respect them. All the Greek scholiasts interpret the words generally: Chrysostom and Theophylact say, that they who sleep in Jesus are "the faithful," in general: Œcumenius, "those that sleep in the faith of Jesus." The apostle, treating of this subject, calls all the dead, τοὺς κοιμηθέντας ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, "those that sleep in Christ," 1 Cor. xv. 18, and the context here requires this sense; for the apostle speaks, ver. 13, of them that sleep in general, and of the hope of the resurrection in general. And when Christ comes to judgment, he will not bring the martyrs only, but all the faithful with him. See ver. 15, 16, where the same persons are "the dead with Christ."

[11] Ver. 15. Ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες, We who are alive.] It is well observed by the Greek scholiasts, that the apostle speaks these words, οὐκ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ προσώπου, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τῶν κατ' ἐκεῖνον τὸν καιρὸν περιόντων ἀνθρώπων, "not of himself, but of the Christians that were to remain alive at the day of judgment:" so Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact; for he well knew he was not personally to live till the resurrection; yea, he himself expected a resurrection, saying to the Corinthians, "He that raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you," 2 Cor. iv. 14; he laboured that he "might attain to the resurrection of the dead," Phil. iii. 11. Yet there are some divines who, from this and some other places in the epistles, conceive that the apostles sometimes thought and declared to other Christians, that they themselves might live until the resurrection; and that Paul afterward changed this opinion, and admonished the Thessalonians of it, 2 Thess. ii. This I conceive to be a dangerous mistake, and highly prejudicial to the Christian faith, and the authority of the apostles; for if the churches of Christ had once received this doctrine from them, and afterward had understood, even from their own confession, that it was a mistake, this would have naturally led them to conceive that they might have been mistaken also in any other doctrine contained in their epistles, and to suspect the certainty and truth of all that was contained in them. And this the apostle seemeth to insinuate in these words, 2 Thess. ii. 1, 2, "I beseech you, brethren, that you be not soon shaken in mind, or troubled, either by word or letter, as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand:" for these words seem plainly to import, that in the apostle's own judgment, the belief that the apostles had taught by word or by epistle, this doctrine, would tend to the unsettling of their minds in the faith.

* Ἀλλ' οὔτι γε τὰ αἰσχρὰ ὁ Θεὸς δύναται οὐδὲ τὰ παρὰ φύσιν βούλεται. Ibid.

But that Paul taught no such doctrine in any of his Epistles to the Thessalonians, will be exceeding evident,

First, From the following words in that chapter: for there, saith he, ver. 3, "Let no man deceive you by any means;" declaring them deceivers who either taught this doctrine, or imposed it on them as spoken or indited by them: there also having said, in opposition to that vain imagination, that day was not to come till there was "a falling away first, and the man of sin was revealed," he adds, "Remember you not that when I was yet with you, I told you these things?" (ver. 5.) He therefore had taught them the contrary before he had indited either of these epistles, and therefore in them cannot rationally be supposed to contradict himself.

Secondly, From the very words used for proof of this opinion; for they are introduced with this solemnity, "This we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we that are alive:" in which words he most plainly voucheth the authority of Christ Jesus for the truth of what he saith; and therefore, if he were mistaken, either our Lord himself must err with him, or the apostle must vouch Christ's word and his authority, when Christ had spoken no such word, and given him no authority to speak this doctrine in his name; both which assertions overthrow the certainty and truth of all Paul's epistles. Now hence it follows, that the apostle could not deliver this assertion in any other of his epistles; for all the learned do agree in this, that these epistles to the Thessalonians were the first epistles Paul wrote; whence it must follow, that he could not deliver, in his following writings, to that church or any other churches, that doctrine which he had so industriously before confuted, and declared very dangerous, in his epistle to the church of Thessalonica.

The truth seems therefore to be this: That as our Lord had told them, it was not for them to know the times and seasons (Acts i. 7), so were they left still in the dark touching the time of the general judgment; and therefore they continually speak of it as a day that was to come upon men "as a thief in the night," ipsis insciis, as here, v. 1. They, perhaps, did not know when it might happen; and so they say nothing at any time dogmatically, but only ἐνδοιάστως, and disjunctly, "If we shall be found clothed, and not naked;" and here, v. 10, "Whether we sleep or wake." Nor are these sayings to be taken personally, as meant of the apostles, but rather as spoken by them in the person of Christians in the general, some of which would be then surviving. See a discourse at the end of 2 Thessalonians, by way of inquiry, whether the apostles, in their writings, spake as conceiving the day of judgment might be in their days, &c.

[12] Ver. 16. Καὶ ἐν σάλπιγγι Θεοῦ, And in the trump of God.] Pious here, and fit to be regarded, is the note of Theodoret, That if the loud sound of the trumpet, when the law was given from mount Sinai, was so dreadful to the Jews, that they said to Moses, "Let not the Lord speak to us, lest we die:" how terrible must be the sound of this trumpet, which calls all men to the final judgment!

[13] Ver. 17. Σὺν Κυρίῳ, With the Lord.] From which words it may be probably collected, that even the souls of the faithful were not ever with the Lord, or in his celestial presence, before the resurrection.

CHAPTER V.

1 [1] But of the (exact) times and the (critical) seasons, brethren (when the coming of the Lord shall happen), ye have no need that I write unto you.

2 For (you) yourselves know perfectly (from what I taught when present with you) that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night (of the time of whose coming the master of the house can have no certain knowledge, Matt. xxiv. 42, 43, xxv. 13, Mark xiii. 33, Luke xii. 39, 40, xxi. 36).

3 [2] For when they (they of the Jewish nation then, and the wicked at the great day of wrath) shall say, Peace and safety (expecting no such thing as wrath and judgment); then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape (it).

4 But ye, brethren, are not (as formerly) in (a state of) darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief (or come upon you unexpected, or unprepared for it).

5 Ye are all (by virtue of your faith, and knowledge, and your profession of Christianity,) the children of light (as having the light, and believing in it, John xii. 36, Eph. v. 8), and the children of the day (of grace, Rom. xiii. 12, 13, and of salvation, 2 Cor. vi. 2): we are not of the night, nor of darkness (as the Jewish nation at present is, upon whom the darkness is come, John xii. 35, and who are cast into utter darkness, see note on Matt. viii. 12, and as the heathen always were: see note on Rom. xiii. 12).

6 Therefore let us not sleep, as do others (securely in their sins, without expecting judgment, or preparing for it, Matt. xxviii. 38, Luke xvii. 26. 30); but let us watch and be sober (that that day do not come upon us unawares, nor finding us overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, Luke xxi. 34. 36, this being only proper to them who are of the night).

7 For they that sleep sleep in the night; and they that be drunken [3] are drunken in the night.

8 But let us, who are (children) of the day, be sober (and vigilant, 1 Pet. iv. 7, v. 8), putting on the [4] breastplate of faith and love (that firm assurance of faith, which will not suffer us to doubt of the divine assistance, and that love which casts out fear of any thing we may suffer for the cause of Christ); and for an helmet (to your head), the hope of salvation.

9 (Which hope of salvation we Christians have) For God hath not appointed us to wrath (as he hath done the heathen world, who are children of wrath,

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1, 2.] That all this, to the twelfth verse, doth evidently belong only to the destruction of the persecuting Jews and Gnostics, at the time of Christ's coming to destroy the Jewish church and nation, is confidently asserted by a reverend and learned commentator on this place; but is not once hinted by the ancients, who all interpret these words; περὶ τῆς κοινῆς συντελείας, "of Christ's general advent." Nor do his arguments prove his assertion.

Arg. 1. First, Whereas he saith, ἡμέρα Χριστοῦ, "The day of Christ (here mentioned) is, without question, the same which is so often called the coming of Christ for the destroying of the enemies of Christianity:"

Ans. It is certain that this "day of Christ," in the epistles, doth almost generally signify the day of our Lord's coming to the final judgment, as in the following words: "He shall confirm you unto the end, that you may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. i. 8; "That the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. v. 5; "You are our rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus," 2 Cor. i. 14; "He that hath begun a good work in you, shall perfect it to the day of the Lord Jesus," Phil. i. 6; "That ye may be sincere and blameless until the day of Jesus Christ," ver. 10; "That I may rejoice in the day of Christ," Phil. ii. 16 (see 2 Tim. i. 12. 18, iv. 8).

Arg. 2. Secondly, Whereas he adds that "this cannot belong to the last coming of Christ to judgment, because the apostle had made that the subject of his former discourse (ch. iv.), and enters upon this as a distinct matter with a περὶ δὲ," &c.

Ans. It is granted, That the time when this judgment shall be, is a distinct matter from the judgment itself; which is all that this argument proves.

Arg. 3. Thirdly, Whereas he argues thus, "From the end of this discourse, which is to comfort the Christians which are under persecution, and give them patience and constancy; for which this was a fit consideration, That this judgment of God would come suddenly, and when it was least expected, and so would surprise them if they were not watchful; all which belonged peculiarly to this doom upon the Jews, and not to the general judgment, which those who then lived were not concerned in:"

Ans. First, It is certain that the apostle, both in this epistle, iv. 18, and in his other epistle, ch. i., doth comfort his Thessalonians under their persecutions, from the consideration of Christ's coming to reward them at the day of judgment.

Secondly, It is also certain, that Christ and his apostles exhort Christians to be watchful that they may not be "surprised at the day of judgment." So doth Christ, Matt. xxv. 13, Luke xii. 35. 40, so doth Paul, 2 Cor. v. 9, 10, so doth St. Peter, 2 Pet. iii. 11, 12. 14, as being that which all men, who must die, and after that be judged "according to what they have done in the flesh," must be as well concerned to prepare for, by watchfulness, as if it were to come while they were living; and upon this account it is that the apostle, in this chapter, ver. 23, and in the forecited places, prays so oft that Christians "may be confirmed, and kept blameless to the day of the Lord Jesus."

Let it be then observed, that the apostle had spoken, i. 10, of their "waiting for the coming of the Lord from heaven," iii. 13, of his "coming with all his saints," iv. 16, of his "coming with the voice of the archangel, and of the trump of God." He had also hinted, ii. 10, that the unbelieving Jews were, by their opposition to the gospel preached to the gentiles, and by their persecutions of them who had embraced it, filling up the measure of their sins, and drawing down that day of wrath upon them, which is mentioned Matt. xxiv. I therefore shall descant on these words, as relating to both these days of judgment.

[2] Ver. 3.] Josephus* informs us, that when the tumults, foretold by our Saviour, were begun, the Jews were expecting σημεῖα ἐλευθερίας, "signs from God of their liberty;" and that "after all the clear signs God hath given them of their approaching ruin, and when it was even accomplished, they were confidently expecting,† τὴν ἀπὸ Θεοῦ βοήθειαν, the divine aid:" and, which is more remarkable, that the promise of a Messiah, which their sacred books declared was to come, κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν ἐκεῖνον, "about that time,"‡ was τὸ ἐπάρας αὐτοὺς μάλιστα πρὸς πόλεμον, "that which chiefly incited them to the war."

[3] Ver. 7.] Note, Oh, the sad dissoluteness of the manners of the Christians of our age, who frequently are guilty of that drunkenness in the day time, which heathens only practised in the night!

[4] Ver. 8. Θώρακα, The breastplate of the faith, &c.] This metaphor, relating to our Christian warfare, is taken from soldiers, who anciently watched or kept sentinel in their ar-

Eph. ii. 3, and the unbelieving Jews, who are vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, Rom. ix. 22, and upon whom wrath is coming to the end, 1 Thess. ii. 16), but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ,

10 Who died for us, that whether we [5] wake or sleep (i. e. whether he come in the night, and so finding us taking our natural rest, or in the day, when we are waking), we should live together with him (when he comes).

11 Wherefore comfort yourselves together (with this hope), and [6] edify one another, even as also ye do.

12 And we beseech you, brethren, to know (and reverence) them which labour among you, and [7] are over you in the Lord, and admonish you;

13 And to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. And be at peace among yourselves.

14 Now (παραχαλοῦμεν δὲ, and) we exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly (as walking not according to the doctrine they have received from us, 2 Thess. iii. 6. 14), comfort the feebleminded (who are of a wounded spirit under afflictions, ὀλιγόψυχοι, Prov. xviii. 14, that are of a fearful spirit under them, Isa. xxxv. 4, of a grieved spirit, Isa. liv. 6, whose spirit fails under them, Isa. lvii. 16, whose hands hang down, and whose knees are feeble, Heb. xii. 12), support the weak (in faith, who are soon scandalized, and apt to perish by it, Rom. xiv. 1, 2. 21, 1 Cor. viii. 7. 9—12, be patient toward all men.

15 See that none render evil for evil unto any man (whatever the provocation may be, Rom. xii. 27); but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves, and to all men, (even them that hate you, Matt. v. 44.)

16 [8] Rejoice evermore.

17 Pray [9] without ceasing.

mour, having especially their helmet and breastplate on; for, as Livy* notes, scuto præ se erecto stabant galeati, "they stood with their shield before them, and their helmet on their heads." Whence he says of Paulus Æmilius, that milites novo more scutum in vigiliam ferre vetuit; "after a new manner he forbade the soldiers to wear their shield when they watched." Now the head and heart being the two chief fountains of life and sensation, the preserving them safe is, in effect, the preserving of the whole man.

[5] Ver. 10. Εἴτε γρηγορῶμεν, εἴτε καθεύδωμεν.] That is, say some, "whether we live or die." And true it is that Christians dying, are said to "fall asleep." So 1 Cor. xi. 30, κοιμῶνται ἱκανοί, "Some are fallen asleep:" xv. 51, πάντες μὲν οὐ κοιμηθησόμεθα, "We shall not all sleep." So here, iv. 13, "I would not have you ignorant, περὶ τῶν κεκοιμημένων, concerning them that are fallen asleep," and, ver. 14, τοὺς κοιμηθέντας, "Them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him:" but because in all these places the Greek word is never καθεύδω, but always κοιμάομαι, I prefer the exposition of the paraphrase.

But then, that the "hope of salvation," ver. 8, the περιποίησις σωτηρίας, "the obtainment of salvation by Christ Jesus," ver. 9, the "living with him," ver. 10, should refer chiefly to the purchase of deliverance from Jewish persecutions, and the enjoyment of this present life, I can by no means grant; for the Christian's hope is, "the hope of the glory of God," Rom. v. 3, "the hope of the redemption of the body from corruption," viii. 23, 24, "the hope which is laid up for us in heaven," Col. i. 5, "the hope of glory," ver. 27, "a blessed hope," Tit. ii. 13, "the hope of eternal life," iii. 7.

The salvation purchased for us by Christ's death, is not deliverance from persecutions; for "all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecutions," 2 Tim. iii. 12. In these we are to be "conformed to his death," Rom. viii. 17, 2 Tim. ii. 12, "he having suffered; leaving us an example, that we should follow his steps," 1 Pet. ii. 21.

And to "live with Christ," is to live in a state of glory with him, and be conformed to his resurrection, Rom. vi. 8, 2 Tim. ii. 12, Col. iii. 3, 4, 1 Pet. iv. 13, and this is the comfort which the apostle had given him, iv. 18, and to which he now proceeds.

[6] Ver. 11. Οἰκοδομεῖτε εἰς τὸν ἕνα, Edify yourselves into one body,] By your mutual love to one another, as being members of the same body (Eph. iv. 16), and by your strict union, and peaceable conversation with one another, which is the edification of one of us unto another, commanded, Rom. xiv. 9 (see note on Rom. xv. 2).

[7] Ver. 12. Καὶ προϊσταμένους ὑμῶν.] That the persons here mentioned as labouring among them, as being over them, in the plural, should be the bishops of the metropolis of Thessalonica, seems very improbable; there being scarcely any ordinary fixed officers then placed in the church, anno Christi 49 or 51, when this epistle was written: and therefore the learned Mr. Dodwell,† notwithstanding these words, saith, quòd nulla sit rectorum mentio in utrâvis Epistolâ ad Thessalonicenses; "that there is no mention of any fixed rulers in either of the Epistles to the Thessalonians." And (1.) we find no notice taken of them in the front of these epistles, as there is of the bishops and deacons, Phil. i. 1; no salutation of them in the close of these epistles, the words of salutation being only these, "Salute all the brethren with a holy kiss." (2.) We find no directions given to them in particular (but only to the brethren in general) touching such matters as must have related to their office only, or chiefly, had they been settled rulers in the church. The charge in the very next verse runs thus: "We exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak." In the Second Epistle, iii. 6, thus: "We command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walks disorderly, and not according to the tradition which ye received from us:" and, ver. 13, 14, "And ye, brethren, ——if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed; yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother;" and, lastly, to these brethren the adjuration is here directed, ver. 27, "charging them by the Lord, that this epistle be read to all the holy brethren." It is therefore to be noted, that the apostles, prophets, preachers, evangelists, who were all extraordinary officers, are reckoned among those whom God had settled in the church, 1 Cor. xii. 12, and Christ ascending up on high, had given for the edification of his body, Eph. iv. 11, 12. Some of these prophets and teachers were in most churches, as at Antioch, Acts xiii. 1, and officiated in them, ver. 3, at Rome, xii. 6, 7, at Corinth, 1 Cor. xiv., at Galatia, see note on vi. 1. Some of them were itinerants, sent by the apostles, or prophets, to teach other churches, and by the Holy Spirit separated to that work, Acts xiii. 2—4, exhorting and confirming the Christians where they came, as being prophets authorized so to do, Acts xvi. 32, and travelling up and down for the converting and establishing of the gentiles, 3 John 7, 8 (see note on 1 Cor. xii. 28). Of one of these two kinds of prophets, and teachers, and spiritual men, the apostle may here be understood.

Know them who labour among you, and are over you in the Lord.] Here saith Theophylact, "If you honour them who preside over you in temporal affairs, how much more should you respect them who do it in spiritual things, who regenerate you in baptism, pray for you, visit you in sickness, and minister physic to your souls."

[8] Ver. 16. Πάντοτε χαίρετε.] Thus κἂν εἰς πειρασμοὺς, κἂν εἰς λύπας ἐμπέσητε, Œcumenius; "Though you fall into manifold temptations and afflictions" (James i. 2), and be brought into a very low condition in this world; yet "rejoice in the Lord always" (Phil. iv. 4), "rejoice in the hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 3), and of that great reward you shall receive for all your sufferings (Matt. v. 11, 12, Heb. x. 34), and in the spiritual fruits they work in you (Rom. v. 4, James i. 3).

[9] Ver. 17. Ἀδιαλείπτως, Without ceasing.] To give, once for all, the true sense of those injunctions, so frequent in the scripture, to "pray, and give thanks always," and "without ceasing;" observe,

First, That these phrases do, in the mildest sense, import, that these should be the employment of every day, our morning and evening sacrifice; that so beginning and ending the day with them, we may be, in the scripture language, said to do them "always." Thus Luke tells us, xxiv. 53, that the apostles "were continually in the temple, διαπαντὸς, praising God;" that is, they were, καθ' ἡμέραν, "daily in the temple," Acts ii. 46, 47, resorting thither at the third hour of the morning, and at the ninth of the evening sacrifice (Acts iii. 1). The sacrifice which was appointed to be thus offered daily at morning and evening, is in the Hebrew, התמיד, "the continual sacrifice," Dan. viii. 11, and accordingly is rendered by the Septuagint, ἡ θυσία διαπαντός. Thus the mincha, which the high-priest offered every day, half of it in the morning, and half in the evening, is styled by them, ἡ θυσία διαπαντὸς, "the continual sacrifice," Lev. vi. 20. The burnt-offering which was offered, without intermission, twice a day, is, in the Hebrew, על התמיד; and in the LXX., ὁλοκαύτωμα τὸ διαπαντὸς, "the continual sacrifice," Numb. xxviii. 24. 31. And in allusion to it, the author to the Hebrews saith of our high-priest, "By him let us offer up the sacrifice of praise to God continually." This therefore is the prime import of the phrase.

Secondly, These phrases do import, that we should be employed in the performance of these duties, as Providence doth minister occasion for them. In this sense is the word "always" used twice, when our Lord saith, "I was always in the temple, whither the Jews always resort," John xviii. 20; for neither did the Jews always resort unto the temple, but only at the hours of prayer; nor did Christ always teach in it, but only when he went up to Jerusalem. And thus the Holy Ghost, in scripture, leads us to expound these phrases, enjoining us to "abound always in every good work," 2 Cor. ix. 8, and elsewhere, to "do good, ὡς καιρὸν ἔχομεν, as we have occasion," Gal. vi. 10. So, to "pray always," Luke xviii. 1, is to pray ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ, "in every season," xxi. 36. And, to "pray without ceasing," here, is to pray, ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ, "in every opportunity," Eph. vi. 18. So 1 Macc. xii. 11, ἡμεῖς οὖν ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ ἀδιαλείπτως, "We at all times, without ceasing, both in our feasts and other convenient days, do remember you in the sacrifices which we offer;" i. e. we do it as oft as we have occasion to offer sacrifice.

Thirdly, In reference to our prayers particularly, it imports, that we should not grow faint and weary, when Providence seems for a season to defer the blessing we implore (Luke xviii. 1), but should still προσμένειν, "abide in supplication," 1 Tim. v. 5, and ἀγρυπνεῖν, "watch unto it with all perseverance," Eph. vi. 18.

[10] Ver. 18. Ἐν παντὶ, In every thing.] For sparing and preventing, for common and extraordinary, general and special, past and present, temporal and spiritual mercies; not only for prosperous and grateful, but also for afflicting providences, for chastisements, and seasonable corrections; πάντας γὰρ πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον ποιεῖ ὁ Θεὸς, κἂν ἡμεῖς ἀγνοοῦμεν αὐτοῦ τὰς οἰκονομίας, "for God designs them all for our good, though we at present see not how they tend unto it."

[11] Ver. 19. Quench not the Spirit.] Τουτέστι χάρισμα μὴ ἐκβράσατε καὶ κωλύετε, τῷ ἀποστρέφεσθαι καὶ μὴ ἐᾶν λαλεῖν, Œcumen, i. e. "Hinder not the gifts of the Spirit, by turning away from them that have them, and not suffering them to speak." These gifts were quenched by strife, emulation, schisms, and contention about them (1 Cor. iii. 1. 3): (2.) By a disorderly use of them, not to the edification of the church, but to vain ostentation, confusion in the church, and the scandal of heathens (1 Cor. xiv.), by a neglect to exercise them: "Forbid not to speak with tongues" (1 Cor. xv. 39).

[12] Ver. 20. Despise not prophesyings.] Προφάσει τῶν ψευδοπροφητῶν, καὶ τοὺς ἀληθεῖς διέπτυον, Œcumenius. Some of these false prophets had crept into the church at Thessalonica, as is hinted in those words, "Be not troubled by (them, who pretend a revelation from the) Spirit, as if the day of Christ were at hand" (2 Thess. ii. 2), which made them less regardful of what was delivered by men pretending to this gift: and made it necessary for John to say, "Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they be of God: for many false prophets are gone out into the world" (1 John iv. 1). And to prevent the mischief the Thessalonians might receive from them, the apostle here adds, "Try all things," &c. ver. 21.

[13] Ver. 21. Δοκιμάζετε, Try.] Note, That the apostle doth not here bid the guides of the church try all things, and the people hold fast that which they delivered to them; but gives an injunction common to all Christians, "having their senses exercised to discern betwixt good and evil;" to all who are obliged to hold fast that which is good, and not to believe false prophets; which is a strong argument for the perspicuity and the sufficiency of holy scripture for this work, and against the necessity of a living judge: for he that must try all things, must also try the doctrine of this living judge; and therefore till he hath made this trial, must not admit his doctrine as an article of Christian faith; for these words plainly teach that what we must hold fast, must first be tried. "Hearers," saith Basil, "who are instructed in the scriptures, ought to try the things spoken by their teachers, καὶ τὰ μὲν σύμφωνα ταῖς γραφαῖς δέχεσθαι, τὰ δὲ ἀλλότρια ἐκβάλλειν, and receive those doctrines which are consonant, and reject those which are alien from the holy scriptures; because St. Paul hath said, Try all things; hold fast that which is good." See Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 354. Strom. vi. p. 655. Orig. in Joh. tom. xix. ed. Huet. p. 268, and Hom. 2 in Ezek. f. 135, G. Jerome in Ep. ad Eph. lib. iii. cap. 5, p. 101. Cyril of Alex. in Joh. lib. iv. p. 374. 407, and lib. i. adv. Nestor. p. 2.

[14] Ver. 22. Ἀπὸ παντὸς εἰδους πονηροῦ, From all kinds or sorts of evil.] So the Syriac doth render these words. So Chrysostom and Theophylact upon this place. So Basil and Leontius, cited by Dr. Hammond, who descant thus upon the words: "Fly not from this or that only, but from every sin." Or, secondly, if the apostle here exhorts us to abstain from "all appearance of evil;" his meaning cannot be this, that we should abstain from what appears evil to others: it being, in many cases, impossible to know what appears so, and impracticable to act by such a rule; because it would destroy our Christian liberty in things indifferent, and create in our minds continual perplexities, there being scarcely any thing which may not appear evil, to some or other of those numerous sects which swarm among us: he therefore only must enjoin us to abstain from that which, after trial, seems evil to ourselves, and is judged by us so to be; for the apostle makes these two things, the "holding that which is good," and the "abstaining from all appearance of evil," the consequent of trying all things. Now we try all things, that, after trial, we may hold that which seemeth to us good, and abstain from that which seemeth to us evil, not to abstain from that which seemeth so to others only.

[15] Ver. 23. Ὁλόκληρον ὑμῶν τὸ πνεῦμα, καὶ ἡ ψυχὴ, καὶ τὸ σῶμα, Your whole spirit, and soul, and body.] Here the apostle justifies the ancient and true philosophy, that man is, as Nemesius styles him, τριμερὴς ὑπόστασις, "a compound of three differing parts." This was the doctrine of the Pythagoreans, as we learn from Jamblichus,* who, having told us that man consists of soul and body, adds that "the soul consists of two parts; one endued with reason, and one without reason." This also was the philosophy of the Platonists, as we learn from Nemesius,† Sallust, and Laertius, who inform us, that "there is in man a soul irrational, which follows the affections of the body; and a mind, which useth the body as its instrument, and fights against it." This also was the doctrine of the stoics; whence Antoninus saith, the three constituent parts of man are, σῶμα, ψυχὴ, νοῦς, "the body, soul, and mind." Irenæus,* and Clemens† of Alexandria, and Origen,‡ say the same. Mr. Le Clerc here is very positive, that "this philosophy is false," and that "there is nothing in man but his body, and his reasonable soul." But he saith nothing to sustain this confidence against those two excellent philosophers, Gassendus,§ and Dr. Willis,‖ who have established this philosophy beyond all reasonable contradiction. Nor can the conflict betwixt the mind and spirit, and the flesh, mentioned Rom. viii. from ver. 14 to the 25th, and Gal. v. 16, 17, be explained; nor can any man tell what the τὸ ἀρχικὸν, or ruling principle in us, is to govern, without admitting this inferior soul as the fountain of our sensual appetites, or even tell us what it is to die; unless it be to make this inferior soul, which consists in the motion of the animal spirits, and the sensitive appetites they produce in us, to cease to act, or move, as formerly. He will have ψυχὴ here to signify life, as indeed it doth in other places; but never where constituent parts of a man are enumerated as here they are; and seeing the spirit and the body are unquestionably the constituent parts of a man, it is reasonable to conceive, that the ψυχὴ mentioned here must be so also, especially since it is divided from the spirit and the body by the particle καὶ. Moreover, by following the motions of this brutish appetite, is a man styled ψυχικὸς, "the animal man," and by being animated and informed by this ψυχὴ, is the body called σῶμα ψυχικὸν, "an animal body," 1 Cor. xv. 44, 45; and by conveying of this ψυχὴ, or inferior soul, to his posterity, is the first Adam said to be made εἰς ψυχὴν ζῶσαν, to convey this animal life to his posterity; though this at last may be only a strife about words, the animal spirits being included in the body.

[16] Ver. 24. Πιστὸς ὁ καλῶν ὑμᾶς, Faithful is he that calleth you.] Who therefore will not be wanting in what is requisite on his part towards it; I say his part, for if the fidelity of God required that he would sanctify and preserve us blameless to the end, without our care and industry, or should work in us absolutely and certainly that care, and the apostle believed this, how could he fear lest the Thessalonians should be so overcome by Satan's temptations, as that his labour with them might have been in vain (1 Thess. iii. 5), this being in effect to fear that God might be unfaithful to his promise?

[17] Ver. 27. Ὁρκίζω ὑμᾶς, I adjure you by the Lord.] In judicial oaths the custom among the Jews was, not for the person who came under the obligation of an oath to pronounce the words of swearing with his own mouth, but an oath was extracted from him by the magistrate or superior, and so he became bound to answer upon oath, "by hearing the voice of adjuration," φωνὴν ὁρκισμοῦ, so the Septuagint, Lev. v. 1. So Gen. l. 16, "Our father, ὥρκισε, made us swear before he died;" Josh. vi. 26, ὥρκισεν Ἰησοῦς ἐναντίον Κυρίου, "Joshua adjured them, saying, Cursed is the man before the Lord, that raiseth up and buildeth Jericho;" 1 Sam. xiv. 24, "Saul had adjured the people, ὁρκίσας ὥρκισε τὸν λαὸν, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food;" that is, he charged the people with an oath: 1 Kings xxii. 16, ποσάκις ὁκρίσω σε; "How oft shall I adjure thee?" So in the New Testament, the high-priest saith to Christ, ὁρκίζω σε κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ ζῶντος, "I adjure thee by the living God." Now hence two things are evident; (1.) That Paul did not judge all judicial oaths unlawful, for then he would not have laid this oath upon his Thessalonians. (2.) That Christ did not forbid judicial, but only voluntary oaths, because it was not in the power of the Jews, to whom he spake, to avoid judicial oaths, nor would he then have answered to the adjuration of the high-priest.

SECOND EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

Having offered a new interpretation of the second chapter of this epistle, which treateth of "the man of sin," commonly called "antichrist," there mentioned, I shall here give the reasons why I could not acquiesce in any of the expositions already given either by protestants or papists, and answer some objections against the exposition I have put upon the words of the apostle in that chapter. And,

§. 1. First, Whereas Mr. Obadiah Walker hath taken a great deal of pains to apply all that the apostle saith to Mahomet and his followers, that vain conceit will be demonstratively confuted from the following considerations:

1. That the apostle here exhorts the Thessalonians "not to be shaken in mind, or troubled, either by spirit, or by letter, or by word, as from us (the apostles), as if the day of the Lord were at hand," ver. 2. Now what day doth the apostle mean? Surely that day when "the Lord shall consume the wicked one by the breath of his mouth, and by the brightness of his coming," ver. 8. Now sure it is, that Mahomet came not till five hundred and sixty-seven years after the writing this epistle, viz. A. D. 608, nor is our Lord yet come to "consume him with the breath of his mouth," nor know we when he will do so. How therefore could it be, that they, who were foretold so punctually of the apostasy which should introduce "the man of sin," and what yet hindered the revelation of him in his season, as the Thessalonians were (ver. 5, 6), should think the day of the Lord's coming to destroy Mahomet and his followers was at hand? or that they should be led into this apprehension by any word, epistle, or revelation, made, spoken, or written, by the apostles or prophetic men concerning him. Could they then know from the mouth of Paul, that this man of sin was one Mahomet, who was not to appear till five hundred and sixty-seven years after his speaking of him; and when he did appear, was to continue above a thousand years before the coming of our Lord to consume him, and yet by any of his words be induced to conceive "the day of the Lord was at hand?"

Moreover, If the coming of our Lord here mentioned, was to consume the beast, or Roman antichrist, seeing this beast was to arise out of the ruins of the Roman empire, and if Paul had told them any thing from Daniel of this matter, he must have let them know that this was so; and also that this antichrist, when risen out of the ruins of that empire, was to continue for "a time and times, and half a time," that is, twelve hundred and sixty years before the coming of our Saviour to destroy him. It is as difficult to conceive how, after this, the Thessalonians could think Christ's coming to consume the beast could be then instant when this epistle was indited.

§. 2. Arg. 2. I argue, Secondly, against this opinion, from those words, "Remember ye not that when I was with you, I told you of these things?" ver. 5—7. That is, I told you of the apostasy that was to precede the man of sin; how he should "exalt himself above all that is called God," &c. and what it was that hindered his being revealed in his season: now can any one believe that the apostle, who was not with the Thessalonians long enough to "perfect what was lacking in their faith" (1 Thess. iii. 10), should yet employ his time in telling them a long story of the apostasy of the Arians and Nestorians, saith Mr. Walker, and of one Mahomet, who should thus exalt himself, and what then hindered his being revealed? Could he say that very "mystery of iniquity," this Mahomet was to bring into the world, then wrought, only because there were some heretics, already come, who "confessed not that Jesus Christ was come in the flesh," though Mahomet confessed this very freely? As well may it be said, that the mystery of quakerism was wrought in the second and third centuries, because some heretics of those times taught doctrines like those they now profess.

And since it is equally improbable the apostle, in that little time, should speak to them of the apostasy of the church of Rome from the faith, and how the bishop of Rome should lord it over Christian emperors, and over the laws of God and Christ, and "wear out the saints of the Most High" for twelve hundred and sixty years; and is still more improbable, that he should say all this then to them, and here again bring the same thing to their remembrance, and yet that not the least intimation of any thing of this nature should appear in any Christian writers on this subject for six following centuries: since, I say, this is so, this argument must be of equal strength against those who conceive the papal antichrist should primarily and chiefly be intended here.

§. 3. Arg. 3. Thirdly, I argue against this opinion from those words, "And then shall that wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of his mouth," &c. ver. 8. For hence it seems plain this wicked one was to be destroyed by the coming of our Lord soon after the time of his revelation, and not above a thousand years after; as both the opinion of those papists, who say that he is Mahomet, and of those protestants, who say that he is the pope and his clergy, must make the interval betwixt his revelation and destruction be; for the same thing that hindered his revelation, hindered the coming of our Lord to destroy him thus revealed; and these two things seem to be thus connected: The day of the Lord will not come, till there come first an apostasy, and by that a revelation of the man of sin; when therefore this apostasy, and this revelation of the man of sin happens, then will Christ come to consume him. And otherwise the Christians of after ages might have been subject, from the apostle's words, to a like mistake to that here mentioned, seeing, to tell them they had no reason yet to expect this day of the Lord, because it was not to come till the man of sin was revealed; and to add, when that which hindered the revelation of him in his season was once taken away, then should he also be revealed whom the Lord should consume with the brightness of his coming, must fairly lead them to expect this day soon after his revelation, and not after he had been thus revealed above a thousand years.

§. 4. Those arguments are such as equally confute the opinion of those protestants, who conceive the apostle primarily to characterize the pope and his clergy, and of those who apply these words to Mahomet.

Arg. 4. But, Fourthly, I argue against them, who suppose Mahomet to be the man here intended, from these words of the apostle, that the coming of this wicked one shall be "according to the working of Satan in all power, signs, and lying wonders," ver. 9; for the words δυνάμεις, σημεῖα, τέρατα, "powers, signs, and wonders," are never used in scripture for any wonderful things done by God upon men, or any ecstasies or conferences of angels with them, but always for outward signs done by men upon other things or persons: such as were the healing of the sick and lame, the casting out of devils, the raising of the dead (see note on Heb. ii. 4). Now Mahomet every where professeth that he came not with any such miracles, and therefore he could not be the person here designed: for his opposers demanded of him such miracles, saying, "Moses and Jesus, according to thy own doctrine, wrought miracles to prove their mission from God; and therefore if thou be a prophet, and greater than any that were ever sent before thee, as thou boastest thyself to be, do thou the like miracles to manifest it to us; do thou make the dead to rise, the dumb to speak, the deaf to hear, &c., and then we will believe in thy word." This objection, saith Dr. Prideaux,* he endeavoured to evade by several answers: "one while he tells them, he is only a man sent to preach to them the rewards of paradise, and the punishments of hell: at another time, that their predecessors contemned the miracles of Salch and the other prophets, and that for this reason God would work no more among them: and a while after, that those whom God had ordained to believe, should believe without miracles; and those whom he had not ordained to believe, should not be convinced, though all these miracles should be wrought in their sight, which they required. But this not satisfying, as being a plain confession that he wanted that power of miracles which all other prophets had to prove their mission, several of those that were his followers departed from him. Having therefore got the sword into his hand, and an army to back his cause, his doctrine then was, that God had sent Moses and Jesus with miracles, and yet men would not be obedient to their word; and therefore he had now sent him, in the last place, without miracles, to force them by the power of the sword to do his will.

"However (says he) it is not to be denied, that there are several miracles reckoned up which Mahomet is said to have wrought; as that he did cleave the moon in two; that the trees went forth to meet him; and that the stones saluted him;" which are the miracles here mentioned by Mr. Walker. But then he adds, that "they who relate them are only such as are reckoned among their fabulous and legendary writers; their learned doctors renounce them all, as doth Mahomet himself, who in several places of his Alcoran owns that he wrought no miracles."

§. 5. Against the opinion of Grotius, that Caius Caligula was the man of sin, it is superfluous to say much, it being grounded upon an error in chronology, that St. Paul writ this epistle, A. D. 40, when Caius appeared; whereas it is certain, from 1 Thess. i. 5, that Paul had been at Thessalonica before this epistle was writ; for Paul went up to Jerusalem, say the best chronologers, A. D. 49, and it is evident that then he had not been at Thessalonica, and so had writ no epistle to them, it being writ after "his entrance in to them," ver. 9, after he had "spoken to them the gospel of God," ii. 2, after he had been "taken from them a short time," ver. 17. Now that he had not been at Thessalonica before his going up to the council at Jerusalem, appears from the history of the Acts, which saith, that after this council he went to Antioch, xv. 30, then through Syria and Cilicia, ver. 41, then to Derbe and Lystra, xvi. 1, 2, then through Phrygia, Galatia, and Mysia, and so to Troas, ver. 6—8, then to Samothracia, Neapolis, and Philippi, ver. 11, 12, and having passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, he came to Thessalonica, xvii. 1. He therefore coming only thither eight years after the death of Caius, and not writing this epistle till after he had left them, could not then write of Caius, as "the man of sin" to be yet revealed.

* Life of Mahomet, p. 30—32.

§. 6. I pass on to the interpretation of Dr. Hammond, which is this:

1. "That the man of sin, the son of perdition, was Simon Magus, together with his followers the Gnostics, designed for destruction (Paraph. on ver. 3).

2 "That Simon Magus setting himself at the head of them, Christ should destroy him by extraordinary means, as the preaching and the miracles of St. Peter; and the Gnostics that adhered to him, at the destruction of the unbelieving Jews (Paraph. on ver. 8).

3. "That the falling away first, must be a great departure or defection from the faith to the heresy of the Gnostics, or the Christians breaking off their compliance with the impenitent Jews, leaving them as obdurate, and departing avowedly to the gentiles (Paraph. on ver. 3).

4. "That which withholdeth, and he that letteth, was the apostles not giving over preaching to the Jews, as hopeless and refractory, and going to the gentiles (Paraph. on ver. 6); and the Christians walking warily, and doing nothing contrary to the Mosaical law.

5. "That the mystery already working was this sort of men already formed into a sect under their ringleaders Simon and Carpocrates" (Paraph. on ver. 7).

Now against this opinion I argue,

First, From "the day of the Lord" here mentioned, ver. 1, 2; for that indeed doth often signify in scripture the day of the Lord's coming to the destruction of the temple, city, and nation, of the Jews; which, saith the reverend Dr. Hammond, is the true import of the phrase here; but it never signifies his coming to destroy Simon Magus. Moreover, it is plain from the eighth verse that this coming of the Lord is to destroy "the man of sin," he being to be destroyed "by the brightness of his coming;" how then can this day be the time appointed for the destruction of Simon Magus, who perished some years before Christ's coming to the destruction of Jerusalem? for, according to Valesius,* Eusebius, and Symeon Metaphrastes, Simon perished in the reign of Claudius; he coming then to Rome, and St. Peter then also coming after him, to detect his frauds; whence he well argues, that "it is not probable he should long there insult over the Christian faith, St. Peter being then present to oppose him."† Now if this be true, he perished at the least sixteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem, and Christ came to destroy him within four years after the writing this epistle. If he perished, as others will have it, in the fourth of Nero, he must die twelve years before Christ came to destroy Jerusalem; or if he continued till the twelfth of Nero, opposing Christianity twelve years at Rome, under the very nose of the two chief apostles, which is not very probable, yet must he die four years before Christ's coming to the destruction of Jerusalem, and therefore could not be destroyed, "by the brightness of his coming."

Must we then refer this only to the destruction of his followers the Gnostics? That they were then in being, I could never yet see proved, and much less that any of them perished at the destruction of Jerusalem. I know the doctor cites Eusebius,‡ as saying, that the Gnostics "in a moment were utterly extinct;" whereas it is manifest, Eusebius says this not of the Gnostics, but the Nicolaitans; nor could he say it of them, who flourished chiefly in the second century; whence it is styled, sæculum Gnosticum: moreover, it is a plain flaw in this, or any like interpretation, to make the head of any party, with his followers, to be the "man of sin" to be consumed by the coming of our Lord; and yet to make the antisignanus perish before his coming, and his followers only at it.

Add to this, that the whole foundation of this opinion depends upon the tale of Simon Magus's§ flying in the air at Rome, and his falling down and breaking his bones at the prayer of St. Peter;† which is a thing not only uncertain, but, in the judgment of many learned persons, absolutely false. Cotelerius, a Romanist, is forced, ἐπέχειν, to suspend his judgment about it: First, By reason of the original of the story, which, saith he, had its rise, è libris apocryphis et pseudepigraphis,‡ "from apocryphal and spurious authors."

Secondly, By reason of the great discrepancy to be found among them, in their relations of divers circumstances of this story: some of them saying, that Simon Magus made himself "wings to fly;" some, that he was "held up by two devils;"‖ others, that he made himself "a chariot,"¶ or ascended in a fiery chariot, drawn by four horses; and all say that he did this "by magic."

Again, they differ equally as to the effects this fall had upon this magician; some saying that he died by it, and was seen dead upon the spot, that it dashed out his brains,†† broke his whole body,‡‡ yea, broke it into four parts:§§ others, that Peter prayed he might not die, and so he only broke his thigh, say some;‖‖ or his hands and feet, as others.

Some tell us, this was done in the reign of Claudius; and others, that it was done in the reign of Nero; some, that it was done by Peter¶¶ only; others, that it was done by Peter and Paul; some, that it was done by prayer;††† and others, that they added fasting to their prayer: so little agreement is there amongst them in any circumstance of this action. And,

Thirdly, The story may deserve to be suspected, by reason of the silence of all the ancients of the three first centuries, who speak much of his being at Rome, and of his being honoured with a statue there; but say nothing of his flight or fall, by virtue of the prayers of Peter, though they had just occasion to speak of it, had they believed the story. For Justin Martyr,‡‡‡ in his Apology, speaks twice of this statue; and desires the emperor and senate, that, learning the truth, they would abolish that statue; but he saith not one word of this illustrious combat, which was so admirable a conviction of his fraud. Clemens of Alexandria* saith, that Simon heard Peter preach a little while, but addeth not one word of what he suffered by Peter's prayers. Tertullian† having noted, that after the coming of the gospel magicians were always punished, speaks only of Simon Magus as ejected out of the church; though he observes, that Elymas was struck blind: and that in the Acts of the Apostles,‡ he received a just sentence, and worthy of himself, from the apostle Peter, but addeth not one word of what he suffered from Peter at Rome. Origen§ proves, that there was οὐδὲν θεῖον, "nothing divine" in Simon, from the nature of his doctrine, which made "idolatry a thing indifferent;" and from the success of it, it being in his time almost extinct, and that he perished with his silver; but adds not a hint of his perishing by the prayers of the apostles, which was the strongest proof against his pretensions that he was "the power of God." Eusebius‖ declares, how the devil raised up Simon as the great adversary to the apostles, and how the divine grace, by their appearance and presence, extinguished that flame; and how the providence of God sent Peter after him to Rome, in the days of Claudius, to set himself against him; and how he prevailed, by causing the light of the gospel to shine there; but gives not the least hint of his being thus overcome, or thrown down, by the prayers of Peter. The bishops of Rome, who, saith Cotelerius, sua tacere non solent, "use not to be silent in matters relating to themselves," say nothing of it. Nor is it credible, saith Hornius,¶ scriptores Romanos tam memorabilem rem præterituros fuisse; "that all the Roman writers of those times, Suetonius, Tacitus, Pliny, &c. should pass over so memorable a thing in silence;" especially if Simon was so honoured by Claudius, and beloved by Nero, as some authors of this story say he was. It seems inconsistent, saith Valesius, with that other story, of Simon's being honoured at Rome "as a god, by the emperor, senate, and the people, and the continuance of his statue there in Justin Martyr's days;" which sure it would not have done, had he been so remarkably defeated or destroyed before their eyes. And, lastly, Austin freely owns, that "at Rome this story was by most people deemed false." And is such a tale fit to be laid as the foundation of the interpretation of this chapter?

§. 7. Arg. 2. This opinion may also be confuted from those words, "This day shall not come, unless there be an apostasy first, and the man of sin be revealed." For,

1. It is intolerable to think that act, which was so necessary for the promotion of the gospel among the gentiles, viz. the not imposing on them circumcision and the Jewish yoke, and the ceasing to preach in the synagogues of the Jews, was the apostasy intended by the apostle in these words. The zealots among the Jews might say of Paul, "Thou teachest apostasy from the law of Moses;" for afterward the Ebionites rejected all his epistles,* ἀποστάσην ἀπεκάλουν αὐτὸν τοῦ νόμου, "calling him an apostate from the law;" but that Paul himself, speaking to the gentiles, should call this his own practice an apostasy, is incredible.

Moreover, what advantage would it do them in this matter, to tell them of an apostasy which had happened before their conversion (Acts xiii. 46). "Lo, we turn unto the gentiles, for so hath the Lord commanded us," and happened again about the time of writing this epistle (Acts xix. 9); and finally, saith the doctor, was completed when Paul came to Rome, about five or seven years after, at the most? Might not the coming of the Lord be at hand, though an apostasy, so near to be completed, were to go before it? (see James v. 8, 9, 1 Pet. iv. 7.)

2. As for the apostasy of a considerable part of Christians to the abominable impiety of the Gnostics, I have all along, in the interpretation of these epistles, considered that, and find no reason to assert it, nor any thing that favours it, till we come to 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21. It is true, indeed, as Justin Martyr† and Eusebius testify, that most of the Samaritans worshipped Simon "as the chief god; but ὀλίγοι ἐν ἄλλοις ἔθνεσιν, few in other nations," say they, "did it;" but that one single person fell off from Christianity to him, they say not. Eusebius‡ is express, that, "neither the heresy of Simon Magus, nor of others, had any prevalency in the times of the apostles." The great apostasy, which, after the writing this epistle, first appeared, and against which the catholic epistles of James, Peter, and John, and especially the epistle to the Hebrews, were written, was that of the converted Jews to Judaism again: and to this Dr. Lightfoot probably refers the apostasy here mentioned; our Lord having foretold, that the devil, once cast out of them by the gospel, should return to them with seven more evil spirits than himself; and concluding that parable with those words, "So shall it be with this present generation," Matt. xii. 43—45. Which opinion is well consistent with my interpretation of this chapter, and may be embraced by them who like not my notion of this apostasy.

Secondly, This man of sin was yet to be revealed, ver. 3, and there was yet a season to come, in which he was to be revealed, ver. 6. 8; whereas, by the confession of Dr. Hammond, Simon Magus was revealed as an opposer of Christ, and an ἀντίπαλος, or "antagonist" to the apostles long before: for he saith, that§ "being denied the power of working miracles, which he would have bought of the apostles, soon after he set up, and opposed himself against Christ; and accordingly is here called, ὁ ἀντικείμενος, the adversary, or he that opposeth himself." Now the time when he would have bought of them this power of working of miracles was A. D. 35; that is, fourteen years before Paul wrote this epistle: if then soon after he set up, and opposed himself against Christ, he must discover himself soon after the year 35, and so before the writing this epistle. He adds in the same note, "that Simon Magus came to Rome in the beginning of Claudius's reign, and there did such miracles by the help of the devils, that he was taken for a god, and accordingly had a statue erected to him, with this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto." Eusebius there adds, that the devil had set him up as the great and equal antagonist of the divine apostles. Jerome‖ also saith, that "in the second year of Claudius, Peter came to Rome to oppose him." He, therefore, who was then set up as the great adversary of the apostles, and as such opposed by them, in the second year of Claudius, that is, A. D. 42, must be discovered then, that is, nine years before the writing this epistle. Eusebius there adds, that the flame he had there raised, by the appearance and presence of the apostles, i. e. of Peter, as the words following show, ᾗ τάχος ἐσβέννυ, "was soon extinguished;" which seems to prove, that Simon Magus's opposition to Christ was not only discovered, but even extinguished with his person before the writing this epistle. And indeed Irenæus, and almost all the ancients agree in this with Dr. Hammond, that Simon Magus, having suffered this repulse from Peter at Samaria, "began to search still more into the depths of magic, that he might be more able to contend with the apostles,"* and that by this means he astonished many, was honoured by Claudius with a statue, and glorified by many as a god. "He soon returned," saith Theodoret,† "to his former arts." Now, can we think that a man who designed to be reckoned μέγας τις, "some great one," and to seem glorious in the world, should pursue that design, by hiding, and not discovering himself about fifteen years?

In a word, it cannot reasonably be thought that almost all Samaria should worship him; that he should be honoured in the days of Claudius as a god at Rome, by the emperor, the senate, and the people; and that the devil should set him up as the great adversary of the apostles, long before this time; and that the season of his being revealed should be yet to come.

§. 8. Arg. 3. Thirdly, I argue against this opinion from these words, "He sitteth in the temple of God," ver. 4; for whether we interpret this of the temple of Jerusalem, or of the church of God, which are all the interpretations known to the ancient fathers, or applied by them to these words, it is certain that neither Simon Magus, nor his followers, sat in any of them. The doctor‡ therefore is forced to say, this agrees to Simon, as being worshipped at Samaria, in those places which had been set apart to the worship of the true God, they worshipping him there, θυμιάμασι καὶ θυσίαις, καὶ σπονδαῖς, "with all sorts of sacrifices." But would Paul style the Samaritan temple, had it been then standing, as it was not, "the temple of God?" Would he have done this, after our Lord's declaration made against them, that they "worshipped they knew not what?" The truth is, that the temple built upon their holy mountain was long before destroyed by Hyrcanus; and that which Herod built them, they regarded not, as standing not upon that mountain. Where therefore was the temple in which they offered all kind of sacrifices to this magician? Indeed, the doctor useth too much artifice, in thus connecting these things; for that almost all the Samaritans did worship Simon Magus as the first or principal god, Eusebius doth say from Justin Martyr, Hist. Eccl. ii. 13; but that they then worshipped him with any kind of sacrifices, he doth not say; but only, that some of his followers, "who pretended to embrace the Christian religion"§ (which Simon Magus then professedly opposed), "fell back to the worship of demons, and had got images of Simon and Helen, which they thus worshipped with sacrifices."

§. 9. Arg. 4. "Remember you not," saith the apostle, "that I told you of these things?" Now is it probable that, in the short time he stayed with them, he should tell them how Simon Magus sat in the temple of God, and that Christ's coming was to destroy him; and that so soon as Paul should leave off preaching in the Jewish synagogues, Simon Magus and his followers would be revealed? Credat Judæus apella. "For the mystery of iniquity doth already work," ver. 7, that is, saith Dr. Hammond, this sort of men are already formed into a sect, under their ringleaders, Simon and Carpocrates. Wonderful! that Carpocrates, who, say Clemens of Alexandria,‖ Eusebius, and Theodoret, appeared only in the time of Hadrian, that is, A. D. 107, at the soonest, should be the ringleader of a sect at the writing of this epistle; that is, at least fifty-six years before he began his heresy.

It follows, ver. 8, "And then shall that wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth," &c. "That is," saith Dr. Hammond, "then immediately shall ye see the sect of the Gnostics show itself, join with, and stir up the Jews, and bring heavy persecutions upon the Christians; and having this opportunity to calumniate them to the Jews, behave themselves as their professed opposers. And Simon Magus shall set himself forth in the head of them, whom, as a professed enemy of Christ, Christ shall destroy, by extraordinary means, by the preaching and miracles of Peter; and for all the apostatizing Gnostics that adhere to him, they shall be involved in the destruction of the unbelieving Jews, with whom they have joined against the Christians." In which long paraphrase there is nothing certain, and nothing which can be confirmed, either from scripture or antiquity. That there were then any Gnostics in being; that they ever then did, or were in a capacity to persecute the Christians; that any single person of them perished, at the fatal time of the destruction of the unbelieving Jews, I never yet saw proved. That Simon Magus should set himself at the head of these Gnostics, or of any other of his followers, who was extinct before they bore that name, it is not credible. That his followers, who pretended that Simon himself was the chief or principal god; who worshipped him, and the very images of Simon and Helena, with all kind of sacrifices; who held, "the law and prophets were not to be regarded," should ingratiate themselves, and join with the Jews, is still more incredible. And, lastly, that Simon Magus perished by the miracles of Peter, I have shown to be improbable. And this I think sufficient to be offered against this interpretation.

§. 10. I should proceed to those considerations which seem to lie against that opinion, which holds that the apostle primarily intends the papal antichrist; but I have already done this, both in this preface, and in the following annotations; and therefore shall at present only add, that this "man of sin" is to sit "in the temple of God," and probably to do it then when the apostle writ: for he gives it as a character, by which the Thessalonians, to whom he writ, might know him, and then he could be no other than the Jewish doctors. Moreover, this "temple of God" must either be the temple of God, properly so called, which was destroyed by Titus, A. D. 70, and then again, "the man of sin," who was to sit in it, must denote the same persons; or, as some of the most ancient fathers, Irenæus,* Hippolytus,† Cyril,‡ and Ambrose,§ thought, either the ruins of that temple, or another to be built by antichrist in behalf of the Jews; and then, as it is not reasonable to think the apostle would absolutely style that "the temple of God," which had never been so, and which was only built by one who "magnified himself against," and openly blasphemed the true God; so is it more unreasonable to think the pope and his clergy should sit in it. They therefore who think that they are here especially intended, embrace the sentiments of the fathers of the fifth and the following centuries, viz. of Chrysostom,‖ Theodoret, Austin, and Jerome, that by "the temple of God," we are to understand the Christian church. But this interpretation is liable to this objection, that it is not reasonable to conceive the Holy Spirit, without any mark of distinction, would give that name to the apostate church, in which "the beast" and "the false prophet" did preside, she being by the same Spirit, when he speaks more unquestionably of her, still represented as "spiritual Sodom and Egypt, mystical Babylon," and "the mother of fornications and abominations," Rev. xi. 8, xvii. 5. Hence Bellarmine* makes this inference from the interpretation of the protestants, that, if it be true, the Roman church, in which the pope presides, must be the church of God. To this our writers answer, that this name was given to the church of Rome because she once was so. But when was that? Was it not before "the man of sin" sat in her, and exalted himself above God and Christ? and can he properly be said to sit in the church of God, who, whilst he sitteth in it, is not "the man of sin," nor does those things which belong to him; and when he is "the man of sin," sitteth no longer in the church of God, but in "spiritual Egypt," the oppressor of God's people, in "mystical Babylon," the mother of idolatry, and the great enemy of the church of God, and in the "synagogue of Satan?"

But that I may not wholly differ from my brethren in this matter, I grant these words may, in a secondary sense, be attributed to the papal antichrist, or man of sin, and may be signally fulfilled in him, in the destruction of him by "the spirit of Christ's mouth," he being the successor to the apostate Jewish church, to whom these characters agree, as well as to her; and therefore in the annotations I have still given a place to this interpretation also.

§. 11. Lastly, As for the objections which may be raised against the sense which I have put upon these words, I shall answer most of them in the annotations, therefore shall only give a more full answer to these two; viz.

Obj. 1. That all the fathers and ancient interpreters seem not only silent as to this import of these words, but generally seem to refer the τὸ κατέχον, that which withheld this revelation of the man of sin, to the Roman empire.

Ans. To this I answer, (1.) That this objection may be retorted upon all the other opinions with equal strength; for what is there said by any of the fathers or ecclesiastical writers for six hundred years, whence it may be concluded that either Mahomet or the pope of Rome was the "man of sin" here mentioned? What hint hath any commentator, Greek or Latin, in his notes upon this chapter, for a thousand years given, that the pope and his clergy were the persons here intended?

If it be here replied, that they do consequentially overthrow this opinion, by making the Roman empire to be the τὸ κατέχον, "that which withheld;" I answer, that they more fully overthrow the opinion, which saith the papal government is antichrist, or the man of sin.

1. By saying that antichrist† was coming, and at hand, long before the appearance of "the little horn," which sprung up only from the ruins of the Roman empire, which happened A. D. 475.

2. By teaching, so generally as they did, that antichrist, being once revealed, was to continue not twelve hundred and sixty years, but only "three years and a half" (see note on ver. 8).

3. That he was to be of the Jewish extract, one‡ "of the tribe of Dan," who was also to be circumcised. And,

4. That he should be an enemy to§ idolatry and image-worship, as Irenæus, Hippolytus, Cyrillus Hieros., St. Chrysostom, and Theodoret, say.

In a word, they generally held, as I have shown, note on ver. 10, that antichrist was to come with signs and wonders to deceive the Jews, that they might be punished for their infidelity. All which things must be manifestly inconsistent with the common notion, that the pope's hierarchy must be the man of sin here primarily intended by St. Paul.

Thirdly, I answer, that though the fathers do not expressly say the Jewish nation was "the man of sin," which the apostle here intended; yet many of them have said those things on which this our interpretation doth depend; as, v. g. that this man of sin was to be of Jewish extract, that he was to sit in the temple of Jerusalem, and that he was to come chiefly to deceive the unbelieving Jews, that so they might be punished for their infidelity. And,

Lastly, As to the τὸ κατέχον, or rather ὁ κατέχων, "he that letteth," I only in this differ from them, that whereas they refer this to the Roman empire, I do refer it to a Roman emperor; and as some of them held that Nero* was this antichrist, and man of sin, and others, that he was Domitian;† so do I hold that Claudius, the predecessor of that Nero, was the person that withheld.

§. 12. Obj. 2. It farther is objected, That the Jews were long before revealed to be the great opposers of Christianity, and the scribes and pharisees had long sat in the temple of God; wherefore the revelation of the man of sin, being only to take place for some considerable time after the writing of this epistle, the Jewish nation cannot be reasonably deemed "the man of sin."

Ans. I shall answer this objection in the paraphrase, by showing that these are the descriptions of the man of sin, by which the Thessalonians and others might then know him; and that they were all spoken in the present tense, showing what he already did, and that he was yet more fully to be revealed, either by his actual apostasy from the Roman government, which happened in the twelfth of Nero, or by the great apostasy of the believers of that nation from the faith.

Secondly, I add, That the Jewish nation not only had a great opinion of their dearness to the God of heaven, but were also looked upon by their proselytes, and others, as God's peculiar and beloved people; and therefore such a change of providence as made it appear to all men, they were become "the generation of his wrath," must also be a revelation of them as the greatest of sinners. And since this came upon them after they had rejected our Messiah, and crucified the Lord of life, it must be a discovery that they became "sons of perdition" upon this account; and in this sense the removing that which letted, must make way for the revelation of that "wicked one, whom the Lord would consume with the breath of his mouth." As then the Roman church, though she is thought by us to be the antichrist here spoken of, and the beast mentioned in the Revelation, is yet, by many other Christian churches in the west, thought to be the true catholic church of Christ, and her bishop to be the vicar of Christ, the successor of Peter, and the head of the universal church, and so will only be revealed to them to be what we now deem her, when she shall "go into destruction" and be destroyed "by the sword of Christ, and by the breath of his mouth;" so was the church of Jerusalem then only fully revealed to Jew and gentile, and to the Judaizing Christians, to be not what they did erroneously think her, but what the apostle here doth represent her, when our Lord did thus "consume her by the breath of his mouth," and God so signally demonstrated she was a "vessel of his wrath fitted for destruction." See the parallel betwixt the Jewish and the papal antichrist, &c. as at large set forth after the annotations on 2 Thessalonians.

§. 13. This epistle seems to have been written soon after the First, and, as Bishop Pearson probably conjectures, in the same year, Silvanus and Timotheus being still with him when he writ it, as they were at the writing of the First Epistle (2 Thess. i. 1). Now Paul staid at Corinth only "a year and six months" (Acts xviii. 11), and there he had preached a considerable time every sabbath-day before they came to him (Acts xviii. 45), and so before he writ his First

CHAPTER I.

1 Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, (write) unto the church of the Thessalonians (established) in (the kingdom and worship of) God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ:

2 (Wishing) [1]Grace unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet (for us to do), because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth;

4 So that we ourselves glory in you (or boast of you) in the churches of God for your patience and (for your) faith (which produceth this patience) in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye endure:

5 Which (dispensation of divine wisdom appointing you to suffer, 1 Thess. iii. 3, and permitting others thus to persecute you) is a manifest token of the [2]righteous judgment of God, (these sufferings befalling you) that ye may be counted worthy of the (celestial) kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer (and so are in assurance of a day when God will thus reward you):

6 [3]Seeing it is a righteous thing with (that) God (to whom belongeth recompense, Rom. xii. 19, and who will avenge his elect, that cry unto him day and night, Luke xviii. 7,) to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you;

7 And to you who are troubled (as we are) rest with us, (which rest we both completely shall enjoy) when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven (attended) with his mighty angels, (as he shall be at the last day, 1 Thess. iv. 16, when he will come to give every one according to his works, Matt. xvi. 27, Mark viii. 38, and gather all the nations of the world before him, Matt. xxv. 32, Jude 14, 15.

8 When he shall come, I say,) In flaming fire taking vengeance on them (among the heathens) that know not God, and (of those Jews and gentiles) that (having heard) obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:

9 Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, (from whose blissful presence they shall for ever be excluded, Matt. xxv. 41. 46,) and (shall find that destruction inflicted on them) [4]from the glory of his power; (that being the time when God will make known his power on the vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, Rom. i. 23.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 2. Grace and peace from God the Father, καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, and our Lord Jesus Christ.] Because he saith not by our Lord, but, "and our Lord Jesus Christ:" hence Theodoret pleads for an equality in power, and by consequence in essence of the Father and the Son.

[2] Ver. 5. Τῆς δικαίας κρίσεως, Of the righteous judgment of God, &c.] "This place," saith Esthius,* "proves against the heretics, that life eternal is not so to be ascribed to the grace of God, as not to be attributed also to the worth and merits of men, proceeding from the grace of God."

But the true import of these words will be sufficiently contained in these following particulars:

First, That the justice of God obligeth him to recompense the obedience and sufferings of his faithful servants, either in this or in the world to come; since, were it otherwise, we could have no sufficient motive to perseverance in obedience to him, or suffering for his sake; and therefore this by the apostle is laid as the foundation of all the service which we pay unto him, even the firm belief that "God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him," Heb. xi. 6.

Secondly, That since God doth not, and, according to the nature of the thing, he cannot, recompense them in this life, who suffer all calamities and losses they can endure here, and even death itself for his sake, his justice will oblige him to do it in the next. Hence the apostle saith to himself and all his fellow sufferers, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable," 1 Cor. xv. 19; and puts the question thus, "If the dead rise not at all—why stand we in jeopardy every hour?" ver. 29, 30. But,

Thirdly, That this reward should be for kind so excellent, as is the beatific vision, the being "heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ," the being "like to him in glory," and for duration should be eternal, can never be on the account of that strict justice which "rendereth to every one his due," seeing there can be no proportion betwixt a finite action or passion and an infinite reward; and therefore the same apostle who saith here, ἀξιωθῆναι ὑμᾶς, we for these sufferings "are accounted worthy of this kingdom," doth elsewhere positively declare "the sufferings of this present life, οὐκ ἀξία, not worthy of the glory which shall hereafter be revealed," Rom. viii. 18. Nor can the grace of God, vouchsafed to enable us thus to perseverance in sufferings, enhance the merit of those sufferings, or make the reward in justice due unto us; since, "if it be of grace" that we thus suffer, "then it is not of debt" that we are thus rewarded; God being not in strict justice obliged to reward his own free gifts and graces he confers upon us. But,

Fourthly, Even this eternal recompense being promised to those who suffer for the sake of Christ, by him who hath said, "Be thou faithful to the death, and I will give thee a crown of life," Rev. ii. 10, and propounded as the chief encouragement thus to endure with patience to the end, Matt. v. 12, it may be said, by virtue of that promise, to be in justice due to them who do thus suffer for it, it being a part of justice to perform our promises, and be faithful to our words. This therefore is a faithful saying, "If we suffer with him, if we endure, we shall live and reign with him," 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12, and we may rest assured, that "God the righteous judge will give this crown of righteousness to us at that day," 2 Tim. iv. 8, that, being approved, "we shall receive that crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love him," James i. 12. But then God being not obliged in strict justice to promise so great a recompense, he cannot be said to confer it, ex dignitate, merito, aut æqualitate rei, "by reason of the dignity or worth of these our sufferings," or because the reward is only equal to the merit of them, but only, ex justitiâ pacti, because his promise hath made it just and equal for him so to do.

[3] Ver. 6. Εἴπερ δίκαιον, Seeing it is a righteous thing.] Here the Greek scholiasts note εἴπερ is put for ἐπείπερ or ἐπειδήπερ, that is, siquidem for quandoquidem, as it is, Rom. viii. 9, and so the Hebrew כִּי oftentimes signifies (see Nold. de Partic. Heb. p. 88): and therefore, say they, it is not a particle ἀμφιβολίας ἀλλὰ βεβαιώσεως, "of doubting, but of confirmation."

[4] Ver. 9.] This phrase, καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς δόξης τῆς ἰσχύος αὐτοῦ, "and from the glory of his power," is taken from Isa. ii. 19. 21.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Ὑπὲρ τῆς παρουσίας τοῦ Κυρίου, By the coming of the Lord.] That ὑπὲρ, with a genitive case, signifies de, or circa, about, or concerning, cannot be doubted. It is rendered "concerning," Rom. ix. 27 (see 2 Cor. xii. 5. 8). It is thrice rendered of, in the same import as 2 Cor. i. 7, "Our hope, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, of you is certain;" viii. 23, "Whether any inquire, ὑπὲρ Τίτου, of Titus;" and, ver. 24, "Our boasting, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, concerning you;" Phil. i. 7, "It is meet for me to think thus, ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν, of you all." Hence Phavorinus saith it is used, ὁμοίως τῇ περί (see 2 Cor. vii. 5, ix. 3).

The coming of Christ is, by the reverend Dr. Hammond, referred to Christ's coming to destroy the unbelieving Jews, and throw down their temple, and their worship which depended on it. This is the παρουσία τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, "the coming" of Christ, or "of the Son of man," so often mentioned in our Lord's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the temple, Matt. xxiv. 3. 27. 37. 39. This is most certainly the import of the phrase in James twice, when he exhorts the brethren to "be patient, ἕως τῆς παρουσίας τοῦ Κυρίου, till the coming of the Lord;" adding, that this παρουσία τοῦ Κυρίου, "coming of our Lord was at hand, and the Judge stood before the door," James v. 7—9.

As for the phrase, "our gathering together to him," it seems parallel to the words of Christ, Matt. xxiv. 31, ἐπισυνάξουσι τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς αὐτοῦ, "His angels shall then gather his elect." And to apply it to the Thessalonians, let it be noted, that they were partly converts of the Jews and proselytes. For the converts made by Paul's preaching to them, were of the believing Jews and "the devout Greeks," Acts xvii. 4, who, in expectation of our Lord's prediction, as well as from their observation of the Jewish festivals, might be inclined to go up to Jerusalem. Moreover, till the writing of this epistle, if not long after, even till the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jewish converts kept up their synagogue worship; and many proselytes and other Christians did not scruple to assemble with them; the Jewish converts thought themselves obliged to do it, they being all "zealous of the law," Acts xxi. 20; and many of the gentile Christians complied with it at Corinth, Galatia, and Philippi; but after the destruction of Jerusalem there was an end of this synagogue worship, the day having revealed that God was no longer pleased with it, and then they met together still as churches of Christ, and this might be their ἐπισυναγωγὴ πρὸς αὐτὸν, "the gathering together to him," here spoken of.

But yet, considering that this παρουσία, or coming of Christ, in the former epistle, is used four times with relation to Christ's coming at the day of judgment, viz. ii. 19, iii. 13, iv. 15, v. 23, it may be thought more reasonable to refer this passage to the same advent, and paraphrase it thus; "I beseech you, brethren, by (the blessing you expect at) the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and at our gathering together to him."

[2] Ver. 2. Ἐνέστηκεν, Is, or hath been, instant.] To conceive that signal day of the destruction of their enemies the Jews, and the deliverance of the Christians, mentioned Joel ii. 31, 32, Mal. iv. 1, 2, come, and find themselves deceived in that conception, might cause great trouble to them, and even shake their steadfastness in the faith.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἀποστασία πρῶτον, A falling away first.] The rebellion of the Jews against the Chaldeans was always styled "apostasy," and the Jews, upon that account, "apostates." So Jerusalem is represented as πόλις ἀποστάτις, "a city that rebelled against kings;" and in which ἀποστάσεις γίνονται, "rebellions were found," Ezra iv. 12. 15. 19. Thus, Ezra iii. 2. 18. 22, they are styled Ἰουδαῖοι ἀποστάται, "rebellious Jews;" and, ver. 27, it is said, that they were given to rebellion and war (see Neh. ii. 19, vi. 6, 1 Macc. xiii. 16, 2 Macc. v. 11). And, in like manner, their revolt from the Roman government is by Josephus generally expressed by the same word:* "Coming from Rome," saith he, "in the time of Nero, when Felix was procurator of Judea, I found then the beginnings of innovations, καὶ πολλοὺς ἐπὶ τῇ Ῥωμαίων ἀποστάσει μέγα φρονοῦντας, and many much addicted to apostasy from the Roman government." "One Justus,"† saith he, "provoked the people, εἰς ἀποστασίαν, to rebellion; but John, the son of Levi, seeing some of them, διὰ τὴν ἀποστασίαν τὴν ἀπὸ Ῥωμαίων μέγα φρονοῦντας, prone to apostasy from the Roman government, endeavoured to keep them to their duty."

But if any like not this notion of apostasy, they may understand these words of the great apostasy of the Jews, foretold by Christ, Matt. xxiv. 11, 12, and which happened not only in Judea and Palestine, but throughout Asia, 2 Tim. i. 15, and in all other places where they had embraced the gospel. Of which apostasy, note,

First, That when the apostle wrote this epistle, it was yet to come; for though "the mystery of iniquity was already working," in the seductions of the false apostles and deceitful workers of the Jewish nation, endeavouring to corrupt the minds of the gentile converts "from the simplicity that was in Christ" (2 Cor. xi. 3), and to bring them into bondage to the Jewish law (Gal. ii. 4), and so deprive them of that "liberty wherewith Christ had made them free;" yet the greater defection of the Jewish converts to their old Judaism seems to have had its rise about ten years after the writing of this epistle. For it is certain, that A. D. 63, when the apostle wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews, it was begun already, and many of the Jewish converts then were in great danger of falling back unto perdition, as appears from the vehement admonitions and exhortations of the apostle to them, to "beware lest there should be in any of them an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God;" and to "exhort one another daily to this steadfastness," as knowing we are only "partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence firm to the end," iii.

12—14, to "labour to enter into that rest" Christ had prepared for them, "lest any man fall, after the same example of unbelief," iv. 11; "not to forsake the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some was," x. 25, nor to "cast away their confidence," ver. 35; to "lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees, and make straight paths for their feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way," and to "look diligently lest any man fall from the grace of God," xii. 12, 13. 15. And also from the representation of the dreadful state of all who should apostatize after this manner, that it was "impossible to renew them to repentance," vi. 46, that they were "nigh to cursing;" and "their end was to be burned," ver. 8; that there was "no more sacrifice for their sin, but a fearful looking-for of destruction, and fiery indignation," x. 26, 27, and "vengeance from the living God," ver. 30, 31; that it would certainly be a "falling back to perdition," ver. 38, 39; that there would be no escaping for them who "turned away from him who spake to them from heaven," xii. 25. The same we learn from the like exhortations of James, to joy and patience under their afflictions, i. 1—12, v. 7—12, of Peter, 1 Pet. iii. 14, 15, iv. 12—19, v. 8—10, and from John's frequent exhortation, to hold to that which they had received from the beginning, and to continue "walking in the truth." Now the occasions of this great apostasy seem to have been these three.

First, Their zeal for the observation of the law, which they conceived to be of eternal obligation, especially to the Jews, to whom particularly it was given; and for the covenant of circumcision, which they esteemed highly meritorious (see note on Rom. ii. 13), that which made them perfect, gave them life, and delivered them from hell, according to these sayings of theirs,* "He that is circumcised is perfect: he that is circumcised shall not go to Gehinnom: and I said unto thee, in thy blood, Live (Ezek. xvi. 6); this is the blood of the circumcision." This they endeavoured to impose upon the gentile converts: and all the myriads of Jewish converts were all "zealous" for the observation of it by the Jews, and looked upon it as downright apostasy for them to "forsake Moses," and "not to circumcise their children, and walk according to their customs" received from Moses, or from their traditions, ἀποστασίαν διδάσκεις ἀπὸ Μωσέως, Acts xxi. 21. And this seems to be the reason why Paul, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, discourseth so largely of the "necessity of the change of the law;" viz. that by establishing that truth he might put a stop to the apostasy occasioned by their contrary persuasion.

Secondly, Their beloved dream of a temporal kingdom to be erected by their Messiah at his coming, the halycon days that were then expected by them, and the dominion they should then have over the nations, who were not, according to their sentiments, to come in to the Messiah, otherwise than as their slaves or servants. How deeply this imagination was fixed even in the hearts of Christ's apostles, we learn, as from many other things, so especially from their question to him after his resurrection: "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom unto Israel?" Acts i. 7. And because our Lord gave this answer to it, viz. "It is not for you to know the times and seasons, which the Father hath put in his own hands; but ye shall receive power, the Holy Spirit coming upon you, and ye shall be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and all Judea, and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth," ver. 7, 8. They were prone to think, that, at least, after the apostles had done this, they might expect our Lord should come "in the clouds of heaven," to set up this kingdom; they therefore believed in him rather as a temporal than a spiritual king; they owned him rather as a true prophet, to persuade them to be righteous, than as a Saviour, to procure to them remission of sins, and a new covenant established in his blood. Hence Origen, speaking of those words of Christ, "If I say the truth, why do you not believe?" which, he conceives, were spoken to those Jews which believed; he saith, "They might be said to believe in one sense, and not to believe in another." So, v. g. "They that believe in Jesus Christ crucified in the days of Pontius Pilate, but believe him not to be born of the Virgin Mary (i. e. the Ebionites), believe in him, and do not believe in him."* And again, "They who believe in Jesus, who did in Judea the signs and wonders which were written of him,† but believe him not to be the Son of that God who made heaven and earth, believe in him, and believe not in him;" and this relateth to others of the Jews. And hence it seems to be, that the apostle is so large in treating of the sacerdotal office of our Lord, and of the new covenant established in his blood. Moreover, the Jews were generally possessed with this opinion, that "about that time their Messiah should set up this temporal kingdom;"‡ and they generally expected, not a Messiah to suffer for their sins, of whom they seem then to have had no notion, John xii. 34, but a great king to "subdue their enemies under them." And this was their great stumbling-block, that§ our Jesus appeared not to be such a one; and this was the great thing that animated them to the war. When therefore the gospel had been preached to the world, and there was no appearance of Christ's coming in the clouds to be their king, and their deliverer, but rather to destroy their temple and their nation, they began to fall off from him, as not answering their expectation, or the predictions of their prophets, and to give ear to their false prophets, saying to them, "Lo, here is Christ, and there is Christ," according to our Lord's prediction, Matt. xxiv. 22, and promising freedom and deliverance, saith Josephus,‖ to as many as should follow them.

And, Lastly, The great cause of this apostasy, of which the scriptures take a more special notice, was the grievous persecutions they suffered in all places from their fellow Jews, and from those heathens they had instigated against them. This, by Paul, is styled "a great fight of afflictions," against which he desires them to arm themselves by faith and patience, and the consideration of the coming of their Lord, and by the example of that "cloud of witnesses," which they had set before them (Heb. x. 11, 12). By Peter it is styled, the "fiery trial, which was come to try them," 1 Pet. iv. 12, and by which they were "in heaviness, through manifold tribulations," 1 Pet. i. 6; and against which James endeavours to strengthen them, by the consideration of the blessed fruits, and glorious recompense, their patience under them would produce, ch. i., and of the presence of their Lord, who would shortly come to rescue them, and give a happy issue of them, ch. v. By reason of which persecutions some began to use great compliances with the Jews, to avoid their rage; others, to fall away from the Christian faith, hoping perhaps that they might still obtain salvation in that religion in which they expected to find it before they embraced Christianity.

Others, who refer this to the church of Rome, understand by this apostasy, a falling away from the doctrine, and the true worship of God and Christ, by idolatry in the worship of a consecrated wafer, of angels, saints, images, and relics; on which account that church is represented under the cha-man empire, or from the faith), and (by that means) that [4] man of sin be revealed, (who is) the [5] son of perdition;

racters of "spiritual Egypt," of "mystical Babylon," and "the mother of fornication," Rev. xi. 8, xvii. 5.

[4] Ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἁμαρτίας, The man of sin.] If you read here, ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἀνομίας, "The man of disobedience," who will not submit to law and government, as do the manuscripts of Stephanus and Lincoln, nothing can more exactly agree to the Jewish nation, which, in the times of Josephus,* had this character, that it was ἔθνος ἀνσάρκτον καὶ ἀνυπεύθυνις φύσει πρὸς τοὺς βασιλέας, "a nation naturally averse from subjection to kings." If we retain the common reading, no nation under heaven more deserved to be styled "the man of sin," than did the Jewish nation, after the spirit of slumber and blindness was come upon them (Rom. xi. 8), for the rejection of the promised Messiah. Their own Josephus saith, "It is impossible to recount severally the particulars of their wickedness; but in the general it may be said, that never any city suffered such calamities, μήτε γενεὰν ἐξ αἰῶνος γεγονέναι κακίας γονιμωτέραν, nor was ever any generation, since the memory of man, more fruitful in iniquity." See this more fully proved, note on Rom. ii. 1. Then therefore more especially was this "man of sin" revealed to be so. This character doth also very well agree to the beast mentioned in the Revelation, which being spiritual Sodom and Egypt (Rev. xi. 8), the mother of fornications, and the abominations of the earth (xvii. 5), may very well deserve the title of "the man of sin."

Obj. If it be here objected against the application of this character to the Jewish nation, that "the man of sin" seems to relate to some single person, and therefore cannot be interpreted of a whole nation, especially if they act not under some head or other:

Ans. I answer, That I have for this the authority of the prophet cited here, ver. 8, who saith, "He shall smite the land (Chald. the sinners of the land) with the word of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips; ימות רשע, ἀνελεῖ ἀσεβῆ, he shall consume the wicked one;" which wicked one, whether we understand it with the fathers of antichrist, or with the Jews of Armillus, i. e. the Romans, or with the protestants of the papal polity, under the name of one, must comprehend all his associates and followers, though they be many nations. Thus also doth the prophet Isaiah introduce God speaking to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judah: "And now יושב, inhabiter of Jerusalem ואיש, καὶ ἄνθρωπος τοῦ Ἰούδα, and man of Judah," v. 3; and ver. 7, καὶ ἄνθρωπος, "The man of Judah is my pleasant plant." And Jeremiah speaks in the person of the whole Jewish nation, saying, "I am the man that have seen affliction," Lam. iii. 1, and so on to ver. 22. So in the parable, Matt. xxii. 11, our Saviour represents the Jewish nation, from whom the kingdom of God was to be taken away, and who were to be cast out into outer darkness, ver. 13, by the man who had not on his wedding-garment. So the "two witnesses," Rev. xi. 3, and the "woman clothed with the sun," Rev. xii. 1, represent the whole body of true Christians; and the beast, xiii. 1, "the woman arrayed in purple and scarlet," xvii. 4, and "the great whore," xix. 2, include all the members of the Roman church. And therefore it is evident, that this objection of a single person seems equally to lie against all the other hypotheses. And as they had their heads in which they were united, so had the Jewish nation their high-priest and sanhedrin, their rulers of the people, their scribes and pharisees, the heads of this man of sin, as the pope and his clergy are the head of the beast.

[5] Ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας, The son of perdition.] This also perfectly agrees to the Jews, not only because Christ was to "smite them with the breath of his mouth" (see note on ver. 8), and to "smite the land with a curse," Mal. iv. 6, but because they are set forth as "vessels of wrath fitted, εἰς ἀπώλειαν, for destruction," Rom. ix. 22, as men "appointed to wrath," 1 Thess. v. 9, to "sudden destruction," ver. 4, as men whose end is ἀπώλειαν, "destruction," Phil. iii. 19. Note also, that this agrees exactly to the great whore, who is to go, εἰς ἀπώλειαν, "into destruction," Rev. xvii. 8. 11.

[6] Ver. 4. Ὁ ἀντικείμενος, Who opposeth himself.] This word in the Old Testament represents the adversaries of God and his church. So Isa. lxvi. 6, "The voice of the Lord rendering recompense, τοῖς ἀντικειμένοις, to his enemies." And Esth. ix. 2, "They who sought the hurt of the Jews" are οἱ ἀντικείμενοι τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις. And in like manner in the New Testament, ὁ ἀντικείμενος, is in the general the adversary of Christ, and of Christianity; as in those words, "Give no occasion, τῷ ἀντικειμένῳ, to the adversary to blaspheme" (1 Tim. v. 14). In particular the Jews, as they were οἱ ἀντικείμενοι τῷ Χριστῷ, "the adversaries of Christ" (Luke xiii. 17); so, in our Lord's discourse on the destruction of Jerusalem, they are styled the adversaries of the apostles, in these words, "I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which οἱ ἀντικείμενοι ὑμῶν, your adversaries shall not be able to resist, or gainsay" (Luke xxi. 15). They are the ἀντικείμενοι πολλοί, of which Paul speaks, saying, "A great door and effectual is opened to me in Ephesus, and there be many adversaries" (1 Cor. xvi. 9); as you may learn from Acts xix. 9, where we find them speaking evil of the way of Christianity before the multitude, and Paul separating from them upon that account; and in those words of Paul to the Philippians, i. 58, "In nothing be ye terrified by (the malice and persecution of) your adversaries, ὑπὸ τῶν ἀντικειμένων, which malice and persecution is to them ἔνδειξις ἀπωλείας, an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation" (see 2 Thess. i. 5). And with good reason is this name given to them especially, they being the men "who killed the Lord Jesus, and persecuted his apostles; who pleased not God, and were adversaries to all men; forbidding the apostles to preach to the gentiles, that they might be saved" (2 Thess. ii. 15, 16). When they began to preach the word of life, the high-priest, "the captain of the temple, and the sadducees" (Acts iv. 1), and the whole order of the priesthood (ver. 6), styled, τὸ συνέδριον, "the sanhedrin" (ver. 15), command them "not to speak at all in the name of Jesus" (ver. 18), on which account these rulers are said to be "assembled against the Lord, and against his Christ" (ver. 26). And the answer of the apostles to them is, That God was rather to be obeyed than man. After this, the high-priest and all his associates place the apostles, ἐν τῷ συνεδρίῳ, "in the sanhedrin" (Acts v. 17. 27), calling them to an account for disobeying their commands; and having received this answer from the apostles, that "God must be obeyed rather than man," they beat them in the sanhedrin, and again command them "not to speak in the name of Jesus" (ver. 40, 41). Soon after we find Stephen brought before the scribes and elders, εἰς τὸ συνέδριον, "into the sanhedrin" (vi. 12), and the high-priest (vii. 1), and they who sat ἐν τῷ συνεδρίῳ, "in the sanhedrin," having examined him, and the witnesses against him, "they stoned Stephen" (ver. 59), which death could only be inflicted on him by the sanhedrin. After this Saul receives "letters from the high-priest" (ix. 1), and "from all the elders" (xxii. 5), to bind all Christians he could find in any of their synagogues, and bring them to Jerusalem (Acts ix. 2. 14). Yea, in the second, or as Bishop Pearson saith, in the fourth year of Nero, the high-priest, καὶ ὅλον τὸ συνέδριον, and the whole sanhedrin meet (Acts xxii. 30), and Paul is brought before them (xxiii. 1). By all which passages, as we see how they are still showing themselves adversaries to Christ, and his disciples; so we learn the falsehood of that Jewish story, that forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jewish sanhedrin removed from thence to Joppa; which, saith Mr. Selden,* as I have never read any such thing in the ancients, so it may be confuted from the life of Josephus. It was this sanhedrin that admitted that public prayer against the Christians called ברכות המינים, "the cursing of the heretics." They therefore called Jesus accursed, 1 Cor.

xii. 2; and so, as Justin Martyr* saith, they dishonoured Christ as much as they could, καταρώμενοι ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς ὑμῶν τοὺς πιστεύοντας ἐπὶ τὸν Χριστόν, "cursing in their synagogues those that believe in him." Thus did they "crucify afresh the Son of God, and put him to an open shame;" yea, saith the same Justin,† ἄνδρας ἐκλεκτοὺς ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐκλεξάμενοι τότε ἐξεπέμψατε εἰς πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν, "they sent chosen men from Jerusalem throughout the whole earth, representing the Christian faith as an atheistical heresy." Now this could be done only by the sanhedrin. It was, lastly, by the high-priest and his sanhedrin assembled at Jerusalem, that‡ James the brother of our Lord, with some other Christians, was condemned to be stoned for blasphemy against the law. Yea, when the war was begun, affairs seem still to be ordered by the high-priest and sanhedrin: for it was after the flight of Cestius Gallus from Jerusalem, that Josephus§ was made governor of Galilee, and thence he writes,‖ τῷ συνεδρίῳ τῶν Ἱεροσολυμιτῶν, "to the sanhedrin of Jerusalem" for instruction. And Ananias¶ the high-priest acknowledges that they had engaged in the war against the Romans only for their liberty. So that things seem to have been managed to that time by the high-priest and sanhedrin, who appearing thus upon all occasions with the utmost rage against Christ and Christians, might well be deemed not only ἀντικείμενοι, "their adversaries," but antichrists. But then the Roman antichrist being also to "wear out the saints of the Most High," Dan. vii. 25, and "cast down some of the host of heaven," Dan. viii. 10, the beast being to slay the witnesses, Rev. xi. 7, to "make war with the saints, and overcome them," xiii. 7, and even to be "drunk with the blood of the saints, and of the martyrs of Jesus," xvii. 6, xviii. 24, she doubtless must emphatically deserve this title.

[7] Ὑπεραιρόμενος ἐπὶ πᾶν τὸ λεγόμενον Θεὸν, ἢ σέβασμα, Exalteth himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped.] The word λεγόμενος, "called," shows the apostle here speaks of magistrates, who are "called gods" in scripture, Ps. lxxxii. 6, and particularly of the Roman emperor, whose title was σεβαστὸς, "Augustus," and who are here signified by σέβασμα, as God is by the word Θεὸς. And how the Jews "exalted themselves against every thing that is called God," or the magistracy, we may observe, saith Dr. Lightfoot, in such passages as these, 2 Pet. ii. 10, "They despise government;" Jude 8, "They despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities:" and in their own stories to endless examples. How they stood affected to them, we may learn from the question they put to our Saviour, "Shall we pay tribute to Cæsar or not?" Matt. xxii. 17; for had he answered No, they then thought they should have ground to represent him as an enemy to Cæsar; if Yea, to represent him to the people as a betrayer of his country's liberty and freedom, τὴν ἐπιτίμησιν οὐδὲν ἄλλο ἢ ἀντικρὺς δουλείαν ἐπιφέρειν λέγοντες, "they looking on this tribute-money as a sign of slavery:" and from their Talmudical saying, "We have no king but God:" and from their imagination, that it was a wicked thing†† μετὰ τὸν Θεὸν φέρειν θνητοὺς δεσπότας, "to own any mortal governor under God" (see note on 1 Pet. ii. 16). And that the pope and his church have thus exalted themselves above kings and emperors, church history and their own canon law will not suffer us to doubt (see Downham de Antichristo, lib. iv. cap. 2, 3).

[8] Ὥστε αὐτὸν εἰς τὸν ναὸν Θεοῦ ὡς Θεὸν καθίσαι, So that he sitteth in the temple of God as God, showing himself that he is God.] Only the Jewish sanhedrin, their priests, high-priests, and doctors, or expounders of the law, sat in the temple of God, then properly so called, and there the high-priest and the sanhedrin took upon them the power of judging in capital causes. Thus they stoned Stephen; thus also they stoned James the brother of our Lord, and others with him; and Paul persecuted the Christians even to death by their authority (Acts xxii. 4, 5); and thus "they sat in the temple of God as gods." The scribes and pharisees also showed themselves "as God," by setting up their traditions above the commandments of God, pretending to dispense with them, and, by so doing, saith our Saviour, ἀκυροῦν, ἀφιέναι, ἀθετεῖν, "to lay aside, reject, and to make void, the commandments of God" (Matt. xv. 16, Mark vii. 8—10. 13), to establish their traditions. And, secondly, by preferring them to, and requiring greater reverence to be given to their traditions and their doctrines, than to the written word of God; saying that "the words of the scribes are more amiable than the words of the law, and more weighty; that a prophet was not to be believed without a sign or a miracle, but they were to be believed without them;" with other blasphemous sayings, cited by Dr. Lightfoot* on Matt. xv. 2, and by Dr. Pocock, who shows that they held their vows so sacred, that they were obliged to violate the laws of God to keep them, and that in such cases they could not observe God's precept without great sin. And thirdly, this they did by taking to themselves the titles of "guide" and "father," which, in our Saviour's interpretation, belonged only to God and Christ, Matt. xxiii. 8—10 (see the note there). And, fourthly, as being by their own confession ψεύσται, "fighters against God," by their opposition to the apostles commissionated by God (Acts v. 39, xxiii. 9). Here then let it be noted.

First, That these are the descriptions of "the man of sin," by which the Thessalonians might then know him, and they run all in the present tense, showing what he already did; and therefore it is no objection against my interpretation of these words, that the sanhedrin, the scribes and pharisees, had long sat in the temple of God, and done the things here attributed to "the man of sin."

Secondly, Let it be noted, that it is prophesied, Dan. xi. 35, 36, that "a king shall do according to his will, and shall exalt himself, and shall magnify himself above every god;" and that this, by Jerome and Theodoret upon the place, is interpreted concerning antichrist. And that the pope of Rome hath manifestly not only thus "exalted himself above all that is called god," by usurping a power over kings and emperors, as in the former note; but also shown himself in the church "as God," by claiming that infallibility which is the property of God, and by dispensing with his laws, and also by equalling himself to Christ, who is God (see Downham de Antichristo, lib. iv. cap. 5): and therefore, according to the sentiments of all those fathers, who by "the temple" do understand the church of God, he hath by these things shown himself "that he is God."

Ὡς Θεόν.] I doubt not, saith Dr. Mills, that these words are added to the text, they being wanting in Irenæus, lib. v. cap. 25, in Origen, contra Celsum, p. 89, 307, in Cyril Hieros. p. 161, in the Vulgar, and Cod. Alex.; which, if true, would be a great advantage to my hypothesis; but they being owned by all the Greek scholiasts, the Syriac and Arabic versions, by Cyril. Alex., Glaph. in Gen. p. 178, and by Theodoret, Hær. Fab. lib. v. cap. 23, I dare not depend upon his confidence.

[9] Ver. 5. Ταῦτα ἔλεγον ὑμῖν, I told you of these things.] These are the words which seem to me to settle my interpretation of this chapter: for of the Jews, and their opposing of themselves to the doctrine of Christianity, and the professors of it, he told them in the first epistle (ii. 15, 16); and when he was with them, the persecutions that both he and they suffered from them (Acts xvii. 15, 16) gave him a just occasion to speak both of their opposition to the gospel, and of the deliverance they shortly might expect from such enraged persecutors; this being hinted for the encouragement of Christians, in most of his epistles: but that he should tell them any thing of Mahomet or of the papal antichrist, who were not then in being, or to be known then to the Thessalonians by any of the characters here mentioned, is not so easy to conceive. Though since the characters here referred to are partly to be found, Dan. xi. 35, 36, and that place by the ancients* is thought to relate to antichrist, and to be here referred to by St. Paul, this is by some expositors thought to refer to something the apostle might have taught them from the prophet Daniel, touching antichrist (see the Preface, §. 1—3).

[10] Ver. 6. Καὶ νῦν τὸ κατέχον οἴδατε, And now ye know what withholdeth.] Or rather, "And ye know what now withholdeth;" and according to this sense of the words, that which hindered the full revelation of this man of sin, must be in being, and actually withholding, when this epistle was indited. Some of the fathers† have conjectured, that the τὸ κατέχον, or that which hindered, was "the gifts of the Holy Spirit" then given to believers, and exercised in the assemblies of Christians; but they more generally do refer this to the Roman empire,‡ saying, that the apostle here teacheth, that "till that be taken away, antichrist shall not come." "This," say they, "the apostle here expresseth so covertly and obscurely,§ that he might not incense the Roman emperors against the Christians;" as he must have done, had he openly and boldly said, "Antichrist shall not come until the Roman empire be destroyed" (see note on 1 Pet. v. 13). What I conceive to be the τὸ κατέχον, see note on the verse following.

[11] Ἐν τῷ ἑαυτοῦ καιρῷ, In his season.] i. e. In the time prefixed for the false Christs and antichrists to come, Matt. xxiv. 5. 24, in "the last hour" of the Jewish church and economy, according to these words of St. John (1 John ii. 18), "Little children, it is the last hour, and as ye have heard (from Christ) that antichrist shall come, so now are there many antichrists, by which ye may know that this is the last hour."

They, who refer this to the papal antichrist, say that this season relates to the tempus statutum, "the time prefixed" (Dan. xi. 35); for antichrist, saith he, shall prosper "till the indignation be accomplished," or till God's indignation against the Jewish nation ceaseth: and to the "time, times, and half a time," mentioned Dan. vii. 25; during which time "the little horn" was to "wear out the saints of the Most High;" and to the twelve hundred and sixty days in which the beast should triumph, and "the witnesses should be clothed in sackcloth," Rev. xi. 3, or to the "time, times, and half a time," mentioned Rev. xii. 6. 14.

[12] Ver. 7. Τὸ γὰρ μυστήριον ἤδη ἐνεργεῖται ἀνομίας, For the mystery of iniquity doth already work.] That is, the Jews have already imbibed their pernicious principles, that it is not lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar, or to be subject to any other government under God: they have already made some seditious attempts, not only in Babylon, but in Judea, under Theudas Gaulonites;* and also have been incited farther to do so by one Dortus, and his associates, who persuaded the multitude, ἐπὶ τῇ Ῥωμαίων ἀποστάσει, "to revolt from the Romans." Josephus also doth inform us,† that before that time there were many tumults in Judea, καὶ σπυνοὺς βασιλείαν ὁ καιρὸς ἀνέπειθε, and that "the time prevailed with many to usurp the kingdom." This mystery was also working by the false apostles and deceitful workers of the Jews, causing some of the gentile Christians to warp from the simplicity of the faith to the Jewish rites, to mix Judaism with Christianity, and so to "turn from him that called them to another gospel." The fathers, Theodoret only excepted, say this mystery of iniquity was already working, "in Nero, the forerunner of antichrist,"‡ and the calamities he brought upon the Christians; on which account some of them taught that he was antichrist; and others, that he was to be raised again to be so: but this is an extravagancy sufficiently confuted from this one observation, that these words were written in the reign of Claudius, whereas the persecution of the Christians happened only twelve years after, in the reign of Nero. Others, who say this mystery was working in the false prophets then in being, till they can show us any false prophets then in being, which were not of the Jewish nation, do not contradict, but establish our assertion. And, lastly, others, though they do zealously contend against Dr. Hammond, that Simon Magus could not be the "man of sin" here mentioned, yet say, it is probable he was the "mystery of iniquity" then working, and the forerunner of antichrist, because he did "set up himself as the supreme God, brought in the invocation of angels, and the worship of images, and taught idolatry to be a thing indifferent, and was the father," as the beast is styled the mother "of abominations:" but thus they seem to me to build up again what they had so industriously pulled down: for it is highly reasonable to conceive "the mystery of iniquity" then working, should be that very mystery which after was to be completed by a more full appearance of the "man of sin," as will appear from the connexion of the words, "Remember ye not, that when I was with you, I told you these things?" (who was the man of sin to be revealed, and what were his characters, ver. 3, 4, and what it was that hindered at present the revealing of him) "for the mystery of iniquity is already working" (i. e. he is doing that covertly, which when he is revealed he will do more openly); "only he that hinders (his full appearance) will do so, till he be taken away; and then shall this wicked one be revealed." Who sees not now, that all those interpretations must be false, which make the "mystery of iniquity" to be one person, or one kind of persons; and the "man of sin," or antichrist, another; as they must do, who make the "mystery of iniquity" to be Simon Magus, or the false prophets or heretics in being when this epistle was indited; and the "man of sin," the pope of Rome and his clergy? This "mystery of iniquity," saith Dr. Lightfoot, cannot be understood but of the Jewish nation. And so it is explained, again and again, by John, saying, "This is the last hour; and as you have heard that antichrist cometh, so now are there many antichrists, by which we know this is the last hour," 1 John ii. 18; and ch. iv.; "Every spirit that confesseth not Jesus Christ, who is come in the flesh, is not of God; and this is the spirit of antichrist; this is the deceiver, and the antichrist," ch. ii. 7. Here, therefore, is a plain account of the working of the "mystery of iniquity" in the false Christs and prophets of the Jewish nation, who also were the great incendiaries to, and agents in, the apostasy of that nation from the Roman government (see note on ver. 10).

[13] Ὁ κατέχων, He that letteth.] Quis nisi Romanus status? "Who but the Roman state?" saith Tertullian:* so many of the fathers, as hath been noted on the foregoing verse; and whereas it may be objected against this sense, that it seems plainly from the word ὁ κατέχων, that he must be a person, rather than a state; they who are of this opinion answer, he is here spoken of as one single person, though the government consisted of a succession of emperors, because one of them reigned only at a time, and the government was dissolved, by taking away the last governor. My conjecture is this, "He who now letteth," i. e. the emperor Claudius, "will let till he be taken away;" i. e. he will hinder the Jews from breaking out into an open rebellion in his time, they being so signally and particularly obliged by him, that they cannot for shame think of revolting from his government; for he had made two edicts in their favour, the one concerning the Alexandrian Jews, to this effect,† "That the just Jews should suffer nothing, because of the madness of Caius, who would be worshipped as a god, and that they should have liberty to observe their own laws and customs." And that other edict,‡ in which he gives them "liberty over his whole empire, without molestation, to observe their own laws and customs;" declaring that he did it, "because he judged them worthy of that favour for their affection and fidelity to the Roman government."

After his death, the affairs of the Jews, saith Josephus, became worse and worse, not only by reason§ γοήτων ἀνδρῶπων οἱ τὸν ὄχλον ἠπάτων, "of those magicians who deceived the people," and of those thieves who stirred them up to the war against the Romans,‖ μηδὲν ὑπακοῦειν αὐτοῖς λέγοντες, "persuading them not to be subject to them;" but because Nero, in his third year, sends a letter to Portius Festus, governor of Judea, by which the Jews are deprived of their ἰσοπολιτεία, "equal share of government" in Cæsarea; whence, saith Josephus, was the rise of all our calamities, the Jews persisting still in sedition, μέχρι δὴ τὸν πόλεμον ἐξῆψαν, "till they broke out into the war." In the seventh of Nero, Albinus succeeds Festus, then dead, who, saith Josephus, was ὁ μάλιστα λυμαινόμενος τὴν χώραν,¶ "one who exceedingly wasted the country," and laid the seeds of their future captivity. In the tenth of Nero, Gessius Florus succeeds him, who πολλῶν ἀνέπλησε κακῶν Ἰουδαίους, "brought many calamities upon the Jews," saith Josephus; which having tragically represented, he concludes thus, "What shall I say more? τὸν γὰρ πρὸς Ῥωμαίους πόλεμον ὁ καταναγκάσας ἡμᾶς ἄρασθαι Φλῶρος, for it was this Florus who compelled us to the war against the Romans, which began in the twelfth of Nero."

[14] Ἕως ἐκ μέσου γένηται, Till he be taken away.] i. e. Say some, till the Roman government be taken away; as it was by the exile of Augustulus, A. D. 476; say I, till Claudius be taken away, as he was by poison, saith Suetonius; for, as tolli de medio, among the Latins, so in the Greek, ἐκ μέσου γενέσθαι, imports, one to be taken away by death, and oftimes by a violent death; so ἐξαναλῶσαι ἐκ μέσου τῆς παρεμβολῆς is "to destroy them out of the middle of the camp," till they were consumed: so of Korah and his company it is said, ἀπώλοντο ἐκ μέσου τῆς συναγωγῆς, "They were destroyed from the midst of the congregation," Numb. xvi. 33. Thus of the righteous, saith the prophet, ἦρται ἐκ μέσου, "He is taken away," he rests in his grave, Isa. lvii. 2; so Jeremiah, ἐξῆρε ἐκ μέσου, "The Lord hath taken away all my mighty men from the midst of me," Lam. i. 15. And so God saith of the false prophet, Ezek. xiv. 8, 9, ἐξαρῶ αὐτὸν, ἀφανιῶ αὐτὸν ἐκ μέσου τοῦ λαοῦ μου, "I will cast him off from the midst of my people."

[15] Ver. 8. Ὁ ἄνομος, The wicked;] Who will not be subject to the laws to which their forefathers, from the time of Pompey, have submitted.

[16] Ἀποκαλυφθήσεται, Shall be revealed;] Either by his actual apostasy from the Roman government, or by the great apostasy of the unbelievers of that nation; of which, see note on ver. 3.

[17] Ὃν ὁ Κύριος ἀναλώσει τῷ πνεύματι τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ, Whom the Lord shall consume by the spirit of his mouth.] That the apostle here refers to Isaiah x. 4, appears by his using the very words of that prophet, which run thus: "He shall smite the land with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked one." Now what is the land there is well expounded by Malachi in these words (iv. 6), "Lest he smite the earth with a curse." Where both the Hebrew and the Greek use the same words. Now in Malachi it is evident, and confessed, that by "the earth," the land of Judea must be meant, as it is usually in the book of Psalms, Ps. xvi. 3, xxv. 13, xxxvii. 3. 9. 11. 22. 29. 34; seeing to them alone the prophet was then sent to prophesy: it is therefore reasonable to conceive, that the same phrase should have the same import in the prophet Isaiah; to smite this land "with the breath (or spirit), of his mouth," is, to "smite in his wrath and indignation." So, Job iv. 9, "By the blast of God, by the breath of his nostrils, (ἀπὸ πνεύματος ὀργῆς αὐτοῦ, or, of his anger,) are they consumed;" and to "consume with his fiery indignation." Thus "Tophet is ordained of old, the pile thereof is fire and much wood; the breath of the Lord, (Θυμὸς Κυρίου, the indignation of the Lord,) like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it." So Ps. xviii. 8, "A smoke ascended in his anger, and fire out of his mouth devoured." And, ver. 15, "At thy rebuke, O Lord, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils," ἀπὸ ἐμπνεύσεως πνεύματος ὀργῆς σου, "by the breath of the wind of thine anger." This therefore again answers to the words of Malachi, iv. 1, "Behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, and all that do wickedly, shall be as stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up;" and to that of the Baptist, Matt. iii. 10, "And now the axe is laid to the root of the trees; every tree therefore that bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire:" which also evidently belongs to the Jewish nation, which said, "We have Abraham for our father," ver. 9, and to whom alone the Baptist is there speaking; and again, ver. 12, he saith of Christ, "His fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly cleanse his floor—and burn the chaff with unquenchable fire:" plainly alluding to the words of Malachi, that "all the wicked shall be as chaff, or stubble." This being so, "the earth" to be "smitten with the rod of his mouth," must be "the people," or "inhabitants of the land;" or, as the Chaldee, "the sinners of the earth," the unbelievers and wicked of Judea, to be consumed by that indignation and fire of the Lord, Mal. iv. 1. So saith Procopius on the place, "Doth the Lord threaten to Judea, ἐπὶ τῇ κατ' αὐτοῦ παροινίᾳ, for her contumely against him? saying, Thy house is left unto thee desolate; and ἐγκαταλειφθεῖσα πολέμῳ καὶ πυρὶ δαπανᾶται, being left desolate, is consumed by sword and fire."

That these words may have a more full completion in the destruction of "the beast," or "mystical Babylon," which is also to be "slain by the sword" proceeding from the mouth of Christ, and destroyed by "the fierceness of his wrath," and, with "the false prophets," to be "cast alive into the lake of fire and brimstone," I deny not: but that this should be the primary intent of the words of Isaiah, and that he should be there prophesying of the destruction of the church of Rome, seems to me a rabbinical gloss, not much to be insisted on, especially since the apostle, Rom. xv. 12, applies the tenth verse of this chapter to the first calling of the gentiles.

[18] Καὶ καταργήσει τῇ ἐπιφανείᾳ τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ, And shall consume with the brightness of his coming.] The day of the Lord's coming to destroy Jerusalem, is styled by Joel, ii. 31, ἡμέρα Κυρίου ἡ μεγάλη καὶ ἐπίφανὴς, "the great and bright day of the Lord:" and, Mal. iv. 5, "Behold, I send you Elias the prophet" (i. e. the Baptist, in the spirit and power of Elias, Luke i. 17), πρὶν ἐλθεῖν τὴν ἡμέραν τοῦ Κυρίου τὴν μεγάλην καὶ ἐπιφανῆ, "before the coming of the great and bright day of the Lord." And that our Lord's coming in his day, after he had suffered, and been rejected of that age, or generation, in which he suffered, should be "as lightning shining from one end of the heaven to the other," he expressly tells his disciples, Luke xvii. 24. And when this ἐπιφάνεια καὶ παρουσία, "brightness and appearance of the Son of man" was to happen, he sufficiently instructs them in these words, "As the lightning, φαίνεται, shineth from the east to the west, οὕτως ἔσται καὶ ἡ παρουσία τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, so shall the coming of the Son of man be, ὅπου γὰρ, for wheresoever the carcase is, there shall the eagles be gathered together," Luke xvii. 24. 37; which sensibly applies this matter to the destruction of the Jews by the Roman army, whose ensign was the eagle. This therefore is a farther confirmation of our exposition.

Lastly, Observe the connexion of these verses; there is a τὸ κατέχον νῦν, something, or person, "that withholdeth now;" and, ὁ κατέχων ἄρτι, "he that now withholdeth, will do so, until he be taken away, καὶ τότε, and then shall the wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord shall destroy." Now would not any one here think, that if the Roman government were that which withheld, antichrist should presently be revealed, and appear to the world to be so (as all the fathers,* who were of that opinion, held), soon after the dissolution of that government, according to those words of Jerome,† Qui tenebat de medio fit, et non intelligimus antichristum appropinquare; quem Dominus Jesus Christus interficiet spiritû oris sui? "He that withheld is taken away; and do we not understand that antichrist is at hand?" And again, would not any one hence be prone to think, that the Lord should be as quick to consume him, when he was revealed, as all the fathers‡ thought, allowing but "three years and a half" for the whole reign of antichrist, and declaring, that they had this not from apocryphal writings,§ but from the holy scriptures? and were it otherwise, those Christians which saw the dissolution of the Roman empire, A. D. 476, might lie under the same doubts as did the Thessalonians here, touching "the man of sin;" for then they saw no Roman antichrist appearing, nor that "mystery of iniquity" yet working; for the pope and clergy of Rome were then orthodox, free from "exalting themselves above all that is called God," or from "wearing out the saints" with persecution, till some hundred years after. And if, after his appearing thus, he were to continue twelve hundred and sixty years before our Saviour's coming to destroy him, as he must do, according to that hypothesis; might not the Christians be tempted, in that long interval, to say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" This therefore seems to lie as a strong bar against that, as the primary sense and meaning of these words.

[19] Ver. 9. Ἐν πάσῃ δυνάμει καὶ σημείοις, With all power and signs.] This our Lord foretold, that before his advent to destroy Jerusalem, there should appear "false prophets, and false Christs, who should deceive many," Matt. xxiv. 11, who should "show signs and wonders, to deceive, if it were possible, the very elect," ver. 24. Now that these "false prophets," ver. 11. 24, were the same, we learn from Luke, who sums both up in one, xxi. 8, and, from the work of both, which was to "deceive many." That they were all to appear in the same age in which his disciples, to whom he spake these words, lived, is also evident from Christ's caution to them, in respect of both; "See to it, lest any man deceive you," Matt. xxiv. 4; "See to it: behold, I have foretold you all things," Mark xiii. 23, Matt. xxiv. 26. It cannot then be doubted, but that there were such persons as are here mentioned, which then arose among the Jews. Such were the Jews of whom Paul speaks, comparing them to Jannes and Jambres, the celebrated magicians of Egypt, because of their resistance of the truth of the gospel, as those magicians resisted Moses, and whom he styles, πονηροὶ ἄνθρωποι καὶ γόητες, "wicked men and jugglers," 2 Tim. iii. 8. 13, or those who did strange things by the invocation of devils, as the word imports, say Phavorinus and Suidas. The magicians were men of the same art and tricks. Now to these Josephus doth ascribe the beginning of the apostasy from the Roman government, and by them, he informs us, that it was carried on to the last: the affairs of the Jews, saith he, became worse daily, by reason* γοήτων ἀνθρώπων οἱ τὸν ὄχλον ἠπάτων, "of those impostors who deceived the people," of which he immediately gives an instance in the Egyptian, who set up for a prophet. He adds, that in the beginning of the reign of Nero,† "impostors and deceivers, under a pretence of divine impulse, endeavouring innovations and changes, made the people mad, and led them into the wilderness, promising there to them signs of liberty from God:" and that‡ γόητες πολλοὺς εἰς ἀπόστασιν ἐνῆγον, "the impostors prevailed with many to revolt." And even when their temple was in flames, he saith, there were many prophets§ who encouraged them to expect τὴν ἀπὸ Θεοῦ βοήθειαν, "help from God," and that they gave credit to them. Accordingly of the dragon it is said, that "the unclean spirits which went out of his mouth, were the spirits of devils, working miracles," Rev. xvi. 13, 14; that "the false prophet wrought signs before the beast," Rev. xix. 20; and that the beast "wrought great signs, so as to make fire descend from heaven," Rev. xiii. 13; and that by these things they did πλανᾶν, "deceive the inhabitants of the earth," Rev. xiii. 13. 19, 20, xx. 10. Of which miracles done by the members of the Roman church, to establish their idolatry and superstition, see Downham de Antichristo, lib. vi. cap. 1.

[20] Ver. 10. Τὴν ἀγάπην τῆς ἀληθείας οὐκ ἐδέξαντο, They received not the love of the truth.] From these words some conceive that antichrist, or "the man of sin," must in profession be a Christian; because he is said "not to receive the love of the truth" only. But all the fathers,‖ and many others say, "not to receive the love of the truth," is, "not to receive the truth which is worthy to be loved," and which would have taught them charity to those they persecuted, it being the same with "not believing the truth," ver. 12. And this emphatically belonged to those unbelieving Jews to whom Paul speaks thus, "It was necessary that the word of God should be first spoken to you: but since you thrust it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, lo, we turn to the gentiles" (Acts xiii. 46): and to whom he

11 And for this cause [21] God shall send (among) them strong delusion, (which will have this effect upon them) that they should (shall) believe a lie:

12 That they all might be damned (Gr. judged and condemned) who believed not the truth, (the gospel preached to them, see note on Rom. ii. 8,) but had pleasure in unrighteousness (or, falsehood, see note on 1 Cor. xiii. 6).

13 But we are bound to give thanks alway to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning (of our preaching to you, shown, 1 Thess. i. 4, 5, that he had) chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit (which gives the earnest of it, and makes us meet for it,) and belief of the truth (which promiseth it):

applieth that of the prophet, "Behold, ye despisers, and perish; for I will work a work in your days, which ye will in no wise believe," ver. 41 (see Acts xxviii. 27, Heb. iv. 2. 12, 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8), and all the fathers which speak of antichrist, and "the man of sin," not one of them excepted, declare, that this and the two following verses belong to the unbelieving Jews,* that "he is thus to come with signs and wonders to deceive them;" and that "they who would not receive Christ, confirming his doctrine with true miracles, shall be deceived by the lying miracles of antichrist." And if this be so, that these things are intended of the unbelieving Jews, they can agree in the primary import of them to them only.

[21] Ver. 11. Πέμψει ὁ Θεὸς, God shall send.] As he sent a lying spirit into the mouths of Ahab's prophets (1 Kings xvii. 21, 22), by permitting the evil spirit to go forth for that end; or as he is said to deceive his people (Jer. iv. 10), because he suffered them to be deceived by false prophets (Jer. vi. 14). And as he deceived the false prophets, by giving them up unto a spirit of delusion (Ezek. xiv. 9), this must be the true interpretation of all such passages as these; for,

First, God cannot secretly inspire into us any evil, or infuse any evil principle into our hearts; for evil can never proceed immediately from him who hath an absolute and entire freedom from it; were it his offspring, it must cease to bear that name, his works being all very good, and "wrought in righteousness." Nor,

Secondly, Can he incline, excite, encourage, or entice to sin: for then he must excite men to perform "the abominable thing which his soul hates," to do that which is infinitely displeasing to him, and must incline them secretly to that which he openly deters all persons from; and that he cannot truly be offended with such persons, he cannot punish them for their iniquities: or else he must be angry with them because they do obey his motions, and sentence them to endless misery because they do comply with his own inclinations. Nor,

Thirdly, Can he necessitate any man to sin: for then he must by force compel them to it, and then the action done by virtue of that force cannot be theirs, but God's; nor would our consciences condemn us for sin, were we assured we could not help it.

[22] Ver. 14. Εἰς ὅ.] Here Beza notes, that many copies read εἰς ὃν, which agrees with πίστιν, ver. 13, and that many Latin copies accord with them. But it is common for this pronoun to vary in gender from the noun to which it relates; so σκεῦη ἐλέους οὗς, Rom. ix. 23, 24, τεκνία μου οὓς, Gal. iv. 19 (see Phil. ii. 15, Col. ii. 19, Philem. 10, 2 John 1).

[23] Εἰς περιποίησιν δόξης, To the glorious life or salvation.] That περιποιεῖν is to save alive, see note on Eph. i. 14, and περιποίησις is חיה "life," 2 Chron. xiv. 13, "They fell down, ὥστε μὴ εἶναι ἐν αὐτοῖς περιποίησιν, so that there was no life in them;" Mal. iii. 17, "The day which I make εἰς περιποίησιν," LXX.

[24] Ver. 15. Κρατεῖτε τὰς παραδόσεις, Hold the traditions which ye have been taught.] This passage proves not in the least, that, in the judgment of Paul, there were any traditions wholly extrascriptural; that is, such as were neither then committed, nor after to be committed to writing, by himself or any other inspired person; but only, that he himself had not writ all things to them by epistle, being absent, but had preached many things to them being present.

Now that the word which Paul preached orally was after written by Luke, his amanuensis and companion, we learn from the tradition of the church of Christ, recorded by Irenæus* and Eusebius.

Secondly, All that the apostle here exhorts the Thessalonians to do, is to retain the traditions they had immediately received from the mouth of an apostle, and which he personally had delivered to them; which traditions, when we know them to be such, there is no doubt but they ought with all reverence to be received: when therefore the church of Rome hath proved that the traditions she obtrudes upon us were immediately received from the mouth of an apostle, then, and not till then, will this text oblige us to receive them.

Thirdly, This text is so far from being an argument for receiving doctrinal traditions, nowhere writ in scripture, upon the sole authority of the church of Rome, or even of the church catholic, that it is rather a demonstration that she is no sure preserver of them, she having actually lost those very traditions touching the "man of sin," which are mentioned in this chapter, and particularly referred to in this text; "I told you these things when I was with you," ver. 8, and "Now ye know what letteth; wherefore stand fast, holding the traditions" touching his coming, which when I was with you I delivered by words, and now hint to you by epistle, and which, as it appeareth by this epistle and his exhortation, were of great moment to be known. Now, hath this tradition been preserved by the Roman, or by the catholic church? or must she not confess with Anselm,* and their own Esthius on the place, "Truly the Thessalonians knew what letted, but we know it not?" So that the tradition which the church received from the apostles, touching this matter, is wholly lost; how therefore can she be relied on as a sure preserver, and a true teacher of traditions, which hath confessedly lost one of great moment, deposited with the Thessalonians, and the primitive church?

CHAPTER III.

1 FINALLY (τὸ λοιπὸν, furthermore, I entreat you), brethren, (to) pray for us (apostles and ministers of the gospel), that the word of the Lord (preached by us) may have free course, (τρέχῃ, may run to) and be glorified (among other gentiles), even as it is (hath been) with (or among) you:

2 And (pray also) that we may be delivered [1] from unreasonable and wicked men, (such as the unbelieving Jews, the great opposers of our preaching to the gentiles, are, 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16:) [2] for all men have not faith.

3 But (though men may prove unfaithful) the Lord is (always) faithful (to his promises), who (therefore) shall (or, will do all things requisite on his part, to) stablish you, and keep you from evil.

4 And (therefore) we have confidence in the Lord touching you, that ye (through his assistance) both do (at present) and will (still) do the things which we (by his authority) command you.

5 And (that we may not be mistaken in this confidence, we pray that) the Lord (would) direct your hearts into the love of God, (which will constrain you to this obedience, 2 Cor. v. 14, and from which nothing shall separate you, Rom. viii. 35. 39,) and into the [3] patient waiting for (of) Christ (mentioned 1 Thess. i. 10, 2 Thess. i. 10, Phil. iii. 20).

6 Now we (being thus confident of your obedience) command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after [4] the tradition which he received of (i. e. from) us.

7 For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us: for [5] we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you;

8 Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travail (weariness and toil) night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you:

9 Not because we have not power (to live of the gospel, for the labourer is worthy of his hire, Luke x. 7, and so hath the Lord appointed, that they that preach the gospel should live of the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 14), but to make ourselves an ensample unto you to follow us (in this our industry; for if we, who might lawfully live upon other men's labours, choose rather to work for our own living, how much more ought ye to do so?

10 And this we have formerly taught,) for even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any (being able) would not work, neither should he eat.

11 (And of this we have cause to remind you:) For [6] we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busybodies (meddling with that which belongs not to them).

12 Now them that are such we command and exhort by (the authority and in the name of) our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and (so) eat their own bread.

13 (Thus I hear it is with them:) But ye, brethren, [7] be not weary in well doing (let not their example make you neglect your industry).

14 And if any man (among you) obey not our word by this epistle (in which we exhort and command them thus to work), [8] note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed.

15 Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.

16 Now the [9] Lord of peace himself give you peace

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 2.] Note, It is well known, and hath been often observed, that the unbelieving Jews were in all places bitter enemies to the preachers of the gospel, and sent their emissaries into all places to incite the governors against them, and therefore, as here, so Rom. xv. 31, the apostle entreats Christians to contend with him in prayer, that he might be delivered from the unbelievers in Judea; whereas Simon Magus and his followers were a despicable crew at the writing of this epistle, and could have no power to persecute the apostles or preachers of the gospel on this account: and therefore Eusebius* informs us, that his heresy prevailed little in the apostles' days, and that his power was presently extinguished with his person.

[2] For all men have not faith.] Here, saith Theodoret, Θεοῦ γὰρ ἴδιον καλεῖν, ἡμῶν δὲ τὸ πείθεσθαι, "It is of God to call us, but of men to obey his call. Whence Christ saith (Luke ix. 23), If any man will come after me, οὐ γὰρ ἀνάγκῃ βιάζεται, ἀλλὰ γνώμην ζητεῖ, for he compels no man."

[3] Ver. 5. Or, εἰς ὑπομονὴν τοῦ Χριστοῦ, Into the patience of Christ.] i. e. Into an imitation of his patience, in suffering "the contradiction of sinners against himself," that ye may "run with patience the race which is set before you, looking unto Jesus," &c. (Heb. xii. 1, 2).

[4] Ver. 6. Κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν.] The tradition here mentioned is, say Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, the tradition which he delivered διὰ τῶν ἔργων, "by his works," in which he was an example to them of industry; and therefore he adds, at ver. 7,

[5] Ver. 7. Οὐκ ἠτακτήσαμεν, We behaved not ourselves disorderly.] That is, saith Theophylact, "We were not idle;" for God having ordered man to labour, and fitted him with members for that end, he that will not do so, ἐκλέλοιπε τὴν τάξιν, "deserts the order" in which God hath placed him; and so the apostle expounds himself, ver. 11.

[6] Ver. 11. Μηδὲν ἐργαζομένους, ἀλλὰ περιεργαζομένους.] Not working at all, but being busy-bodies, or, but being employed about vain things: so περιεργάζεσθαι, πράττειν τὰ περισσὰ, Hesych. Phavorinus. So Ecclus. iii. 23, ἐν τοῖς περισσοῖς τῶν ἔργων σου μὴ περιεργάζου, Inanem vanamque operam ne suspicias, "Be not employed in vain things."

[7] Ver. 13.] Note, The fathers interpret these words thus, Let not their sloth hinder your charity, in giving them what is necessary to preserve life: but this exposition suits not with ver. 10.

[8] Ver. 14. Σημειοῦσθε.] Most interpreters say, that the apostle, ver. 6, and here, requires the church-governors to use the censures of the church upon these disorderly walkers; but I have shown it to be highly probable, that when this epistle was writ, there were no such governors settled in this church (see note on 1 Thess. v. 12).

Secondly, These exhortations plainly are directed to all the brethren in general; if therefore they relate to excommunication, and such like censures, it will hence follow, that the power of the keys belongs to all the brethren in general.

Thirdly, The apostle exhorts them still to own them as Christian brethren, which they at present are not, who by excommunication are excluded from the church in the society of Christians.

[9] Ver. 16. Ὁ Κύριος, The Lord.] Both here, and ii. 16, the apostle prays to the Lord Jesus Christ for peace, which, in the Hebrew phrase, imports all happiness; and for establishment "in every good word and work," which is a strong argument for his divinity, especially considering that every good work derives from God.

[10] Ver. 17. Ὅ ἐστι σημεῖον ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ, Which is the token in every epistle.] Hence Grotius concludes, that this must be the first of his epistles; for, had he, saith he, writ any epistle before, this admonition had been needless. I should rather think that this supposes he had writ some epistle before, because he saith not this shall be, but this is the sign in every epistle. And this is evident, almost to a demonstration, from these words, ii. 2, "Be not troubled by epistle as from us, as if the day of the Lord were at hand" (see the note there); and from these words, ver. 15, "Hold the traditions you have (formerly) received, whether by word, or our epistle." To which words Grotius hath nothing to answer. Add to this the note of the learned Mr. Dodwell,* cited in the margin.

Dissert. Cypr. ii. in Epist. 4.

A DISCOURSE

BY WAY OF APPENDIX TO THE FIRST CHAPTER; SHOWING,

That the endless miseries or torments of the wicked are well consistent both with the justice and the goodness of God.

The apostle in this chapter seems plainly to assert, That wicked persons "shall be punished with everlasting destruction," and also to resolve this punishment into the δικαιοκρισία, or just judgment of God.

Whereas it is pretended that "it is contrary to the justice of God, to punish temporary crimes with eternal punishments, because justice always observes a proportion between offences and punishments; but between temporary sins and eternal punishments there is no proportion. And if it be hard to reconcile this with divine justice, it will be much more so, to show how it comports with that great goodness we suppose to be in God;"

They who assert the eternity of future torments inflicted on the wicked, abiding in a state of misery, attempt by several ways to answer this objection. I shall begin with those answers which to me seem not satisfactory, and briefly show the reasons why I think they are not so; and then return that answer which I think fully clears the justice and the goodness of God in this dispensation, from the strength of this objection. And,

§. 1. First, Some make out the proportion thus, That "because sin is infinite in respect of the object against which it is committed, therefore it deserves an infinite punishment: now because a finite creature cannot suffer a punishment, which is infinite as to intension; therefore he suffers that which is infinite as to pretension or duration."

But to this it is replied, That if all sins be for this reason infinite as to demerit, then the demerit of all sins must necessarily be equal, and so there must be equal reason for the pardon of all sins; for the demerit of no sin can be more than infinite. Secondly, Hence it will follow, that God cannot "render unto every man according as his works shall be;" because, though they commit innumerable sins, he can only lay upon them the punishment due to one only; because he cannot lay upon them a punishment which is more than infinite.

§. 2. Secondly, Others say, That "if wicked men lived for ever in this world, they would sin for ever, and therefore they deserve to be punished for ever." But,

1. Who can be certain of this, since, whilst we live in this world, we are in a state of trial, and so may be in a possibility of repenting and growing better?

2. God hath expressly declared, that men should be judged hereafter, not according to what they would have done, had they lived longer, but according to what they actually have done in this present life, according to their "works done in the body;" and so he hath sufficiently declared, he doth not punish them for what they would have done, had they lived longer; but for what they actually had done whilst they lived. So that this answer recoils thus; Wicked men, by God's declaration, are only to be punished for what they did whilst they lived here; now they did not live here for ever in a state of sin: therefore they are not to live forever hereafter in a state of punishment.

§. 3. Thirdly, Others say, That "God having set before the sinner life and death; and having so expressly forewarned him this would be the certain consequence of his iniquity, he cannot charge God with injustice, in allotting to him the portion which he chose, and would incur, after all admonitions to the contrary."

But though this may be sufficient to stop the sinner's mouth, it will do little to stop the mouth of infidels; because it seemeth not to answer the objection arising from the disproportion between the fault and the punishment: for it renders not the fault less finite, or the punishment less infinite; and so it doth not render it less inconsistent with divine equity and goodness to threaten so to punish finite crimes, and execute that punishment upon the sinner.

§. 4. A very great and learned person hath attempted a solution to this objection from these considerations:

First, That "the measure of penalties is not to be taken from any strict proportion betwixt crimes and punishments, but from one great end and design of government, which is, to secure the observation of wholesome and necessary laws; and consequently whatever penalties are proper and necessary to this end are not unjust.

Secondly, "That whosoever considers how ineffectual the threatening, even of eternal torments, is to the greatest part of sinners, will soon be satisfied that a less penalty than that of eternal suffering would, to the far greatest part of mankind, have been, in all probability, of little or no force; and that if any thing more terrible could have been threatened to the workers of iniquity, it had not been unreasonable; because it would all have been little enough to deter men effectually from sin." But then he adds, Thirdly, "That after all, he that threateneth hath still the power of execution in his own hands: for there is this remarkable difference betwixt promises and threatenings, that he who promiseth passeth over a right to another, and thereby stands obliged to him, in justice and faithfulness, to make good his promise: but in threatenings it is quite otherwise; he that threatens keeps the right of punishing in his own hand, and is not obliged to execute what he hath threatened, any farther than the reasons and ends of government do require; and that he may, without any injury to the party threatened, remit and abate as much as he pleaseth of the punishment that he hath threatened; and because in so doing he is not worse, but better than his word, nobody can find fault or complain of any wrong or injustice thereby done him.

"Nor is this any impeachment of God's truth and faithfulness, any more than it is esteemed among men a piece of falsehood, not to do what they have threatened."

But here, with submission to better judgments, I conceive are many things propounded which are not exactly true, or reach not the objection; since that relates not to God's threats of punishment, but to his execution of the threatened punishment.

And, First, When it is said, that "what proportion ought to be appointed betwixt crimes and penalties, is not so properly a consideration of justice as of prudence in the lawgiver;" and thence inferred, that "whatever the disproportion may be between temporary sins and eternal punishments, justice cannot be said to be concerned in it."

It is owned, that by the sanctions annexed to his laws, the lawgiver designs the preservation of his laws from being violated; which is an effect of prudence, but still of prudence tempered with equity, not unregardless of it, since it cannot be prudence to threaten what I know I cannot justly execute: for this, in human laws, doth null the penalty; and could it be supposed in divine, would even frustrate the end of all God's threats, since every body would rest assured that a just God would never execute them.

But, Secondly, The execution of the threatened judgment, which is the only thing against which the objection lies, is certainly an act of distributive justice, and is so represented in the holy scriptures, when it said to be done "according to our works," and "according as our works shall be," Rom. ii. 16, 2 Cor. v. 10, Rev. xxii. 12, Matt. xvi. 27; and when it is declared to be δικαιοκρισία, "the just judgment of God;" and δίκαιον παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ, "just with God, to render this vengeance to those who obey not the gospel," which consists in their "everlasting destruction," 2 Thess. i. 6. 8, 9. So that though prudence was properly concerned in promulging the penalty, because it is prudence which directs us to choose the means most proper to the end we aim at; yet seeing the primary end of the lawgiver, i. e. the preventing the transgressing of his law, is wholly lost, and entirely defeated, before this punishment comes to be executed, justice alone can be concerned in the execution of it; and if the continuance of the sinner under misery for ever be the execution of the threatened punishment, justice alone can be concerned in the subjection of the sinner to that punishment: so far is it from being true, that if prudence be requisite for the proportioning penalties to crimes, justice cannot be concerned in the disproportion that may be between them, and much less that it cannot be concerned in executing a penalty which bears so great a disproportion to the crime.

I confess also, that in human governments prudence may fitly be called in to deliberate, not whether it be lawful, but whether it be expedient to execute the threatened penalty; as when the government is feeble, and the multitude or power of offenders may render it hazardous to do justice on them; but nothing of this nature can happen in theocracy, where there can neither be a want of wisdom in appointing, or equity in proportionating, the penalty to the offences, and much less want of power to execute what in his equity and wisdom he saw fit to threaten.

Secondly, When it is said, that "a less penalty than eternal sufferings would not have been sufficient to deter men from sin; and therefore it could not be unreasonable, but rather suitable to divine prudence, to threaten eternal miseries:"

I am not willing to admit that God should threaten what he knows he cannot with consistence to his justice or his goodness execute; this being, in effect, to threaten in this wise, "If you will do to me what you in justice ought not to do, I will execute upon you what I in justice ought not to do to you." It is also to insinuate that an all-wise God could not so well provide for human government, or carry on his great designs, without abusing men's credulity, and scaring them with dreadful expectations of what he never did intend to execute. Lastly, this seemeth even to insinuate, that prudence in God may act without regard to equity and goodness, and even be separated from them; as it must be, in appointing, and even proportionating, those penalties to crimes which it is not consistent with his equity or goodness to inflict.

Thirdly, When it is added, that "God is not obliged to execute what he hath threatened, any farther than the reasons and the ends of government do require;" and that "he may, without any injury to the party threatened, remit and abate as much as he pleaseth of the punishment that he hath threatened, and that without any impeachment of his truth and faithfulness:"

This I allow of in the case of temporal punishments in this world, designed not for excision, but the amendment of the sinner; because there may be a just ground for the remission of such threatened penalties, even the repentance and reformation of the sinner, by which the primary end of all God's threats, in some good measure, is obtained: and also because these threats, in what expressions soever they are made, if they be only threats, are still conditional; the meaning of them being only this,—I will inflict this judgment, if you repent not of your evil ways: "For at what instant I shall speak," saith God, "against a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, to pull down, and to destroy it; if that nation, against which I have pronounced these things, turn from their evil ways, I will repent me of the evil which I thought to do unto them" (Jer. xviii. 7, 8). And again, "When I say unto the wicked, O wicked man, thou shalt surely die; if he do not turn from his way he shall die in his iniquity. Say therefore to them, As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, but that the wicked turn from his way and live; wherefore, turn yourselves, and live ye" (Ezek. xviii. 32, xxxiii. 8, 9. 11). Thirdly, Because God threateneth judgments, not that he takes any pleasure in his punishments, but rather to awaken and reform the sinner: when, therefore, by his comminations, he hath wrought this good effect upon him, it is not to be wondered that he doth not proceed to execute that judgment which hath already done its work by being threatened. And all this well comports, not only with divine justice, but also with his immutability and truth, because this reformation and repentance change the subject of the threat; the change in every instance of this nature being not in God, but man. Thus, v. g. we cannot charge God with mutability, because he doth not execute the threatened judgment on repenting Nineveh; because it was impenitent, and not repenting Nineveh, he threatened: nor with injustice, because it was only her impenitence which rendered her the proper object of vindictive justice.

But then this notion seems to be stretched too far, when it is extended to God's threats of future and eternal punishments to be inflicted upon those who die in an impenitent and unreformed estate. For,

First, In all these cases, the evil threatened hath entirely lost its first and salutary end upon them, and therefore must be threatened to such persons to no end, or else to show the justice of God in punishing these "vessels of his wrath," thus "fitted for destruction." Thus, v. g. when Christ saith, "Except ye repent, ye shall all perish" (Luke xiii. 3. 5), that "in the day of wrath, and revelation of his righteous judgment," God will "give to every one according to his works; to them that obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath" (Rom. ii. 5—8); "to them that obey not the gospel, everlasting destruction;" these threats are plainly made to those who die in their impenitence and disobedience, by that God "who will judge every man according to his works;" declaring, that in the day of the revelation of his wrath and righteous judgment they shall perish everlastingly; because, "through the hardness and impenitency of their hearts, they have treasured up wrath against the day of wrath," and rendered themselves "vessels of his wrath fitted for destruction." Can it be reasonably said then, because God does them no injury if he do not execute his wrath upon them, that though they do not repent, they may not perish? that indignation and wrath may not be the portion of the disobedient? and that this righteous Judge may not give to them according to their works? May we not rather say unto them, as doth this very person in another place,* "If thou continuest impenitent, however he may defer the execution of temporal evils, his truth and veracity is concerned to inflict eternal punishments upon thee?"

Secondly, God's threats of everlasting miseries have for their object the impenitent, and therefore do exclude the supposition of any change in them, which may induce God to remit or to abate the threatened judgment: if then this punishment may be remitted to them, either in part or in whole, it must be either by a change in God, or by a secret intention in him not to inflict what he thus threateneth. That there was in God no such secret intention, this learned person thus declares, by saying,† "When God did threaten, he spake what he did really purpose and intend, if something did not intervene to prevent the judgment threatened." And indeed, these threats declaring what a righteous God will do, and what they who are finally impenitent and disobedient shall suffer, such a secret will must plainly be repugnant to his revealed will, and therefore must suppose in God two contrary wills. Moreover, to say that such a secret intention may be in God, notwithstanding these declarations to the contrary, is in great measure to enervate even the primary intention of these threats, viz. the deterring the sinner, by the greatness and duration of them, from a continuance in his sin; for this intention, if it may be in God, it follows, that it may be his will not to inflict what he hath threatened to the sinner: now so much hopes as you give the impenitent sinner, that he may escape eternal punishment, so much encouragement you give him to continue still in his impenitence. Now "the belief of the threatenings of God, in their utmost extent, is of so great moment to a good life, and so great a discouragement to sin," saith this reverend person,* "that if men were once set free from the fear and belief of this, the most powerful restraint from sin would be taken away."

* Sermon on the Truth of God, vol. vi. p. 361.

† Sermon on the Unchangeableness of God, vol. vi. p. 110.

That this cannot be expected, by reason of any change in God, this excellent person thus declares and evinceth:† "Let but the sinner consider what God is, and his unchangeable nature must needs terrify him; he is a holy God, who therefore 'hateth all the workers of iniquity;' a just God, who 'will by no means clear the guilty,' nor let the sinner go unpunished. He is also omnipotent, and able to execute the vengeance threatened against sinners. And, which gives a sad accent to all this, he that is thus holy, and just, and powerful, continues ever the same; he will never cease to hate iniquity, and to be an implacable enemy to all impenitent sinners.—Let, then, all obstinate sinners hear this, and tremble; you cannot be more obstinately bent to continue in your ways, than God is peremptorily resolved to make you miserable; if you be determined on a sinful course, God is also determined how he will deal with you; that 'he will not spare,' but that 'his anger and jealousy shall smoke against you;' and, that 'all the curses which are written in this book shall light upon you.' He hath sworn in his wrath, that unbelieving and impenitent sinners 'shall not enter into his rest;' and for the greater assurance of the thing, and that we may not think that there is any condition implied in these threatenings, he hath confirmed them by an oath, that by this 'immutable sign, in which it is impossible for God to lie,' sinners might have strong terrors, and not be able to fly to any hopes of refuge."

Thirdly, Either God may in justice inflict upon the wicked these punishments which he hath threatened, or else it is unjust in God to execute upon them the judgment written; i. e. the punishment which he hath threatened to them in the word of truth. If it be said, it is unjust in God to execute them on the sinner dying in his impenitence, either we cannot be obliged to believe that word in which these threats are contained; or else an obligation must lie upon us to believe that God will act unjustly. If, to avoid this, it be said, these threats do not discover certainly what God will do, but only what the sinner doth deserve to suffer, read them once more, and you will find, that they expressly say of those who shall be at the great day condemned, that "they shall go away into eternal punishment," Matt. xxv. 46, that they "shall be punished with eternal destruction from the presence of the Lord," 2 Thess. i. 8, and that they "shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever," Rev. xiv. 10, 11, xx. 10.

Moreover, when our Saviour argues thus, to induce men to cut off their offending hands, and pluck out their offending eyes, "It is better to enter into life halt and maimed, than to be cast into eternal fire (or in hell), where the worm dieth not, and where the fire is not quenched, Matt. xviii. 8, 9, doth he not sufficiently inform us, there is an absolute necessity of doing the one, or suffering the other? When he saith, "He that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost shall never be forgiven in this, or in the world to come, but shall be obnoxious to eternal judgment," Matt. xii. 32, Mark iii. 29, doth he not insinuate, that he who never is forgiven, must be for ever subject to this judgment? It is therefore certain, that our judge hath expressly taught us, not only that the impenitent sinner doth deserve, but that he shall actually suffer, "the worm that never dies, the fire that shall not be quenched."

If God in justice may inflict upon the wicked these punishments which he hath threatened, then the objection cannot need this answer; yea, what can move him not to inflict what he, by threatening, hath engaged his truth to do? What, I say, can move him not to do it, but an act of mercy exercised to them, of whom the scripture saith, "They shall have judgment without mercy?" James ii. 13. What, but remission of that sin, which, saith the scripture, "shall never be remitted?" What, but mercy in the day of wrath and judgment? What, but remission exercised to the impenitent, without any interest in the blood of our redemption? To which imaginations I conceive the scripture gives but little countenance.

Nor are we to conclude, that the non-execution of these threats lays no impeachment on God's truth and faithfulness; because it is not esteemed, among men, a piece of falsehood, not to do what they have threatened. For men may reasonably be moved to remit their threatenings; because they oft are made in passion, or may exceed the rules of justice: but these are things not incident to an all-perfect God; or, because the person threatened repents, begs pardon, and returns unto his duty, which the damned cannot be supposed to do.

§. 5. It is farther said, in answer to this objection, that macula peccati est æterna, "the stain of them who die in their impenitence will be perpetual;" and he that dies thus filthy, will be "filthy still;" now it seems equitable that, is qui nunquam desinit esse malus, nunquam desineret esse miser, "he who never ceases to be wicked, should never cease to be miserable." Now this, rightly explained, affords a clear and satisfactory answer to the objection, as showing that the sinner becomes for ever miserable, not by any positive act of God inflicting everlasting stripes upon him, or loading him perpetually with fresh torments, but wholly from his own sin, which renders him incapable of the enjoyment of a holy God, and so perpetually excluded from his blissful presence; which, to a soul that is immortal, and can never die, must be the source of everlasting torment, and from the natural workings of its faculties, will necessarily subject it to the worm that never dies.

I own, and really believe, that positive torments, such as the schools call pœna sensus, shall be inflicted on the body; but then I have insinuated my present notion of them to be this:

First, That these positive torments on the body are not to begin until the raising of the body, when Christ "shall come in flaming fire, to take vengeance on them who would not obey his gospel; the world that now is, being reserved to (be set on) fire, for the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men." At which time, I conceive, the righteous shall be snatched up "into the air, and be for ever with the Lord" (1 Thess. iv. 17), and the wicked shall be left to the devouring flames. See for this, the note on 2 Pet. iii. 7.

Secondly, I also do conjecture, that this fire may be called "eternal;" not that the bodies of the wicked shall be for ever burning in it, and never be consumed by it, since this cannot be done without a constant miracle; but because it shall so entirely consume their bodies, as that they never shall subsist again, but shall perish, and be destroyed for ever by it. In which sense "Sodom and Gomorrah were set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire" (see the note on Jude, ver. 7). And if so, this punishment being only temporary, the objection doth not lie against it; God being no more obliged, either in justice or in goodness, to snatch the wicked out of these flames, when they thus kindle on them, than he was to snatch the wicked of the old world out of that deluge which overwhelmed them. These I call my conjectures, or my private sentiments. But then I add, as certain matter of my faith,

First, That the soul, even from the time of its separation from the body, in its impenitency, shall find itself in such a dismal state, as shall then fill it with perpetual horror, and dreadful expectation of the punishment which God hath threatened to the wicked. And thus it shall be like those devils which "believe and tremble" (James ii. 19), as knowing that there is reserved for them "a time of torment" (Matt. viii. 29).

Secondly, That when the final sentence shall be passed upon the wicked, and they shall be for ever separated from the presence of the Lord, their soul shall be perpetually subject to the height of misery, or to that worm which never dies; and that this misery will be the natural and the perpetual result of such separation.

To explain this, let it be considered,

1. That there is scarce any thing in which the heathen moralists so universally accord, as in this fixed rule, μὴ καθαρῷ καθαροῦ ἐπόπτεσθαι οὐ θεμιτόν ἦ, "that an impure soul can have no commerce with a pure God;" and that "it is not congruous to his nature to admit such soul into his presence." And this assertion is built upon a sure and incontestable foundation: for seeing God is absolute in holiness, he cannot but retain the greatest hatred to, and abhorrence of, all actions and persons that are unrighteous and impure; and since his nature is immutable, his holiness unchangeable, he must for ever hate, with a most perfect hatred, whatsoever is unholy and impure; and therefore to suppose an interruption of his hatred of evil-doers, is to imagine he can cease to be a pure and holy God. Consider,

2. That the soul of a wicked man being immortal must abide for ever, if it be not annihilated; and that God neither is obliged to annihilate it, nor hath he any where declared that he will do so.

I say, he is not obliged to annihilate the souls of wicked men, for then it must be so on this account, because he is obliged to put them out of that misery which they have brought upon themselves by their own folly and rebellions; and if so, since this must certainly be an act, not of strict justice, but of grace and favour, God must be bound to show an act of grace and favour towards men, purely because they have provoked and rebelled against him, i. e. because they have done that which renders them the proper objects of his hatred and his indignation; and be obliged to save men from that misery, which by their stubborn disobedience to all his calls and admonitions, his exhortations, and all the gracious methods his providence had used to preserve them from it, they wilfully have brought upon themselves. Whereas indeed "the riches of his goodness" being designed to "lead men to repentance," or to encourage them in the ways of holiness and piety, hath only for its proper object such as are capable of being made the better by it; it cannot therefore be the goodness and mercy of a God, to show kindness to persons obstinately and incorrigibly wicked; because it cannot be the goodness and mercy of a Being infinitely just and holy. For seeing all the divine perfections must agree together, that cannot be a divine perfection, which contradicts any other perfection.

The original of our mistakes in matters of this nature seems to arise from our own imperfection, which naturally leads us to consider of the divine attributes apart, and as it were in separation from each other, and, by so doing, to frame such wide and large notions of the one, as to exclude the other: whereas indeed they ought to be considered as really they are in God himself, i. e. goodness and mercy joined with infinite holiness and justice; and as it is the goodness and mercy of a lawgiver, governor, and righteous judge, which never regularly can be exercised without some prospect of reclaiming, or doing good unto the object of it. And thus it is well consistent with the prayer of David, "Be not thou merciful to them that offend of malicious wickedness," Ps. lix. 5.

§. 6. I add, that God hath not declared in scripture, that he will annihilate the souls of wicked men, or that this is the punishment which he designeth to inflict upon them. This is generally said to be the doctrine of the Socinians, though Crellius* expressly says, Animas impiorum Deum post judicium annihilaturum nec scriptura asserit, nec ratio evincit; that "neither reason doth evince, nor scripture assert, it will be so." And,

Obj. 1. It is certain that this follows not from any of those places of the Old Testament in which the dead are said to be no more, or not to be: as, v. g. "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more," Ps. civ. 35. "Our fathers have sinned, and are not," Lam. v. 7. "I have made Esau bare—his seed is spoiled, and he is not," Jer. xlix. 10; see x. 20, xxxv. 15.

For (1.) if any of these places speak of annihilation, they must speak of such a one as was then past already, and so is inconsistent with the future judgment of those persons; because it is not said they shall not be, but they are not; they therefore cannot refer to any future annihilation at the day of judgment.

(2.) Then must the righteous be annihilated as well as the wicked; for of righteous Enoch it is said, "He walked before God, and was not," Gen. v. 24; of Joseph, "One is not," Gen. xlii. 13; and David prays thus for himself, "O spare me a little, that I may recover my strength, before I go hence and be not," Ps. xxxix. 13. It is therefore evident these places only were intended to import, those persons were not "in the land of the living."

Obj. 2. But it is objected, that the wicked after the resurrection shall be punished with "the second death:" wherefore they cannot in any proper sense be said to live, and to subsist, and to have sense of pain, this being not consistent with a state of death.

Ans. I answer (1.) That this second death cannot consist in the annihilation of the wicked, or in their exemption from all sense of punishment, because it is promised, that "he who overcometh shall not be hurt by the second death" (Rev. ii. 11), whence it is manifest, that they who die this second death shall be hurt by it; but were it to the wicked, condemned to an eternal separation from God, and from all hopes of happiness, a conclusion of their being, and of all sense of misery, it would be no more hurtful, but highly beneficial to them, as being a conclusion of that life which they must otherwise have spent in endless misery. And therefore even Hierocles represents this as the choice of wicked men, by saying in his commentary on the verses of Pythagoras, p. 164, οὐ βούλεται γὰρ ὁ κακὸς ἀθάνατον εἶναι τὴν αὐτοῦ ψυχὴν, ἵνα μὴ ὑπομένη τιμωρούμενος, "The wicked man would not have his soul to be immortal, that he might not abide under punishment." Moreover, those very torments which the damned suffer, are declared to be the second death; and wicked men are therefore said to die the second death, because they do endure eternal torments: for "the fearful and unbelievers, &c. shall have their part in that lake of fire and brimstone, which is the second death," Rev. xxi. 8. This death, then, when it is threatened as the final punishment of the wicked, cannot import a state of non-existence, or insensibility, but only an unhappy miserable state, a separation of the soul from him who is the fountain of our life and all our comforts; an absolute exclusion from that felicity which only renders life a blessing; and a life of infelicity and misery. To make this still more evident,

Consider, (2.) That this is a Jewish phrase used often by and borrowed from the ancient Hebrews, with whom it doth import the punishment of damned persons in the life to come. So, Deut. xxxiii. 6, "Let Reuben live, and not die the second death," saith the Targum of Onkelos; i. e. "Let him not die that death, which the wicked die in the age to come," saith the Targum of B. Uziel: "Let him not die the second death, which the wicked die in the age to come," saith the Jerusalem Targum. Now that the death of the wicked, in the age to come, did really subject them to eternal torments, the Jews still thought, as is apparent not only from the plain testimony of Josephus,* who saith, the pharisees assigned to the wicked εἱργμὸν ἀΐδιον, "an eternal prison," in which they were to be tormented, ἀϊδίῳ τιμωρίᾳ,† "with eternal punishment;" and from Philo,‡ who saith, that "some conceive death to be the last of punishments, whereas it scarcely deserveth to be named the beginning of them, seeing the punishment reserved for the wicked person is, ζῆν ἀποθήσκοντα ἀεὶ καὶ τρόπον τινὰ θάνατον ὑπομένειν ἀτέλευτον, to live for ever in a dying state, and suffer such a death as hath no end;" but also from the apocryphal books, which say, κλαύσονται ἐν αἰσθήσει ἕως αἰῶνος, "They shall feel them, and weep for ever," Judith xvi. 17. So again, Isa. xxii. 14, "This sin shall not be forgiven till the second death;" that is, saith

* Solut. Problem. tom. iv. p. 533.

Kimchi, "till the soul dieth in the world to come." And, Iv. 5, 6. 15, of the same persons it is said, "God will kill them with the second death; and he will deliver them up to the punishment of hell, where the fire burneth all the day."

Obj. 3. It farther is objected, That eternal life is said to be peculiar to the saints in bliss, whereas unto the wicked it is threatened that "they shall not see life," John iii. 36.

Ans. To this I answer, that "life," in scripture, when it is mentioned as the end of our faith, and the reward of our obedience, is not intended only to signify our permanence in being, but to assure us of our advancement to a state of happiness, and is equivalent to everlasting life. So to the lawyer asking, "What good thing shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" our Saviour answers, "Do this, and thou shalt live," Luke x. 25. 28. So Christ saith, "He that eateth me shall live by me," John vi. 57, i. e. he shall live for ever, ver. 58; "I came that my sheep might have life," John x. 10; "I give unto them life eternal," ver. 28. And that this is the life denied to the wicked, John iii. 36, is evident from the preceding words of the same verse, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life. This is a phrase so known, and this use of it is so frequent, saith Maimonides, that hence our masters say, "The just are styled living in their death, because they then are happy." And that the phrase, "not to see life," cannot import the state of non-existence, or insensibility, is evident, because it is said of them who do not see life, that "the wrath of God abideth on them;" they therefore must abide under a sense of it.

Obj. 4. Lastly, it is objected, that the wicked are in scripture said to "perish utterly," 2 Pet. ii. 12, and to be "punished with everlasting destruction:" now these expressions seem to signify a deprivation of all sense and being.

Ans. But nothing is more common, both in Greek and Latin, and in other languages, than to say, when we conceive our future life is likely to be miserable, ὄλλυμι, perii, "I am undone, I perish." See the note of Taubman* upon these words of Plautus, Qui per virtutem periit, is non interit.

That only in this moral sense the damned are in scripture said to perish, viz. by having all their hopes of future happiness destroyed, and being sentenced to those torments, which are exceedingly more heavy than the loss of being, is evident first, from the scripture, which informs us, that to cast the soul and body into hell-fire is to destroy them; as is apparent from these two expressions, "Fear him who can destroy both soul and body in hell-fire," Matt. x. 28; "who after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell," saith Luke, xii. 5, that is, into that place "where the worm dieth not, and where the fire is not quenched." Moreover, the devils put the question to our Saviour thus, ἦλθες ἀπολέσαι ἡμᾶς, "Art thou come to destroy us before the time?" Luke iv. 34, and yet that "to destroy" is only βασανίσαι, "to torment" them, is evident from the same question recited by Matthew thus, "Art thou come to torment us before the time?" viii. 29. And had the devils thought, that at Christ's coming they might have been reduced into the state of non-existence, or insensibility, they could have had no reason to dread, or deprecate so vehemently that perdition, which would so long ago have freed them from that horror which they still endure.

Moreover, this opinion is so far from being contained in the holy scripture, that it is plainly contrary to many things contained in it: for, (1.) the scripture plainly intimates, some in the other world shall suffer more, some less; for "it shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment" than for Capernaum, Matt. xi. 21. 25; that some shall be beaten with fewer, some with many stripes, Luke xii. 47, 48, some shall receive "greater damnation" than others, Matt. xxiii. 14. But if annihilation only be the second death, the punishment and perdition threatened to sinners in the other world, they must all suffer equally; because if there be no degrees of annihilation, or not being, then all will equally not be, or lose their being, and nothing by annihilation can lose more. (2.) It is said of the wicked that they shall be cast into the place "where their worm dieth not;" of them that shall not see life, that "the wrath of God abideth on them;" of them that are cast into utter darkness, that "there is weeping and wailing." Now that of the schools is absolutely true, that non entis nullæ sunt affectiones, "that which is not, cannot be in misery;" that which abides not cannot abide under the wrath of God; that which so dieth as to cease to be, cannot be subject to a worm that dieth not, whatever be the import of that phrase. Consider,

§. 7. Secondly, That we have two passions of the soul, which are still conversant about good present and to come; viz. desire of the good we want, and joy in that which we at present have. When therefore we are in a state in which we cannot possibly enjoy the good we above all things want and naturally desire, we must for ever lie under the torment of dissatisfaction and despair; and when we fall into that state in which we can enjoy no comfortable or real good, we never can have any joy. Again, we have two other passions, which are employed about a present or a future evil, fear that it may befall us, and grief when it hath actually taken hold upon us. It therefore being natural to all men to desire to be freed from an afflictive evil, when they lie under it without all hopes or prospects of any end of, or deliverance from, the worst of evils, they must be swallowed up of grief; and when their guilt hath rendered them still obnoxious to the divine displeasure, they must be subject to eternal fears. Consider,

Thirdly, That the proper action of the soul is thought, and that whilst she continues, she must be conscious to herself of her own actions; when then the soul hath nothing comfortable to employ her thoughts upon, but an eternal scene of misery, to which her wilful sin and folly have everlastingly confined her, to be the doleful subject of her continual reflections, when she hath nothing to divert her from these rueful thoughts, she must become an endless torment to herself. Now from these three considerations it will demonstrably follow, that the soul, which in this life hath not been purged from the dominion or the guilt of sin, and therefore is excluded from a state of happiness, and from enjoyment of that God in whom its happiness consists, must be for ever miserable.

For, it must be perpetually tormented with the thoughts of its eternal separation from God's blissful presence, and its exclusion from the state of happiness which saints made perfect do enjoy. Now, as a heathen, Plutarch,* puts the question, "Must it not be very sad to be deprived of the hope of everlasting blessings, and to be excluded from the completest happiness?" Were the damned obnoxious to no other punishments besides this loss, even this would beget in them such a worm of conscience, as would perpetually subject them to the worst of miseries; as will be evident, if we consider,

First, That the earnest and impetuous desire, which is in all men, to be happy, is rooted in their very nature, and therefore must continue as long as they retain that nature; and yet it is impossible that this desire should in the least be gratified, when we are once condemned to an eternal separation from the place and object of our happiness, there being no hope that they should ever see his face, who at the coming of their Judge shall be "punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord." Now the wise man tells us, that even "hope deferred makes the heart sick" (Prov. xiii. 12). Hope therefore irrecoverably disappointed must create in it an excess of torment. A wicked Cain accounted it an insupportable calamity to be excluded from God's gracious presence here on earth; "My punishment" (saith he) "is greater than I am able to bear; for from thy face shall I be hid" (Gen. iv. 13, 14). How dreadful therefore must that sentence be, which doth eternally exclude us from his blissful presence, and force us to a continual despair of that which we most ardently desire! For as it is one great ingredient of our future happiness, that it is that which can never be lost, so must it be a signal aggravation of our future misery, and loss of happiness, to know it is irreparable.

Secondly, This loss will be enhanced from the great change the other world will make in our condition. The terrors of an awakened and guilty conscience, even in this life, are very grievous; but here we may be able to mitigate the gripings of it by the society of others, or by the pleasures of the world; we may deceive it with false opinions, and flatter it with false hopes and promises of reformation and amendment; but when we are passed hence into another world, our vain imaginations will be all confuted, our hopes of reformation will be at an end, and we shall be eternally deprived of all those enjoyments in which we once placed our happiness, and shall have nothing to divert us from our saddest thoughts: now, what condition can be more deplorable than this, viz. to be deprived of all those comforts in which we placed our former happiness, and find it utterly impossible to purchase the least glimpse of real happiness, or to divert our thoughts from a continual remorse for our irreparable loss?

For, Thirdly, The sinner's memory reflecting on this punishment of loss, will create fresh and never-ceasing torments to him. It will torment him to remember what an inestimable blessing he hath lost, in losing the enjoyment of that God, who is the chiefest good, and of that happiness, which passeth understanding: for the greater still we apprehend the good to be, the greater will the trouble we endure be, when we have wholly lost the hopes of its enjoyment. Again, it will add still to the torment of the sinner, to consider that he hath exchanged this exceeding and eternal weight of glory for things of no intrinsic value and duration; that for the pleasures of a moment, which are now turned into sadness, he should forego those pleasures which are at God's right hand for ever; that for a little fading earth, which he soon left behind him, he should deprive himself of an "inheritance incorruptible, reserved in the heavens for him." It will also torment him to consider in what a fair capacity he was once placed of being happy; what frequent calls and invitations he hath had to be for ever so; what importunity the God of heaven used to bring him thither; and with what stiffness he resisted all these gracious motions. These, and such-like considerations, will fill the miserable soul with constant matter of most sad reflections. "Now," saith the heathen orator,* "suppose a person subject to the extremest miseries which can be incident to soul and body, without all hope of the alleviation of this misery, or expectation of any future good, what can be imagined farther to complete his misery?"

And now to answer the objection, by removing the foundation of it: hence it is easy to demonstrate, that all these evils, which the soul suffers after death, may rather be esteemed the necessary consequents, as Irenæus† hath observed, than positive and formal punishments of sin by an immediate hand of God. For being destitute of all good things, "they are," saith Irenæus, "in all torment, τοῦ Θεοῦ μὲν προηγητικῶς μὴ κολάζοντος, ἐπακολουθούσης δὲ ἐκείνης τῆς κολάσεως διὰ τὸ ἑστερῆσθαι πάντων τῶν ἀγαθῶν, God not internally tormenting them, but their torment following upon the deprivation of all good; and likewise because the good things proceeding from God are eternal and without end, therefore the want of them is an eternal and endless punishment." Mercurius Trismegistus‡ saith in like manner, that ἀσεβὴς ψυχὴ μένει ἐπὶ τῆς ἰδίας οὐσίας ὑφ' ἑαυτῆς κολαζομένη, "the soul of the wicked man continues in its proper essence, being tormented from itself." Apollodorus adds, that ἀδίκων εἶναι τὰ κολαστήρια διὰ τοῦ λογισμοῦ, καὶ τῆς μνήμης τῶν βεβιωμένων τὰς κολάσεις ἐχόντων, "the unjust are punished from their own reasonings, and their punishment results from the remembrance of what they had done in this life: and when the remembrance of these things ceaseth, καὶ ἡ κόλασις τῆς ψυχῆς πέπαυται, the punishment of the soul ceaseth." For instance, That souls departed are deprived of the love of God, are objects of his wrath, and are excluded from his presence, happeneth not merely because they are souls separated from the body; for pious souls, after their separation, are entirely exempted from these evils; but this ariseth from the natural purity and holiness of God, which renders it incongruous to him to admit such souls into his presence, and the defilement and impurity which these unhappy souls lie under, and by which they are rendered unable to converse with the God of holiness. The worm of conscience, the desperation, the direful expectations which follow from this sense of loss, and the divine displeasure, are also the natural results of the soul's separation in an impure and unsanctified condition, and therefore being "filthy still." Moreover, it being natural to all men, say the very heathens,* "to give good things to them they love, and in whom they delight, and to inflict evil things on those to whom they stand affected contrariwise," how can it be, but that the soul, thus conscious of those abominable things which the Lord hates, and which most justly have incensed this righteous Judge, should live under most dreadful expectations of his wrath? Now, true is that of the tragedian, Pœnas dat qui expectat, qui autem meruit expectat; he suffers, whose conscience tells him he deserves, and therefore cannot but expect to suffer. Lastly, That he is thus to be eternally a torment to himself, ariseth from the immortality of the soul, which cannot cease to be, without an immediate dissolution from the hand of God; and whilst it doth continue, cannot cease to be desirous of that happiness from which it will for ever be excluded, or cease to be tormented with the thoughts of that stupendous folly which did subject it to this heavy doom.

And now what a poor comfort is it to the sinner, to laugh at what is said touching hell-fire, and a lake of brimstone, as unphilosophical; and say, that these are things improper to torment a spiritual soul, if undeniably it may be subject to the loss of all that is desirable to make it happy, to endless grief, to remediless remorse, and dreadful expectations of the wrath of God, and a perpetual despair of being ever freed from these tormenting evils, which, as the heathen hath observed, are πυρὸς καὶ σιδήρου βεβαιότερα, "more violent and insupportable than any punishment by fire and sword." What if the fire, in which the bodies of the wicked are to be tormented, should not be kindled till our Saviour "come in flaming fire to take vengeance on them?" What comfort will this yield the sinner, if, from the day of its departure from the body, his soul will be obnoxious to this greater misery? What, lastly, if that fire of the damned, in which their bodies are to be tormented, should only be eternal, in that sense in which Jude informs us, that "Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities round about them, have been set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire;" if this amazing torment of the soul, which, in propriety of speech, is only capable of feeling torment, will be eternal, in the highest and most intensive import of that word?

If it be still objected, That it seems not consistent with divine goodness, to have framed man so, as that he should be miserable from himself; this, at one blow, cuts off both heaven and hell: for it is to find fault with God, and represent him as less good, for making any beings capable of vice and virtue. For all our virtue, in a state of trial, consists in choosing well, when we had freedom, and some temptations to do otherwise; and all our vice, in choosing to do ill, when we had laws directing us to avoid the evil, and to choose the good, and had the highest motive so to do: to say, then, a good God could not create a creature capable of vice and virtue, is in effect to say, it is inconsistent with divine goodness to create such creatures as should be subject unto government; since government supposes laws, and laws must be attended with the sanction of rewards and punishments. Here then again the mistake lies in separating the divine goodness from his holiness and justice; whereas justice and holiness are as essential to the notion of a God as goodness: for it is impossible that justice should belong to the idea of God, if it were irreconcilable with the divine goodness to make such creatures as may deserve well or ill; i. e. to be rewarded or punished. And seeing the holiness of God renders it necessary for him to retain the greatest hatred to, and abhorrence of, incorrigible sinners, if it be inconsistent with divine goodness to make any creature which may deserve to be the object of his hatred, goodness and holiness cannot both belong to the idea of God.

If, lastly, it be still inquired, why divine goodness and mercy doth not leave condemned sinners in a capacity of that repentance and reformation, which might, after a season, fit them for the enjoyment of himself, and thereby put a happy end to all their misery?

I answer, That both the Christians and heathens do accord in this, that these eternal punishments shall only be inflicted,* ἐπὶ τοὺς καταλαμβανομένους ἐν τῇ ἀνιάτῳ κακίᾳ, "on those that are incurably wicked:" and they who shall hereafter be found thus confirmed in wickedness are by the heathens† given up to torments without end. Yea, Celsus‡ dogmatically says, that "they judge rightly who say, The just shall be happy; οἱ δὲ ἄδικοι πάμπαν αἰωνίοις κακοῖς συνέξονται, but the unjust shall be always subject to eternal evils." And this was the opinion of the heathens as well as of the Christians, and that no man ought ever to depart from it. Now that which haply may render their state incurable may be,

1. That their day of grace is past and turned into a day of wrath; their time of trial and probation is expired, and they are come to the time of retribution. For, as the Christians teach, that a man cannot be truly good and holy without the assistance of the Holy Spirit; so did the heathens§ teach, that there was an absolute need of a divine afflatus, or good assisting genius, to preserve them from sin, and to advance them to a virtuous life. Now, why is it unjust with God to say, his "Spirit shall not always strive" with them who have so long resisted all his motions, and hardened their hearts against him? whom all the riches of his goodness could not lead to repentance, or preserve from "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath?" Either the day of grace must never end, or there must be a time when they that are filthy will "be filthy still."

Moreover, To assert, it is unjust with God, or inconsistent with his goodness, to "appoint a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, and render to men according to their works;" as it seems plainly to border on a contradiction in the terms, so it cuts off all future judgment; it being certain, God neither will nor can do what is inconsistent with his goodness to do; and according to this hypothesis, he must never pass the final and decretory sentence upon wicked men.

2. The place and company to which the damned shall be sentenced, seem to render them incapable of growing better; for when they are once given up to the tormentor, and kept in chains of darkness, what expectation can there be they should grow better under this enemy of God and goodness? and yet that this is one ingredient of their future state, is not the sentiment of Jews and Christians only from the holy scripture, but also of the heathens from the tradition they had received, as is evident both‖ from their own words, and from their Adrastia, Nemesis, Alastores, their furies, hurtful demons, and their evil geniuses.

3. The alteration of their condition and their state, seems to exclude all place for reformation, and for the exercise of piety and virtue. For the sentence of condemnation and exclusion from God's blissful presence being passed upon them, they have no hope of being happy, or of escaping the misery to which they are exposed; and so can have no motive to be better, nor can they be in a capacity to love that God from whom they can expect no good. There also seems to be no place for virtue in a future state; no room for temperance, where there is no capacity of enjoying meats or drinks, or any pleasures of the flesh; no place for justice, where there is no meum and tuum; no possibility to kill or maim, or be cruel to another, when none can be defamed to their prejudice, and hurt in their concerns: lastly, no place for charity, where there is either none that can want any thing, or none that can receive advantage by us.

A DISCOURSE

BY WAY OF INQUIRY,

Whether the apostles, in their writings, spake as conceiving the day of judgment might be in their days; and accordingly suited their phrases and exhortations.

I HAVE shown in the note upon 1 Thess. iv. 15, and in an additional note on 2 Cor. v. 1. 9, that the apostles of our Lord neither did nor could use any expressions importing "that the day of judgment might happen in their days," or in that age in which they lived: but Mr. Whiston, in his excellent essay on the Revelation of St. John, hath very largely endeavoured to prove the contrary; I shall therefore impartially consider what he hath offered for the support of his two corollaries, and shall endeavour to show the weakness of his arguments, and the pernicious consequences of his assertion, and then shall leave the reader to judge of this important point, and where the fatal mistake lies. Now his first assertion is, that "Our Saviour himself, as man, whilst he was on earth at least, did not know the duration of the days of the Messiah, nor the time of the rise and the duration of antichrist, which was included in it." Now in this proposition I have no concern, and so shall not be long either in answering what he alleges for, or in the confirmation of it. I therefore grant that our Saviour, whilst he acted as a prophet, or a revealer of his Father's will, whilst he was here on earth, did not by the revelation of the Spirit know the day or hour of the day of judgment; but I deny that hence it follows, that he did not know the age in which it was to happen, or what great occurrences or previous mutations were to happen that day. (2). I grant, that he that was the "Lamb slain," was therefore "worthy to open the sealed book;" but I deny that hence it follows that he was not able to know the contents of it before. (3.) I grant that to the question of his disciples, "Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom unto Israel?" our Saviour answers, "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power" (Acts i. 6, 7); but I deny that hence it follows, that he "in whom were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 3) did not know them. When Mr. Whiston proves all or any of these consequences, he will have something to support his corollary; but till this be done, it must pass for an assertion which hath no foundation in the holy scripture. Let us now see what just ground he had to own, "that this is a strange assertion." And surely it must be exceeding strange to any considering person, that he in whom "dwelt the fullness of the Godhead," and in whom were "hid all the treasures of wisdom," should be thought ignorant, whether his own kingdom, to which he was advanced, should continue only for a few or for some thousand years; that he should be ignorant of the reign of his own saints a thousand years, and of the time when all the prophecies of the Old Testament, concerning the glorious conversion of the Jews, should happen; that Daniel should so plainly say, that in the time of the fourth monarchy, "the God of heaven should set up a kingdom which should never be destroyed, but should consume all other kingdoms, and should last for ever (ii. 44), an everlasting kingdom that should not pass away;" and yet our great Prophet, who was "the wisdom of the Father," and the very king who was to rule over this kingdom for ever, should be so ignorant of the import of these prophecies relating to his own kingdom, as not to know it was to last one quarter of the duration of some of the other kingdoms, but might be, for any thing he knew to the contrary, res unius ætatis, only the business of one age. Lastly, Is it not very strange, that these masters of revelations should be able so punctually to declare to us the very year of the fall of the Roman empire; the time of the rise of the little horn, and the period of his duration; and the true import of the words of that prophet, "a time, and times, and half a time;" and yet our blessed Lord should be so much an ignoramus as to the true import and extent of that whole prophecy, as to imagine, that it might be fulfilled in the very first century; and that what they knew imports one thousand two hundred and sixty years, he should imagine might only signify three years and a half? And so much for the first corollary.

Secondly, He positively asserts,* Christ's apostles seem to have really imagined, "that the great day of judgment might not be very long deferred beyond the destruction of Jerusalem, which was to be in that age (A. D. 70), and accordingly to have suited their phrases and exhortations."

Now against this corollary I argue as before, that either these inspired apostles knew and understood the import and meaning of the prophecy of Daniel, concerning the "kingdom to be given to the saints," the fall of the Roman empire, the rise of antichrist; or, "the little horn," "the time, times, and half a time," of his duration, and the millennium that was to follow; and also of the prophecies of the Old Testament, concerning "the blindness of the Jews," and the time of their general conversion; or they did not, but were ignorant of all these things. If they did know these things, it is certain that either they must think that these things were to happen after the day of judgment; or that they could not think that the day of judgment might happen in that age, or while they lived. If they knew not these things, which were spoken for their instruction, by their own prophets, how came these men to be so positive and certain of all these things, of which inspired apostles, "led by the Spirit into all truth," should know little or nothing? That the apostles should be ignorant of that exact time of the day of judgment, which divine wisdom still conceals from all men, and never made the matter either of revelation or prediction, I very heartily believe; but that they should be so ignorant of all the famous epochas, foretold by their own prophets, concerning the state of Christ's church, and their own nation; that they should not know whether the Roman empire was to fall in their own days, or in the fifth century; whether antichrist was to come in their days, or only was to arise after that fall; whether being come he was to continue only three years and a half, or to last one thousand two hundred and sixty years; or whether Daniel's "time, times, and half a time," did signify the one or the other period; whether the mystery of the glorious conversion of the Jews, "when deliverance should come to them out of Sion, and so all Israel shall be saved;" and the "new heaven and new earth" they expected, according to God's promise, was to be expected in their days, or about one thousand seven hundred years after their decease; whether the kingdom, which was to "be given to the people of the saints of the Most High," and the millennium promised, was to begin and end in their days, or to commence and end so long after, according to the time assigned for these epochas by these more knowing men; these, I confess, are things I cannot easily believe.

In particular, who can imagine, that Paul should say to the first persons to whom he wrote any epistle,† That the day of judgment should not come till that which letted, i. e. the Roman empire, was taken away, and that then the man of sin was to be revealed, and was only to be consumed by the coming of our Lord to judgment; that he should endeavour to remove their scruple, touching the nearness of his coming, by remembering them, that when he was with them, he told them these things; and yet should tell them, the very next year, that this day might happen whilst he was alive! for if indeed he told them truly when these things were to happen, it was impossible that he should tell them the day of judgment might happen in his days or age; but if he told them, that they might expect that all these things should happen in his days or age; that being, as experience shows, manifestly false, why doth he, by the direction of the Holy Ghost, conclude that discourse thus? "Wherefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have received, whether by our word or our epistle," ver. 15. Again, who can think that the same apostle should tell the Christians of this time, that "the Spirit had said expressly, that in the latter times some should depart from the faith, giving heed to deceivers, and to doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats," 1 Tim. iv., &c., i. e. that he should, as Mr. Mede saith, "use these words ('the latter times') as a mark to inform them, to whom he wrote, when these things should come to pass;" and, as he adds, that "the Holy Ghost had marked out these times in Daniel, by the time of the fall of the Roman empire, and the rise and duration of the little horn;" and yet that Paul himself, in express contradiction to this declaration of the Holy Ghost, should teach that the day of judgment might happen in his time. Could Peter arm the believing Jews against the scoffers at the promise, or prediction of the day of judgment, by bidding them "remember the words of the holy prophets, Esaias and Daniel," says Mr. Mede,* who prophesied of things not yet come to pass, and yet tell the same persons, that God was then ready to judge the quick and the dead?† Could he say dogmatically, in Mr. Whiston's sense, "The end of all things is at hand;"‡ and yet soon after tell the same persons, as Mr. Whiston§ saith he did, that the day of judgment might, through the long-suffering of God, be prolonged for a thousand years, without any impeachment of his veracity?

And whereas he absolutely denies, "that the apostles, who thus conceived of the day of judgment, and accordingly suited their phrases and exhortations, were herein properly deceived, or that they ever preached or declared, as from God, that the day of judgment was to be in that age; or that they were deceived in any part of their doctrine, or that they preached false doctrine;" I, on the contrary, undertake to prove, that if the places, produced by Mr. Whiston, bear the sense which he hath put upon them, all these things must follow with the clearest evidence. And,

First, I say, That on this supposition they must have preached false doctrine; for if, when Paul saith to the believing Jews, "Christ hath appeared in the consummation of ages," Heb. ix. 26, this signifies his positive assertion, that he appeared "but a little time before the day of judgment," as Mr. Whiston doth interpret his words; if, again, when he says dogmatically, "Yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry,"‖ he saith this of the day of judgment, must he not preach false doctrine, in saying so dogmatically, he would come in a little time, and would not tarry, when in truth he was to tarry nigh two thousand years, and Paul knew nothing to the contrary, but he might do so?

Moreover, James, Peter, and John, according to this hypothesis, must have taught false doctrine. For doth not James say dogmatically, "The coming of the Lord draweth nigh, and the Judge standeth at the door;"¶ and if he saith these things of the day of judgment, must he not speak what experience shows to be notoriously false? When he adds, ver. 5, that God was "ready to judge the quick and the dead," if he meant, as Mr. Whiston saith he did, "that he was then ready to begin the fatal judgment," must he not speak the plainest falsehood? When John saith as dogmatically, "Little children, this is the last hour," and that, by the coming of the many antichrists, who are now upon the stage, "you may know this is the last hour," he meant "this is the time of the last judgment," did he not manifestly teach false doctrine?

Secondly, They must delude their hearers, and all those Christians to whom they wrote, and all those Christians who were obliged to believe their writings, with false hopes, false motives and encouragements to the performance of their duty. For instance; when Paul exhorts the Romans to "awake out of sleep, εἰδότες τὸν καιρὸν, knowing the season, that now is their salvation nearer than when they believed;"†† when he advises them to "put off the works of darkness, and to put on the armour of light," because "the night was far spent and the day was at hand;" here are not only two assertions notoriously false, if, according to Mr. Whiston, these passages relate to the nearness of the day of judgment, but also two motives to Christian duties, both grounded on these false assertions. When he exhorts his Philippians to moderation because "the Lord is at hand,"* if he meant this of the day of judgment, there is another motive to a Christian duty grounded upon a false assertion. When he exhorts the believing Jews to patient suffering, because after a little while Christ will come, and would not tarry, he again, according to this supposition, endeavours to support them under their afflictions by false hopes. When James, v. 8, 9, saith to the same Jews, "Be patient: stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Speak not evil one of another, brethren, that ye be not condemned; behold, the Judge standeth at the door:" and when Peter saith, "The end of all things is at hand; be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer:" if all these passages spake of the day of judgment as near at hand, and "even at the door," must not all these motives to patience, to forebear evil speaking, to sobriety, to vigilance in prayer, be built upon false grounds? When John exhorts them not to love the world, "because the world passeth away, and they knew it was the last hour;"† if these words relate to the day of judgment, he must build his exhortation upon a manifest falsehood, it being impossible that either he or they should know what was not true.

* Corol. ii. p. 130. † 2 Thess. ii.

* 2 Pet. iii. 2. † 1 Pet. iv. 5.
‡ 1 Pet. iv. 7. § P. 134.

Moreover, they speak of these things as both known to themselves, and visible to those to whom they write, by certain tokens, as when John saith, "Now there are many antichrists, by which we know this is the last hour;" when Paul saith to the Romans, that "now is the hour to awake out of sleep," and to the Jews, "exhort one another, and this so much the more, ὅσῳ βλέπετε ἐγγίζουσαν τὴν ἡμέραν, as you see the day approaching," Heb. x. 25. Since it is certain they could not know that to be true which by experience we know to be false, or see that day was then near, or approaching, which is not yet come, how impossible is it that these things should relate to their knowledge of the day of judgment?

Lastly, The apostle Paul, discoursing of the desire that the Christians had to be "clothed upon" with their celestial bodies, saith expressly, 2 Cor. v. 5, "He that hath wrought in us this very thing is God, who hath also given us the earnest of his Holy Spirit;" and 1 Thess. iv. 15, he speaks thus, "This I say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive shall not prevent them that are asleep." Now if these things relate, as Mr. Whiston thinks they do, to the coming of the day of judgment whilst the apostles were alive, must not the apostle deliver that as a truth taught by "the word of Christ," and a desire erected in them by God himself, which experience shows to have been a great mistake and manifestly false? and sure these things must be sufficient to impair the credit of these apostles in other matters. I therefore heartily wish that learned, good, and ingenious men would be more careful to avoid those things which do so plainly shock the very foundations of Christianity, and strengthen the hands of those who question the authority of these sacred books.

And having thus vindicated my notes upon these two places, I have done also that which shows my arguments, to prove that the pope and church of Rome could not be the primary subject of Paul's discourse in 2 Thess. ii., were not grounded, as Mr. Whiston thinks, on a mistake, but on those solid grounds, which I believe he never will be able to evert, and therefore wisely waved.

But though he was not pleased to consider my arguments, I can assure him, that in the very place I had considered and even answered his, before he produced them; for indeed the excellently good man is so intent upon what he conceiveth to be right, that, as it plainly appears from this, and the discourse on Matt. xxiv., he is not at leisure to consider what is said against him.

He begins with a bare citation of the apostle's words, and then adds,‡ "This description is so lively and clear, that I look upon it so far from needing any large paraphrase itself, that it serves well for a paraphrase to all the other prophecies hereto relating, viz. the little horn, and the second beast;" where he manifestly begs the question, supposing that it manifestly relates to those other prophecies, one of which was not then in being, and neither of them rightly understood, saith Mr. Whiston, by the apostle; he thinking that the day of judgment might happen in his time, that the fall of the empire might be then, and that the "time, times and half a time," might only signify three years and a half; whereas I verily believe that Paul's discourse had no relation at all to them, unless it be by way of accommodation; and desire him to be so merciful to such blind creatures as I am, as to let us see by any good proof that there is any affinity betwixt them, save in this one thing, that the man of sin is to be destroyed with the spirit, and the beast with the sword of Christ's mouth, but with this difference, that the man of sin, saith Mr. Whiston, is only to be destroyed by his coming at the day of judgment, and the beast above a thousand years before; the millennium of the saints, the conversion of the Jews, the fullness of the gentiles, and the war with the saints, being all to precede the day of judgment.

I know that our revelation-men call the apocalyptical beast, "antichrist," but that the scripture doth, or ever intended so to do, I find no reason to believe, but rather reason to believe the contrary; for,

First, An antichrist, or a false Christ, in the scripture sense, is one who sets up himself for a true Christ, saying to others, "Lo, here is Christ;" he is "another, who shall come in his own name," and be received by the Jews (John v. 43); the antichrists of John were such as "denied that Jesus was the Christ," 1 John ii. 22, or "that Christ was come in the flesh," 1 John iv. 3. 2 John, ver. 7: and that the church of Rome either was John's antichrist, or concerned in John's description of him, no ancient commentator ever said.

Secondly, The false Christs and antichrists belonged only to the first age of Christianity; the false Christs mentioned by our Lord, Matt. xxiv. 24, and who should come in his name, saying, ἐγώ εἰμι, "I am Christ," Mark xiii. 6, Luke xxi. 8, were to come before the destruction of Jerusalem; and, as John saith, they heard that he was to come in the last hour, so, saith he, from his being "now in the world," you may "know that it is the last hour," 1 John ii. 18, iv. 3. Let then that be granted which no authority affirms, and therefore none of us can know, that this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem: why may not the words of John refer to the then present age, and the false Christs among the Jews and Samaritans, since he doth not say that the last hour is near, or is yet to come, but that it was already come, and represents this as a thing known to them by the antichrists that were "then in the world?" That he cannot be interpreted of the day of judgment, hath been fully manifested; and of any antichrists that were yet to come, of which these come already were the forerunners, he saith not one word: and so there is no reason to imagine that any such thing was intended by him.

Thirdly, The church-history assures us, that Simon Magus, Dositheus, Barchochebas, and others among the Jews, were such as answered these descriptions; but of any antichrist that was to be amongst the Christians of the church of Rome, neither the scripture nor antiquity for many ages give us any intimation.

He adds, that* I "allow the agreement of this description to the great antichrist mentioned in the Revelation;" whereas indeed I do not allow that any antichrist at all is mentioned in the revelation, but only say, that "in a secondary sense this may be attributed, i. e. accommodated, to him who is commonly called the papal antichrist, and may be signally fulfilled in him, in the destruction of him by the spirit of Christ's mouth;" and this I say, not from any conviction of the thing, but only that I may not wholly differ from my brethren in this matter; giving in my annotations first what I think is the true sense and intendment of the apostle's words, and then the sense which protestants put upon the words, and introducing it thus, "Others who refer this to the church of Rome," I proceed to show that the arguments brought against my exposition were answered in the exposition.

Arg. 1. "What need of all this solicitude of Paul to free himself from the scandal of having affirmed, that the destruction of Jerusalem was at hand, when the greatest part within which our Saviour expressly had asserted that destruction was to come, was already past?"

* Phil. iv. 5. † 1 John ii. 16. 18.

Ans. Paul expressly says, his solicitude was to prevent the trouble of the Thessalonians on the imagination that the day of the Lord ἐνέστηκε, "was," or "had been instant," for which solicitude he had good reason; for, saith the note there, to conceive that signal day of the destruction of their enemies the Jews, and the deliverance of the Christians, mentioned Joel ii. 31, 32, Mal. iv. 1, 2, come; and find themselves deceived in that conception, might cause great troubles to them, and even shake the steadfastness of their faith." To which add,

Secondly, That the Judaizing Christians, who could hardly think of "wrath coming to the uttermost" on this once beloved people, might persuade the Thessalonians that the slaughter threatened to them was already executed, by the great desolation made of them in Egypt by Flaccus, in the time of Caius, of which Philo* speaks, and the great slaughter made of them at the same time in Mesopotamia, Babylon, Syria, and Seleucia, which, saith Josephus,† was ἀλλὰ πολλῷ; καὶ ὁπόσος οὐκ ἱστορούμεις πρότερον, "a greater destruction than ever was before recorded of them."

Arg. 2. "How absurd is it to interpret the παρουσία, or solemn 'coming of Christ,' in the former epistle, nay in this epistle, and in the first verse of this very chapter, of his coming to judgment at the last day, and yet in the eighth verse to interpret it of his coming to destroy the Jews only, especially when no example can be shown, that ever St. Paul uses that word in that acceptation?"

Ans. To this imputation of absurdity the answer is returned (note on ver. 1) in these words: "The coming of Christ is by the reverend Dr. Hammond referred to Christ's coming to destroy the unbelieving Jews; this is the παρουσία, 'coming of the Son of man,' so often mentioned in our Lord's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple, Matt. xxiv. 3. 27, Luke xvii. 24." This is most certainly the import of this phrase in St. James twice, when he exhorts the brethren to be "patient, ἕως τῆς παρουσίας τοῦ Κυρίου, till the coming of the Lord," adding, that this παρουσία, "coming, was at hand," v. 7, 8. And to his saying that I "interpret the first verse of the coming of our Lord to judgment," and therefore do absurdly interpret the eighth verse of his coming to destroy the wicked Jews, I have answered in the note on the eighth, by showing that the words there are taken from Isaiah, xi. 4, and that they necessarily refer to the smiting of the land of Judea, and therefore cannot be referred to Christ's coming to judge all men at the last day; to which I do not find that any good interpreter refers these words.

Arg. 3. "How comes the apostle to inform the Thessalonians, who were almost all gentiles, of the destruction of Jerusalem in Judea at a thousand miles' distance, which was of little more consequence to them than the destruction of any other church or city in a remote country?"

Ans. To the ignorance and mistake on which this argument is wholly founded, he hath had one answer in the note on ver. 1, in which words let it be noted, "That the church of the Thessalonians were partly converts of the Jews and proselytes; for the converts made by Paul preaching to them were of the Jews and the devout Greeks (Acts xvii. 4), who, in expectation of our Lord's prediction, and their 'redemption' by it 'drawing nigh' (Luke xxi. 28), might long for the execution of it."

Secondly, Had he mentioned the destruction of the wicked Jews, "by the spirit of Christ's mouth," as the apostle doth, there would have been no appearance of any strength in that argument, to which a farther answer is given (note on ver. 5), in these words: "Of the Jews, and their opposing themselves to the doctrine of Christianity, and the professors of it, the apostle had told them in his First Epistle, ii. 15, 16, and when he was with them, the persecutions that both he and they suffered from them (Acts xvii. 15, 16), gave him a just occasion to speak both of their opposition to the gospel, and of the deliverance they shortly might expect from such enraged persecutors, who not only fell severely on the converted Jews throughout all their dispersions, but, as Justin Martyr* assures us, stirred up the heathen governors in all places where Christians were, to do the like, and sent chosen men from Jerusalem for that very end." Nor was the slaughter of them in those "days of vengeance" confined to Judea, but, as I have fully proved from Josephus,† they suffered the like calamities in the remotest places from it. Though therefore the Thessalonians might be less concerned for the destruction of the city or temple of Jerusalem, they might be very much concerned that these men should be disabled from executing any more their rage upon them, or against the church of Christ.

Arg. 4. "Lastly, How comes the church of the Thessalonians to be in such a consternation and disturbance, ἐροεῖσθαι, at the supposal that Jerusalem should be destroyed, since therein none but the unbelieving Jews and the enemies of Christ were to perish?"

Ans. How came you to fall into this imagination? Their trouble, saith the text, being only this, that they conceived the apostle had spoken of the destruction of the wicked and persecuting Jews as instant, whereas by sad experience they found that they lay still as much as ever under such rage and cruel persecution of these men (1 Thess. ii. 15), that the apostle was afraid lest these temptations should have rendered his labour vain among them (iii. 5).

Secondly, The opinion having obtained among the Jews that the destruction of their temple, and the destruction of the old world, should be contemporary, this might be among the believing Jews a farther reason of their trouble. And this should be more considerable to him who earnestly contends that the apostles spake, in all their epistles, as men who believed the day of judgment might happen soon after the destruction of Jerusalem.

In the following words he attempts to answer an objection thus: "If it be still wondered at that St. Paul should here say that 'the mystery of iniquity doth already work:' I say it is not strange, that he that knew that the great man of sin was to corrupt and spoil the purity of the Christian religion, and turn the mystery of godliness into a mystery of iniquity, and who found already the beginnings of such mischiefs creeping into the church, and that in some of the same points which antichrist was to corrupt, looks upon such beginning of antichristianism as preludes and forerunners of that grand corruption to come afterward."

But this evasion is fully confuted, in the note on ver. 7, by this argument: "It is highly reasonable to conceive, that 'the mystery of iniquity' already working should be that very mystery which after was to be completed by the more full appearance of 'the man of sin,' as will be evident from the connexion of the words, 'Remember ye not, that when I was with you, I told you these things?' (viz. who was the man of sin to be revealed, what were the characters of him, and what it was that did at present hinder him from a full revelation of himself, ver. 3, 4;) for 'the mystery of iniquity is already working,' i. e. he is doing that covertly, which, when he is revealed, he will do more openly; only 'he that hinders (his full appearance) will do so till he be taken away, and then shall this wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord shall destroy with the spirit of his mouth;' whence it seems clear, that the man of sin, then covertly working his mystery, and only hindered from appearing openly by something that then letted, must be that man of sin, who after was to be revealed, and then destroyed 'by the spirit of Christ's mouth.' All those interpretations therefore must be false, which make the mystery of iniquity to be one person, or one kind of persons, and 'the man of sin,' or 'antichrist,' another, as they must do who make the mystery of iniquity to belong to Simon Magus, the false prophets, or heretics, in being when this epistle was indited, and the man of sin to be the pope and his clergy." In a word, dolosus versatur in generalibus; till Mr. Whiston can name some false prophets, or false apostles, or corrupters of the gospel, by turning it into a "mystery of iniquity," in being when this epistle was indited, who were not of Jewish extract, or appeared not then amongst them; and in what particulars of that pernicious influence they conspired with the present church of Rome (which neither yet hath been, nor I think can be done to satisfaction), it is evident he hath said nothing which hath the least appearance of an answer to the objection he himself hath started.

A PARALLEL

BETWIXT

The Jewish and the Papal Antichrist, in their apostasy from, and corruption of, the doctrine delivered to them.

Having given my conjecture, that the Jewish church, with their rulers, were the antichrist mentioned by Paul, I proceed to show how their apostasy, when they were thus deserted by God, resembled and ran parallel to the apostasy of the Roman church, when she began in like manner to apostatize from and to corrupt the Christian faith.

And here it cannot be expected that I should draw the parallel betwixt them, in those doctrines which never were nor could be owned by the unbelieving Jews, viz. in the doctrines of transubstantiation, the adoration of the host, the sacrifice of the mass, communion in one kind, and the number of the Christian sacraments; but yet in most of their other doctrines, it is very easy to discern it.

First, In the doctrine of infallibility, the mother of incorrigible errors.

For, First, As Roman catholics assert the infallibility of councils, which they are pleased to call general councils, and plead for a living and infallible judge of controversies; so the Jews looked upon the judgment of their great sanhedrin, and the concurring suffrage of their rulers and pharisees, as free from error, and not to be gainsaid by any of the people. Their way of arguing, John vii. 38, seems plainly to insinuate, that they thought themselves the only fit and proper judges of the true sense and meaning of the law; that the people were wholly to be guided by them; and that they who would not submit to their judgment were deceived, and would be accursed for their obstinacy in things in which they neither had, nor could have, any certain knowledge without their guidance and assistance; for thus they speak to those officers whom they had sent to apprehend our Saviour: "Are ye also deceived? Have any of the rulers, or of the pharisees, believed on him? But this people which knoweth not the law (and yet will take upon them to dissent from their judgment) are accursed;" which is the very language of the church of Rome in her anathemas. They were the supreme judges, and the keepers of oral traditions; and the fear that, when the sanhedrin was dissolved, these traditions might be lost, produced the Mishna, or the second law, commonly called by them, "the oral law," or the law given to Moses by word of mouth, as they gather from Exod. xxxiv. 27. They also took upon them to be authentic interpreters of the written law; and that by virtue of these traditions, given, say some of them, to this end. Now this, as the excellent Mr. Chillingworth* observes, is indeed to make men "apostates from God, and to dethrone him from his dominion over men's consciences, and to set up themselves;" and why else doth our Saviour charge these men with "making void the commandments of God," not in one only, but in many cases, "by their traditions,"† and in opposition to these teachers of traditions, as received from their forefathers, require them to "call no man father upon earth," because "one only was their Father" in that sense, in which the Jewish doctors claimed that title, even "their Father which was in heaven:" and that he had great reason to speak thus, we learn from the Jewish canon cited by Dr. Pocock,‡ vota cadere in res mandati, "that vows reach even to things commanded, or take place as well in things commanded by the law, as in things indifferent; and that a man may be so bound by them, as that he cannot, without great sin, do what God had by his law required to be done; so that if he made a vow which laid him upon a necessity to violate God's law, that he might observe it, the vow must stand, and the law be abrogated."

Secondly, The like infallibility they ascribe to the words of their rabbins, wise men, and scribes. Thus R. Isaac Abuhaf* saith, that "to all things which their rabbins have taught in their homilies, the same faith is to be given as to the law of Moses." In the Talmud† they say, that "all their words are the word of the living God;" and that‡ "the righteous nation that keepeth the truth (mentioned Isa. xxvi. 2), are they who receive all their wise men have said for undoubted truth, and say Amen to it:"§ and that when two of them differ in their opinions, neither of them is to be condemned, "for the words of them both are the words of the living God." That they are‖ "to attend more to the words of the scribes than to the words of the law; and that they are more amiable than the words of the prophets; the prophets being obliged to work a miracle, that they might be credited; whereas they were to be believed without a miracle, it being said (Deut. xvii. 10), Thou shalt observe to do according to all that they shall teach thee" (see of this more in Buxtorf's Recensio Operis Talmudici, from p. 221 to 228). Maimonides¶ saith, "If a thousand prophets, who were equal to Elias and Elisha, bring one interpretation; and a thousand and one wise men bring a contrary to it, they must incline to the most; and be obliged rather to act according to the sentence of their wise men, than that of the thousand prophets." In his explication of the thirteenth treatise of the sanhedrin, he distributes men who interpreted the sayings of their wise men into three ranks: first, those who thought their sayings were figurative and tropological; secondly, those who said their words were to be interpreted according to the letter, as thinking, sapientes in omnibus indubitatæ veritatis in dictis suis, "the wise men were of undoubted truth in all their sayings;" thirdly, those who allude the words of the wise men, judging themselves more wise, and saying, that†† "they were deceived;" these he pronounces fools, and accursed, for saying these things of those great men of whose wisdom they were well assured. Josephus‡‡ says, that "they who were of the sect of the pharisees, ἔπονται τῇ ἡγεμονίᾳ followed their guidance, and thought it necessary to observe and contend for every thing their guide commanded. The sadducees," saith he, "held it a virtue to contend πρὸς τοὺς διδασκάλους σοφίας, against the teachers of wisdom, but they yielded such honour, τοῖς ἡλικίας προήκουσι, to their ancestors, that they durst not be so bold as to gainsay any thing that they had introduced as fit to be observed." Here we have, in express words, the teachers, guides, and fathers mentioned by our Lord, Matt. xxiii. 8, 9, and all of them represented as persons whose doctrines none ought to doubt of, and whose sayings none should gainsay. This then was the authority the Jews of those times lodged in their fathers, teachers, rabbies, their scribes and pharisees, who "sat in Moses' chair," and gloried in the name of "Rabbi, Rabbi," Matt. xxiii. 7. And this usurped authority is the very thing our Saviour forbids, as prejudicial to his office, in these words, Matt. xxviii. 8, "Be not ye called Rabbi, for one is, ὑμῶν ὁ διδάσκαλος, your teacher, even Christ;" and ver. 10, "Be not ye called καθηγηταί, guides, for one is your guide, even Christ." And therefore it is observable, that though the apostles had an express commission from Christ to teach all nations all that he had commanded, and a promise, that in the execution of this office the Holy Spirit should "bring these things to their remembrance," and so were infallible revealers of the mind and the commandments of Christ, which the church of Rome neither doth nor can pretend to, without falling under Paul's anathema for preaching "another gospel;" yet none of them pretended or ever attempted to be interpreters of the words of Christ, or infallible judges of the true sense of what he had already taught or commanded; which is the thing the Romanists now challenge to themselves, and which the Jewish doctors did pretend to be, with respect to the mind of God, revealed in the scriptures of the Old Testament. And indeed this claim of the church of Rome to be the infallible judges, interpreters of the laws, doctrines, and commands of Christ, must give them power without control to alter any of the laws of Christ, and under pretence of interpreting to overthrow them, and so to dethrone Christ from his dominion over men's consciences, and instead of Christ, set up themselves: for he that requires that all his interpretations of the laws of Christ should be obeyed as the true mind of Christ, seem they to the understandings of many myriads never so dissonant or discordant from it, requires indeed that his interpretations should be received as Christ's laws, and that all men should obey rather what he, than what they think Christ hath taught them; and whosoever is firmly prepared in his mind to believe and obey all such interpretations without judging them, though to his own judgment they seem most unreasonable, whatsoever he may pretend, he makes both the law and the law-maker stales, and obeys only the interpreter; for seeing the true sense of the law is indeed the law, he must be to me the only giver of the law, who alone gives me the true sense of it. Thus, if any person should pretend he would submit to the laws of the king of England, but should resolve to obey them only in that sense, whatsoever it were, which the French king should put upon them, I presume every understanding man would say, that he obeyed only the French king, not the king of England.

§. 2. Secondly, Whereas the Trent council, in her fourth session, determines that "besides the written word contained in the canon of the New Testament, there were also oral traditions, concerning both faith and manners, received by the apostles from the mouth of Christ, or dictated to them by the Holy Spirit, and preserved in the church catholic by a continual succession, which therefore they received pari pietatis affectû, with the same pious affection as the holy scriptures of the New Testament:" in all this they plainly copied from the apostatizing Jewish church. For,

1. As the Romanists plead, that their traditions are of a divine original, as being derived partly from the mouth of Christ, partly from his inspired apostles; so do the Jews expressly teach, that their "oral law came from the mouth of God,"* and that "God delivered it to Moses on mount Sinai with the written law, and that he received it by divine revelation."†

2. As the Romanists say, that their unwritten traditions were preserved, and handed down to this present age, by the "catholic church in a continual succession;" so the Jews say their traditions were "deposited with the whole congregation, the great sanhedrin, and the high-priest;" and give us the very names of the eminent persons through whose hands their traditions came down to their days (Voisin, Proem. Pug. Fid. à p. 10 ad p. 16).

3. As the Romanists affirm,‡ that the scriptures are imperfect and obscure without their traditions, and consequently make their traditions necessary to the expounding of the scriptures; so also do the Jews say, that the§ "oral law is the foundation of the written law," and that "they cannot come to the knowledge of the scriptures, unless they insist on the words of their wise men of blessed memory; that the written law cannot be expounded without the oral; that they cannot be established upon the written law without the oral, which is the explication of it; that it is rather the oral than the written law, which is the foundation of all their religion, there being no demonstration to be taken from the written law, because tradition explains the secret of it" (Cod. Jur. Chagiga, t. x. 1).

4. As the Trent council declares concerning the unwritten traditions, "that they are to be received and reverenced with the same pious affection as the holy scriptures;" so must the Jews do in consequence of that opinion, which makes them both to proceed immediately from the same divine authority, and both derived to them by the same means; for, say they, "As we have received the written word, so have we received the oral law, מן האבות, from the fathers:" hence, like good Roman catholics, they are "more exceedingly zealous for the traditions of their fathers," than for the law itself, Gal. i. 14: they accuse all that walk not according to the customs of their fathers, as persons who forsook the law of Moses, Acts xxi. 21; and it was esteemed a great crime to do any thing against the custom of their fathers, or the traditions of the elders, Matt. xv. 2, Acts xxviii. 17.

5. As the Jews call them קראים "scripturists," and מינים, "heretics," who reject their oral traditions; so do the Romanists style us heretics and scriptuarii for rejecting their supposed apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions (Prateolus Elencho, lib. xvii. cap. 16). And as the קראים were, saith Manasseh ben Israel,* exclusi communione Israelitarum, "excluded from the communion of Israel;" so do the Romanists exclude us from their communion upon the same account.

§. 3. Thirdly, As the church of Rome† hath received many apocryphal books as canonical scripture, pronouncing an anathema on all who deny them so to be; so did her apostatizing sister also receive many such books, as of equal strength and authority with the scripture. As,

1. The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan; for their Talmudical doctors declare, that Jonathan received his Targum, or exposition of the prophets, from the mouth of Haggai, Zachary, and Malachi, three prophets, and keepers of the oral traditions belonging to the consistory of Ezra; and so they make them equal to the writings of these three prophets. Moreover, they say, that "if any other person, interpreting any verse of scripture in the Chaldaic tongue, add any thing to it, he blasphemes; because he may do this contrary to the mind of the author:" but then they add, that Onkelos and Jonathan "did not offend in any of their additions, because they did this always according to the mind of the author" (so Buxtorf, in voce targum). Hence Raymundus‡ saith, that this translation of Onkelos, tantam inter Judæos autoritatem obtinet, "is of so great authority among the Jews, that none of them dares presume to contradict it."

And Paulus Burgensis§ saith, that the Chaldaic translation among them tantæ autoritatis est sicut textus, "is of equal authority with the text" (see N. Lyranus, in Isa. cap. viii.). Such

2. Is their Mishna, or fardle of traditions, collected by R. Jehudah Hakkadosh "the Holy," or R. Jehudah Hannisi "the Prince," anno Christi 150; which, saith Buxtorf,‖ is publicly received by all the Jews, both in the Holy Land and in Babylon, as an authentic body of their law: hence, as we have shown before, they call it a "secondary law received from the mouth of God," and prefer it much before the written law, comparing the text only to water,¶ but these traditions to wine: and the school of Elias used to say, "that whosoever learned the traditions of the Mishna might be assured he should have eternal life."

3. The Talmud, which contains the explications of their doctors upon the Mishna, is of such veneration among them that they place the Talmud, or Gemara, which by way of eminence they call the Talmud, "among the books given by tradition from the mouth of God" (see Cartwright's Mellif. lib. iv. cap. 5, p. 30, 70; saying that "nothing is superior to the most holy Talmud; and that by reading in the scriptures they can get little profit; more by reading in the Mishna, but by reading in the Talmud most of all:" with many other things of a like nature, collected by Buxtorf, Synag. Jud. cap. 3, Recensio Operis Talmudici, p. 225, 226, et Lex. Talmud. in voce talmud, p. 2475.

§. 4. Fourthly, As the church of Rome pretends to be the catholic church, out of whose communion there is no salvation, requiring all men to own her faith, and to "receive her mark," Rev. xiii. 16; so also did the apostatizing church of the Jews: for when the gospel was first preached, they thought that the salvation promised by it belonged to them alone, and therefore "forbade" the apostles "to preach to the gentiles that they might be saved" (1 Thess. ii. 16). They also earnestly contended, that unless they who believed in Jesus would be circumcised and "keep the law" and so receive the mark of, and became proselytes to, their religion, "they could not be saved" (Acts xv. 1. 24). Even those Christians who were dispersed into other parts by the persecution of their fellow Jews, preached the word only to the Jews of their own language (Acts xi. 19), and to the Hellenistic Jews (ver. 20); and the rest of them thought it a great sin in Peter to "go in to the uncircumcised and converse with them," though this was only done to convert them to the Christian faith (Acts xi. 3), and it was matter of great admiration to them, that God should "grant repentance to salvation to the gentiles" (ver. 18). So deeply was this Jewish principle then rooted even in the first converts of that nation to the Christian faith.

§. 5. Fifthly, As the church of Rome hath introduced the religious worship of saints and angels; so also did the apostatizing church of the Jews: for they had imbibed the philosophy of the Platonists, who taught,* "that demons were of a middle nature betwixt gods and mortals; that they brought our prayers and offerings to the gods, and their commands to us, and that it was very fit, εὐχαῖς τιμᾶν, to honour them with our prayers upon these accounts:" and that "God had no immediate commerce with men, but all his converse with them was by the mediation of those demons." And suitably to his philosophy we find the angel saying, Tobit xii. 12. 15, that he was one of the seven angels, οἱ προσφέρουσι τὰς προσευχὰς τῶν ἁγίων, who offered up the prayers of the saints, and that when Tobit and Sarah prayed, he "brought the memorial of their prayers before the Holy One." And Philo in several places declares, that as the philosophers said of their demons and heroes, so Moses "introduces the angels as messengers of good things from God to his subjects, and carrying back their needs, not that God needs their ministry, but that it is very needful and beneficial for us frail men to have such mediators" (see the full proof of this in the note on Col. ii. 18). Accordingly Theodoret on that place saith, "They who were zealous for the law persuaded men, τοὺς ἀγγέλους σέβειν, to worship angels because the law, say they, was given by them. And this they persuaded men to do out of humility, saying, that the God of all things was invisible, and inaccessible, and incomprehensible, and that it was fit we should procure the divine favour by the means of the angels." Hence Clemens Alexandrinus† brings in Peter forbidding Christians "to worship God as the Jews did, because, pretending that they only knew God, they indeed did not know him, as worshipping angels and archangels."

In their office for the dead, saith Voisin,‡ "they pray thus, Ye fathers of the world, who sleep in Hebron, open to him the gates of the garden of Eden, and say, Let him come in peace." And again, "Ye angels of peace, come forth to meet him, and unlock for him the gates of the garden of Eden, and say, Let him come in peace" (Theolog. Judaic. lib. i. cap. 1, p. 80, 81).

§. 6. Sixthly, As the church of Rome gives an inferior kind of veneration to images, and by some nice distinctions eludes the prohibition of the second commandment; so do the apostate Jews, by the same arts, declaring "that he who worships an idol, taking it for God, is guilty, but if not, he is free;" and the gloss there adds, "that if he adore God in it, it is no crime, for his heart is towards God." And again, "If a Jew see a statue, such as useth to be set up for a king, if he adore it not under the notion of an idol, but in honour to the king, it is nothing." And this corrupt notion prevailed upon the Corinthians to eat freely "in the idol's temple" of their sacrifices, as thinking they did not offend, because they did not own the idol to be God (see for this Dr. Lightfoot on 1 Cor. viii. 10).

§. 7. Seventhly, The apostatizing Jews do so plainly symbolize with the Romanists in the doctrine of purgatory and prayers for the dead, that Bellarmine confirms those doctrines from the practice of the Jews recorded in the book of Maccabees, lib. ii. cap. xii. 39. 46, from Tobit iv. 18, and from their other writings, Bellarm. de Purgatorio, lib. ii. cap. 3. §. Hinc etiam, §. Secundus, et cap. 11, §. Tertia ratio.

And indeed the parallel is very clear, for as the papists pray for the souls of the dead, that they may be delivered from the pains of purgatory, and go thence to heaven; so do the Jews in their liturgy pray "for the souls of their friends, and kindred, grandfathers, and grandmothers, that they may be admitted to the rest of the righteous in the garden of Eden" (see Dr. Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 1017, 1018). As the papists say, those souls they pray for go to purgatory, "in order to their purgation from some defilements they have contracted in this world, and afterward to heaven;" so the Jews say, that anima gehennæ igne purgatur, ut pura evadat et candida, "the soul is purged with hell-fire, that it might be made pure and white, and then put into the hands of the angel Michael, who offers up the souls of the just" (Voisin, Theolog. Jud. lib. i. cap. 1, p. 78). As the papists give so much money to have so many masses said for the deliverance of souls out of purgatory; so the Jews vow "to give alms, that they may be conveyed into the garden of Eden;" and the priest pronounces a blessing upon him "who hath vowed so many alms for the souls of the dead" (see these prayers and benedictions in Lightf. ibid.). And in relation to this opinion, the son of Sirach seems to say, vii. 33, "A gift hath grace in the sight of every man living, and for the dead detain it not."

§. 8. Eighthly, As the papists hope to be helped, both living and dead, by the merits of the saints, and especially by the martyrs; so the Jews pray, that God would show kindness to them, "for the sake of all those who are slain and massacred for his sake, and went through fire and water, for the hallowing of his name" (Lightf. ibid.). They thought, in the time of the Maccabees, that the death of their good men, or martyrs, might be an expiation for their sin. This being among them a received rule, that σπουδαῖος τοῦ φαύλου λύτρον, "the good man is the redemption of the wicked;"* and hence Josephus† brings in Eleazar praying thus to God, "Be thou gracious to thy nation, being satisfied with the punishment I suffer for them; make my blood an expiation for them, καὶ ἀντὶ ψυχῶν αὐτῶν λάβε τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχήν, and accept my life instead of theirs." Hence have we frequent mention of merita patrum, "the merits of the fathers," in their books, and of the merits of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; from which they did expect great things, even deliverance from hell, saying, that "hell-fire hath no power over the sinners of Israel; because Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob descend thither to fetch them thence." THE

FIRST EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

That this epistle was written after Paul's departure from Ephesus to Macedonia, some gather from these words, "When I went into Macedonia, I besought thee to abide at Ephesus," i. 3. And that it was written when he was in expectation of returning shortly thither, they conclude from these words; "I write to thee, hoping to come unto thee quickly," iii. 14. It therefore, say they, must be writ before he came to Melitus, Acts xx. 17. For then he, sending for the bishops of Ephesus thither, speaks thus to them: "And now I know, that all you, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more," ver. 25. For then he must have laid aside all thoughts of returning any more to Ephesus. It therefore must, say they, be written while he was in Macedonia, or thereabouts; and so, A. D. 55, and the first of Nero. So Dr. Lightfoot.

Bishop Pearson grants, that it was written after Paul was gone into Macedonia; but then he adds, that it was writ after his enlargement from his bonds at Rome, A. D. 65. That it could not be writ at any time of Paul's going to Macedonia, before his journey to Jerusalem, he proves, because before that time Paul could not have exhorted him to "abide at Ephesus;" for the first time he went to Macedonia, by the direction of the Holy Ghost, Acts xvi. 9, 10, he had not seen Ephesus, for he came not thither till a long time after, Acts xix. 1. The second time he came to Macedonia was after the tumult which forced him to leave Ephesus, Acts xx. 1, when he could not exhort him to abide at Ephesus, for he had sent him thence to Macedonia at that very time when that tumult began, Acts xix. 22, 23. This argument, I confess, is not very strong; it being plain, from his First Epistle writ to Corinth, while he was at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xvi. 8. 10, 11, that he expected then his return to him: but then it appears, that Timothy was with him when he went first from Macedonia to Achaia, and at Corinth writ his Epistle to the Romans, xvi. 21; and also when he returned from Achaia to Macedonia, for then he accompanied him from Achaia to Macedonia, and so to Asia, and so he abode not then at Ephesus, Acts xx. 4. Now from thence Paul goes to Jerusalem, and from thence bound to Rome, and so he could not after go to Macedonia till he was set at liberty. This therefore, saith he, was done afterward, in the tenth year of Nero, A. D. 65, and soon after he writ this epistle to him.

And whereas against this it is objected, that in this epistle he speaks twice of his coming to Ephesus, saying, "I write unto thee, hoping to come to thee shortly," iii. 14, and "Till I come, give thy diligence to reading," iv. 13, whereas before his going up to Jerusalem he had expressly said to them of Ephesus, "I know that all you shall see my face no more;" whence it is gathered, that this epistle must be writ before that time.

To this I answer, that Paul saith plainly in this epistle, that he proposed to come to him; but he saith not, that he purposed to come to him to Ephesus. If you reply, that in this epistle he commands him to stay at Ephesus, and so must be supposed to speak of coming thither to him, i. 3: this, I confess, is true, according to our version, which adds unto the words, "so do:" but if you read the words thus, "As I exhorted thee to abide (some time) at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia, (so I did it) that thou mightest admonish some to teach no other doctrine;" it will be left uncertain, whether he were at Ephesus at the inditing this epistle; for then, having done the work for which he was bid to stay at Ephesus, he might go on to other places, doing the work of an evangelist, and settling ordinary church-governors, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, where they were wanting, and doing all the other things mentioned in this epistle, as things to be performed in the church of God. For,

First, It is certain, that when the Second Epistle was writ to Timothy, he was not at Ephesus, as I have there proved, note on iv. 12. He therefore might have been gone thence also at the writing of this epistle, to settle the affairs of other churches.

Secondly, It is certain, that this First Epistle was writ to him, that, in Paul's absence he might know "how to deport himself in the church of God," especially in reference to the prescriptions here laid down, iii. 15. Now there was little need that he should stay there, to do the great work prescribed in this epistle, touching bishops and deacons, they being settled among them by Paul himself before he left Ephesus; and they being after, in his journey to Jerusalem, summoned to Miletus, and taught how to demean themselves in the respective provinces committed to their trust; it is therefore highly probable, that these directions were given him, in reference to other churches to which this evangelist was to travel, and in some of which he might then be. If this conjecture may take place, the difficulty is fully answered; if not, I must confess myself unable to return any satisfactory answer to it, and so leave the reader to his choice, whether he will follow the opinion of Dr. Lightfoot or Bishop Pearson, in this matter.

But though there be a great difference as to the time of writing this epistle, the ancient commentators all agree in this, "That St. Timothy* was left at Ephesus, to preserve that church from the endeavours of the Judaizing Christians to introduce circumcision, and the observance of the law, and to amuse them with their Talmudical fables, and with their genealogies from Abraham and the patriarchs." A reverend person saith, "It is evident, the Gnostics were now scattered in Asia, and so characterized by the apostle, ch. iv. and vi., and there distinctly specified, under the title of ψευδώνυμος γνῶσις, 'science falsely so called,' ver. 20, they being the men who assumed to themselves the names of 'Gnostics,' or knowing men." And it must be confessed, that Theodoret† accords with him in this matter, saying, "That the apostle styles the pretended knowledge of the Gnostics, 'science falsely so called.'" And Chrysostom* saith, "Perhaps this was spoken by reason of some who were then called Gnostics." And Theophylact† says, "I think the apostle speaks this concerning some then called Gnostics." But yet there lies this strong objection against this exposition of this phrase, or the ascribing of it to the Gnostics, that, according to all the accounts we receive from the ancients, these Gnostics were not then in being, at least under that name; for whether, with Irenæus, we derive their original from Valentinus,‡ or Carpocrates; or, with Clemens Alexandrinus, from Epiphanes the author of the sect of the Carpocratians; or, as Jerome saith, from Basilides;§ it is evident, and confessed by all these authors, that all these, and even Menander, whom Irenæus sometimes makes the father of the Gnostics, were long after the writing of this epistle. Whereas the Judaizing Christians were, saith Theodoret, μέγα φρονοῦντες ἐπὶ τῇ γνώσει, "great boasters of their knowledge of the law;" and yet, that their pretended knowledge was false knowledge, we learn from those words of the apostle, that these teachers of the law, "knew not what they said, or whereof they affirmed," 1 Tim. i. 7. Hence is their doctrine styled ματαιολογία, "vain-talking," ver. 6, and here κενοφωνία, "empty babbling;" as also, 2 Tim. ii. 16, ἄ ποια, "foolishness." 2 Tim. iii. 9, and they are said to be ματαιολογοί, "vain-talkers," Tit. i. 10, "men puffed up, and knowing nothing, but doting about questions, and strife of words," 1 Tim. vi. 4 (see the note on vi. 20). So that I can see no objection against that opinion which refers this phrase to those Judaizers whom the apostle elsewhere styleth "false apostles and deceitful workers."

CHAPTER I.

1 PAUL, an [1] apostle of Jesus Christ by the [2] commandment (κατ' ἐπιταγήν, according to the appointment) of God our Saviour (who called me to this office by his grace, Gal. i. 15), and (by the appointment of the) Lord Jesus Christ, which is our hope (of glory, Col. i. 27);

2 Unto Timothy, [3] my own son in the faith: (do I wish) grace, mercy, and peace, from God our Father and (from) Jesus Christ our Lord.

3 (Declaring, that) As I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia (so I did it to this end), that thou mightest charge some (Judaizers there) that they teach no other doctrine (than that which is according to godliness, vi. 2),

4 Neither give heed (or incline) to (Jewish) fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions (or disquisitions into pedigrees), [4] rather than godly edifying which is in faith: so do.

5 Now (for) the [5] end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned:

6 From which (commandment) some having swerved have turned aside unto vain jangling (vain discourses of Talmudical fables and endless genealogies);

7 [6] Desiring to be teachers of the law; (and yet) understanding neither what they say (of it), nor whereof they affirm (i. e. neither the sense, scope, or true meaning of that law of which they speak, nor having any

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἀπόστολος, An apostle, &c.] Thus he writes to Timothy and Titus, not to assert his apostolical authority to them who doubted not of it, but for their sakes over whom they were to preside, that they might not despise what they did and enjoined by so great authority.

[2] Κατ' ἐπιταγὴν Θεοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν καὶ Κυρίου, &c.] Some construe these words thus, "According to the commandment of Jesus Christ, who is God our Saviour;" but the words τῆς ἐλπίδος ἡμῶν, "our hope," must be construed with the words "Jesus Christ:" and this sufficiently confutes that version, which, as none of the ancients followed, so it is not supported by the word "Saviour" added to "God," that epithet being twice applied to God the Father in this epistle, viz. ii. 3, iv. 10, and twice in the Epistle to Titus, viz. i. 3, ii. 10. Moreover, some ancient copies read τοῦ πατρὸς, "of God our Father."

[3] Ver. 2. Γνησίῳ τέκνῳ ἐν πίστει, My own son in the faith.] This phrase compared with 1 Cor. iv. 14, 15, seems plainly to import, that Timothy was converted to the Christian faith by Paul; as also he seems to intimate when he saith, he "served with him in the gospel, as a son with the father," Phil. ii. 22; and again calls him his "beloved Son," 2 Tim. i. 2. Nor find I any thing in scripture to the contrary; for though it is said that he had learned the scriptures of the Old Testament from his youth, 2 Tim. iii. 15; yet is that true also of Paul, when yet he was no convert to the Christian faith, but a zealous persecutor of it. And though he was a disciple when Paul circumcised him, and took him with him from Lystra (Acts xvi. 1), that hinders not but that he might be made so by Paul himself.

[4] Ver. 4. Μᾶλλον ἢ οἰκονομίαν Θεοῦ τὴν ἐν πίστει, Rather than godly edifying, which is in faith.] Here first the grammarians note, that comparative particles, and especially this of μᾶλλον, "rather," are often in sense negative, as Luke xviii. 14, "He went to his house justified, ἢ ἐκεῖνος, rather than the other:" i. e. the publican, and not the pharisee; 1 Pet. iii. 17, "It is better to suffer for well-doing, than for evil-doing;" John iii. 19, "Men loved μᾶλλον τὸ σκότος ἢ φῶς, darkness rather than light;" 2 Tim. iii. 4, φιλήδονοι μᾶλλον ἢ φιλόθεοι, i. e. "lovers of pleasure, and not of God" (see John xii. 43, Heb. xi. 25). The edification in the faith here mentioned, is styled the edification of God, because it hath God for its object and its end, as tending to the true knowledge and right worship of God; it is efficiently from him (on which account justification by faith is styled "the righteousness of God"), and tendeth highly to his glory.

[5] Ver. 5. Τὸ τέλος τῆς παραγγελίας, The scope of the commandment.] This some refer to the law, which, saith the apostle, "is fulfilled by love," Rom. xiii. 10; but ἀγγελία, 1 John iii. 11, παραγγελία, 1 Thess. iv. 2, and ver. 18 of this chapter, and ἐπαγγελία, being in the epistles always used of the gospel, and the latter word spoken of it in opposition to the law, which saith the apostle was not ἐξ ἐπαγγελίας, "of promise" (Rom. iv. 13, Gal. iii. 18), I rather think it here refers unto the gospel, or to that dispensation, in which nothing availeth but faith working by love (Gal. v. 6), and which requires fervent and unfeigned love out of a pure heart, from all that do obey the truth (1 Pet. i. 22).

[6] Ver. 7. Θέλοντες εἶναι νομοδιδάσκαλοι, Desiring to be teachers of the law.] That those persons were not Gnostics, but ἐξ Ἰουδαίων, "the Jews," is manifest, say the Greek commentators, from these words: for the Gnostics were the greatest adversaries of the law and the prophets; and even rejecters of that God who gave the one and inspired the other. Simon Magus taught, that the prophets* "received their certainty of the traditions of which they talk so confidently).

* Prophetas autem à mundi fabricatoribus angelis inspiratos, dixisse prophetias; quapropter nec ulteriùs curarent eos

8 But (though they are thus ignorant) we know that the law (in itself) is good, [7] if a man use it lawfully; (not as a means of justification, but as a restraint from sin, Gal. iii. 19, and as a schoolmaster to bring him to Christ, the end of the law, Gal. iii. 24, Rom. x. 4;)

9 Knowing this, that [8] the law is not made for a righteous man (to condemn, or work wrath to him, Rom. iv. 15, as failing in the strict observance of it), but for (restraining and condemning) [9] the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers,

10 For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine;

11 (That is the doctrine which is) According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust.

12 And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me (by the assistance of the Spirit and power of wisdom, who of myself was insufficient for this work, 2 Cor. iii. 5, 6), [10] for that he counted me (one that would be) faithful (in the discharge of it), putting me (therefore) into the ministry;

13 (Me, I say,) Who was before (this gracious call) a blasphemer (of Christ, Acts xxvi. 11), and a persecutor (of his servants, Acts viii. 3), and injurious (to prophecies only from angels," and that therefore "they that believed in him, and his Selene, should not regard them;" Saturninus, that "Christ came to destroy the God of the Jews;"* which God Simon himself denied, saith the Pseud-Ignatius.† They taught men "not to use the law and the prophets,"‡ nor to fear their threats. Now they who held and taught these things must be the greatest adversaries to, and not the teachers of, the law.

Hence it follows, first, that the fables and the genealogies, mentioned ver. 4, and the vain janglings, ver. 6, cannot relate to the æons of the Gnostics, which seem not then to be hatched; but that the apostle rather here respects, as Theodoret observes, τὴν Ἰουδαϊκὴν ἑρμηνείαν τὴν ὑπ' αὐτῶν καλουμένην δευτέρωσιν, "the vain traditions, or Talmudical fables, of the Jews," as the apostle explains himself, when he instructs Titus to teach the Cretans, μὴ προσέχειν Ἰουδαϊκοῖς μύθοις, "not to give heed to the Jewish fables of men," who turn from the truth (i. 14), especially those traditions and fables they had received of a Messiah ben Joseph that was to suffer, and a Messiah ben David that was to triumph gloriously and abide for ever (John xii. 34), if that distinction was so ancient; and of the golden days they were to have at the coming of this Messiah, of which Trypho in his dialogue with Justin speaks, p. 249, B, saying, that their prophets taught them, ἔνδοξον καὶ μέγαν ἀναμένειν—παραλαμβάνοντα τὴν αἰώνιον βασιλείαν, "to expect a great and glorious Messiah, who should have an endless kingdom;" and, p. 306, 307, of the halcyon days they should enjoy in Jerusalem, rebuilt at his coming. The endless genealogies are, say the fathers, γενεαλογίας τὰς ἐξ Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Δαβίδ, "their genealogies from Abraham and David," which they were concerned for, that they might know they came from the promised seed, or their title to the privileges belonging to the children of Abraham; or that they might have the preference: for those of the tribe of Judah and of the family of David were held more honourable than those of other tribes (see Campeg. Vitringa, de Syn. Vet. lib. iii. cap. 71, p. 871). They were, saith Dr. Lightfoot, the long and intricate pedigrees they stood upon to prove themselves priests and Levites; for, as Josephus§ notes, they thought themselves obliged to be very exact in that affair, and therefore "had genealogies of them preserved two thousand years." To these we may add the genealogy and pedigree of their traditions, which they derived from Joshua in a long line of succession to their times. That they were genealogies belonging to the Jews, we learn from Tit. iii. 9, where they are joined with "strifes about the law."

[7] Ver. 8. Ἐάν τις αὐτῷ νομίμως χρῆται, If a man use it lawfully,] That is, saith Theodoret, ἐάν τις ἀκολουθῇ αὐτοῦ τῷ σκόπῳ, "if he complieth with the scope of it, which is to bring him to Christ."

[8] Ver. 9. Δικαίῳ νόμος οὐ κεῖται.] i. e. "The law was not made to condemn the just man; for against such there is no law" condemning them (Gal. v. 23), ἀντίκειται δὲ, but "it lies against the lawless," to condemn them.

[9] Ἀνόμοις, &c.] From this enumeration of offenders against the law, we learn that the apostle is here speaking of the moral law contained in the ten commandments; for the sins here mentioned respect them; "the ungodly" being sinners against the first commandment; the ἁμαρτωλοὶ, "sinners" (as that word signifies the idolatrous gentiles, Gal. ii. 15) the transgressors of the second, the perjured persons of the third, the unholy and profane of the fourth, the murderers of fathers and mothers of the fifth, the manslayers of the sixth, the fornicators and defilers of themselves with mankind of the seventh, menstealers of the eighth, liars of the ninth; as also from the following words, "If there be any other thing contrary to the sound doctrine of the gospel." Note, Thirdly, That fornication is here reckoned among sins committed against the law of nature, or the moral law; as it is also Rom. i. 29, and among the manifest "works of the flesh" (Gal. v. 19), yea, among the things "for which the wrath of God comes upon the children of disobedience," or unbelief, that is, the heathens (Eph. v. 5, 6), for which men are to be excluded from the kingdom of God (1 Cor. vi. 10, Rev. xxii. 15), and to be cast into "the lake of fire and brimstone" (Rev. xxi. 8); whence it is to be wondered that this sin should be so generally committed by some, and pleaded for by others, who are called Christians.

[10] Ver. 12. Ὅτι πιστόν με ἡγήσατο, He accounted me faithful.] Paul was "a vessel of election" to bear Christ's name before the gentiles (Acts ix. 15); in order thereunto he was by him to be filled with the Holy Ghost (ver. 17), and so enabled to perform this work with "the power of signs and wonders, and of the Spirit of God" (Rom. xv. 19). Christ also appeared to him for this very end, προχειρίζεσθαι, "to constitute him first," and set him apart, as it were, by laying hands upon him, to make him a minister and witness of what he had seen and heard (Acts xxvi. 16, xxii. 14, 15), and accordingly he sent him to the gentiles (Acts xxvi. 17), and thus he put him into the ministry. Christ did this because "he accounted him one that would be faithful" in the discharge of his duty (1 Cor. iv. 2, vii. 25); i. e. such a one who, by the consideration of so great a mercy and abundant grace, vouchsafed to one so unworthy, would patiently suffer for (Acts ix. 16), and labour more abundantly in propagation of the gospel, when thus assisted by the grace and Spirit of Christ (1 Cor. xv. 10). Whence it is observed by the fathers here, that* "there was not only something of God, but also something of himself, for which he was chosen to this ministry; and that he so magnifies the grace of God, as not to invalidate man's free-will."

16 Howbeit for this cause (even) I (the chief of sinners) obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might shew forth all longsuffering, for a pattern (of it) to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting.

17 Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

18 This charge (of remaining some time at Ephesus, for the benefit of the churches there, ver. 3) I commit unto thee, son Timothy, [15] according to the prophecies which went before on thee, that thou (encouraged and excited) by them [16] mightest war a good warfare; (even that of faith, vi. 12, fighting and suffering as a good soldier of Jesus Christ, 2 Tim. ii. 3;)

19 Holding faith, and a good conscience; which (last) some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck:

20 Of whom is Hymenæus (2 Tim. ii. 17) and Alexander (2 Tim. iv. 14); [17] whom I have delivered unto Satan (for the destruction of the flesh, 1 Cor. v. 5), that they (by what they suffer) may learn not to blaspheme (or speak evil of the faith).

[11] Ver. 13. Ὅτι ἀγνοῶν ἐποίησα ἐν ἀπιστίᾳ, I did it ignorantly.] Being an unbeliever, as he might be by reason of those many prejudices the learned Jews and zealous assertors of their traditions laboured under. For to this Peter doth ascribe their crucifixion of our Lord, saying, "I know you did it, κατ' ἄγνοιαν, through ignorance" (Acts iii. 17), and Paul saying they did it, τοῦτον ἀγνοήσαντες, "not knowing him (Acts xiii. 27, 1 Cor. ii. 8), and Christ himself, when he prays thus, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do" (Luke xxiii. 34), giving the same reason of his prayer for their forgiveness, as Paul here doth of his own actual forgiveness; so that it is needless to endeavour, as some do, to wrest these words to another sense.

[12] Ver. 14. Μετὰ πίστεως καὶ ἀγάπης, Through faith and love.] Love constraining him to labour more abundantly (2 Cor. v. 14), and his strong faith enabling him to do it in the power of "signs and wonders, and of the Holy Ghost" (Rom. xv. 29).

Μετὰ πίστεως, With faith.] Or, per fidem, "through faith," or by faith: so Paul and Barnabas declared what things God had done, μετ' αὐτῶν, "by them," Acts xiv. 27, xv. 4, which is, ver. 12, δι' αὐτῶν.

[13] Ver. 15. Ἁμαρτωλοὺς σῶσαι, To save sinners.] Hence divines have well observed, that if man had not sinned Christ had not come into the world.

[14] Εἰμὶ ἐγώ, I am.] He saith not, "I was," but "I am;" because even when sin is pardoned, we ought to have the prospect of it still before our eyes, to keep us humble and sensible of the grace of God to us.

Ver. 17. Μόνῳ σοφῷ Θεῷ.] Dr. Mills seems very averse from the word σοφῷ, admitting it neither here nor Jude 25; but see it defended in both places, Examen Millii in locum.

[15] Ver. 18. Κατὰ τὰς προαγούσας ἐπὶ σὲ προφητείας, According to the foregoing prophecies concerning thee.] So iv. 14, "Neglect not, τὸ χάρισμα, the gift of the Holy Ghost which was given thee, διὰ προφητείας, according to the prophecy." I have shown (note on 1 Cor. xii. 10) that among the gifts of prophecy and discerning of spirits, this was one, to foretell and choose out persons meet to do God service in the ministry. Hence Paul charges the bishops of Ephesus to feed the flock, "over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers," or bishops, Acts xx. 28. And Clemens Romanus saith, the apostles "chose bishops and deacons, with full assurance of the Holy Ghost, πράγνωσιν εἰληφότες τελείαν (Ep. ad Cor. §. 42, 44), having a perfect knowledge of them, and making trial of them by the Spirit." So was it in the case of Timothy, say all the Greek scholiasts on the place. Chrysostom* saith, he was "chosen by prophecy, that is, by the Spirit of God;" Theodoret,† that "he received imposition of hands, not by man's calling, but by divine revelation;" Œcumenius,‡ that "by the revelation of the Spirit, he was both chosen by Paul to be a disciple, and was circumcised, and ordained a bishop;" and Theophylact affirms the same. Being thus designed and notified by the spirit of prophecy, they were, by prayer and imposition of hands, consecrated to their office. Thus, when the Spirit in the prophets had said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work of the ministry to which I have called them" (Acts xiii. 2—4), "they prayed, and laid their hands upon them, and sent them away;" and they are said to be "sent forth by the Holy Ghost." And with this imposition of hands they, who had them not before, received χαρίσματα, gifts answerable to their calling. Thus Paul charges Timothy to stir up χάρισμα Θεοῦ, "the gift of God that was in him, by the laying on of his hands," 2 Tim. i. 6. And Irenæus saith, lib. iv. cap. 33, that "the bishops who succeeded the apostles, with their succession into their bishoprics, received a certain χάρισμα of truth, according to the good pleasure of the Father" (see note on 1 Cor. ii. 16, xii. 10). Vain therefore are they who, pretending to an internal call of the Spirit, which they cannot prove to others, think imposition of hands, and consecration to the work of the ministry, unnecessary to the performance of the ministerial office.

[16] Ἵνα στρατεύῃ τὴν καλὴν στρατείαν, That thou mayest war a good warfare.] i. e. Perform the office of an evangelist well (2 Tim. iv. 5), so as to be "a good minister of Jesus Christ" (1 Tim. iv. 6). Thus in the Old Testament, the Levite that entered upon the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, is, in the Hebrew, one that enters "into the host," Numb. iv. 3. 23. 30. 35. 39. 43, viii. 24, and goes צבא צבא, "to war the warfare," i. e. "to serve the service," saith the Chaldee; and so the following words explain it: and to be superannuated, and so to cease from the work, is to "return from the warfare," viii. 25. Thus also in the New Testament, the Christian minister is "a soldier of Jesus Christ," 2 Tim. ii. 3, στρατευόμενος, "a warrior," ver. 4. He hath "the weapons of his warfare," 2 Cor. x. 4; and ought to have his wages, because "no man goeth to warfare at his own charge," 1 Cor. ix. 7.

[17] Ver. 20. Οὓς παρέδωκα τῷ Σατανᾷ, Whom I have delivered to Satan.] I have shown (note on 1 Cor. v. 5), that the ancients say, this phrase signified that some disease was to be inflicted on them by Satan. Thus Theodoret, Chrysostom, and Œcumenius, here say of these men,* that, "being separated from the church, they were cruelly chastised by the adversary, falling into diseases and grievous afflictions, and other damages and calamities;" and this, in the forementioned place, is argued, from the ends of this delivery to Satan, viz. "for the destruction of the flesh; that they might learn not to blaspheme" that doctrine which could so severely punish them that did so. Note also, that Hymenæus and Alexander "made shipwreck of the faith," not by renouncing Christianity, for "what have I to do," saith the apostle,

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Δεήσεις προσευχὰς ἐντεύξεις, Supplications, prayers, intercessions.] Δεήσεις are deprecations for the pardon of sin, and the averting divine judgments: προσευχὰς, prayers for the obtaining of all spiritual and temporal blessings; and in this we have the suffrage of the Greek scholiasts and lexicographers: but as for the word ἐντεύξεις, they almost unanimously say it is a complaint or accusation made to God, against those who deal injuriously with them, and a desire that he would avenge their injuries; to which I cannot think the apostle would so passionately exhort them. Nor is the word capable of this sense, when the apostle saith, iv. 5, "The creature is sanctified to us, διὰ ἐντεύξεως, by prayer."

I therefore prefer the other import of the word mentioned in Phavorinus, that it is παράκλησις ὑπό τινος προταγομένη Θεοῦ περὶ σωτηρίας ἑτέρων, "an address presented to God for the salvation of others." And by this rule were the devotions of the church continually directed: for, saith the author of the book De Vocatione Gentium,* "The devotion of all the priests and all the faithful doth so unanimously observe this rule of prayer, that there is no part of the world in which the Christian people do not put up such prayers as these, praying not only for the saints, but for infidels, idolaters, the enemies of the cross, and the persecutors of Christ's members, for Jews, heretics, and schismatics." But then, as these addresses had a particular respect to men in these circumstances, so the other must have respect to men in general; all these addresses being to be made, not only for ourselves, but for all men.

[2] Ver. 2. Ὑπὲρ βασιλέων, &c. For kings, and all that are in authority.] So the Jews prayed, and offered sacrifices for the Persian kings,† and the welfare of their government, Ezra vi. 10. Thus Jeremiah sends to them in their captivity, "to pray for the peace of the city whither God had caused them to be carried captive," xxix. 7. And the Jews in Babylon send to those in Judea, to pray for the life of Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, and for the life of Balthazar his son, "that their days may be upon the earth as the days of heaven," Baruch i. 11. When they came under the government of the kings of Egypt, Eleazar, their high-priest, writes to Ptolemy thus:‡ "We continually offer sacrifice for thee, thy sister, thy children, and friends; and the people pray for thy happy success in all things, and for the peaceable state of thy kingdom." And so when they were under the Seleucidæ. And, lastly, when they came under the Roman government,* this was their constant practice, till they began that rebellion under which their city, country, religion, and nation, were destroyed. This being, saith Josephus, the cause of the war, that the seditious did θυσίαν τοῦ Καίσαρος ἀποβρίπτειν, "reject the sacrifice offered for Cæsar," though the priests and nobles earnestly entreated them μὴ παραλείπειν τὸ ὑπὲρ τῶν ἡγεμόνων ἔθος, "not to desert the custom concerning their rulers which always had obtained among them."

And that the Christians, following their examples, thus prayed continually, from the beginning, for their kings,† we learn from Polycarp,‡ Justin Martyr,§ Tertullian,‖ Cyprian,¶ Origen, Lactantius,†† and from all the ancient liturgies. And this it became them to do, that the heathen emperors, finding them thus solicitous for the welfare and prosperity of their government, might permit them quietly and peaceably to enjoy their religion.

[3] Ver. 5. Μεσίτης, Mediator.] That is, saith Suidas, εἰρηνοποιὸς, "a peace-maker." This, say the Socinians, is not necessary, that a mediator should appease or reconcile parties at variance; but only that he should deliver the mind of one to the other, and strike a covenant or league betwixt them, as in the case of Moses, Gal. iii. 9. To this I answer;

First, That though this be not necessarily contained in the signification of the word, yet it is evidently implied in that which is annexed to our Mediator, wherever he is mentioned in the New Testament, viz. here and in the Epistle to the Hebrews; for he is "such a mediator" as "gave himself a ransom to God for us," ver. 6, and there he is "a mediator of the new covenant of his blood," the covenant made by intervention of his death, εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν, "for redemption of the transgressions of the former covenant," ix. 15, viii. 6, xii. 24.

Secondly, This seemeth to have been the Jewish notion, both of "a mediator" in the general, and of our Mediator, or the divine Logos, in particular. Thus Philo saith,‡‡ that "the Father of all things hath granted to his most ancient Word an excellent gift, viz. that, standing in the confines of both, he should put a difference betwixt the maker and the thing made, as being an intercessor for mortal man to the immortal God, and an ambassador from the king to his subjects; in which gift he rejoiceth, saying, κἀγὼ εἱστήκειν ἀνὰ μέσον Κυρίου καὶ ὑμῶν, 'And I stood betwixt God and you, being neither unbegotten as God, οὔτε γενητὸς ὡς ἡμεῖς, nor made as we are,' but a middle of the extremes, and a pledge to both; to the Creator, engaging that all mankind shall not corrupt itself and apostatize, choosing disorder before order; to the creature, that he may have good hope that the merciful God will not wholly overlook his own work; for I denounce τὰ εἰρηνεῖα, 'peaceable things to the creature from the God of peace.'" And speaking of their high-priest, who was a type of Christ, he saith,* "The law will have him raised above human nature, and coming near to the divine; and, if I may say the truth, a middle betwixt both, that men may atone to God by a mediator, and God may reach forth and distribute his favours to men by a certain minister." And again,† "It was necessary that he who performs the office of a priest to the Father of a world, should have for his advocate his Son most perfect in virtue, to obtain the pardon of sins, and the participation of the greatest blessings." So that here it is made the office of a mediator, to procure peace to the creature from God, to make atonement to God, and to be an advocate to obtain the pardon of sins; and if Christ, our mediator and advocate with the Father, was, by virtue of his office, to do this, surely it must be part of his office to appease and reconcile God to us.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων, A ransom for all;] And Matt. xx. 28, λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, "a ransom in the stead of many." Hence then it is evident beyond contradiction, that our Lord Jesus suffered in our stead. For when the scripture saith, οὐ λήψεσθε λύτρα περὶ ψυχῆς παρὰ τοῦ φονεύσαντος, "Ye shall admit no satisfaction for the life of a murderer who is worthy of death," Numb. xxxv. 31, 32, "but he shall surely be put to death; for, οὐ ἐξιλασθήσεται ἡ γῆ ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος, the land cannot be cleansed or expiated from the blood that is shed therein, but by the blood of him that shed it:" is not this the plain import of these words,—that no price shall be admitted instead of his life? Again, when Ahab passed this judgment on the disguised prophet, ἔσται ἡ ψυχή σου ἀντὶ τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ, "Thy life shall go for his life whom thou hast let go," 1 Kings xx. 39, 40, and when the prophet thus returns upon him, "Thus saith the Lord, Because thou hast let go out of thy hand a man whom I have appointed to utter destruction, καὶ ἔσται ψυχή σου ἀντὶ τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ, therefore thy life shall go for his life:" and when Jehu saith to the men appointed to slay the priests of Baal, "If any of them escape, he that letteth him go, ἡ ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ ἀντὶ τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ, his life shall be for his life that escapeth of them," 2 Kings x. 24, do not all these expressions plainly signify, Thou shalt die instead of him? When therefore Christ elsewhere declares, that he would "give his flesh for the life of the world;" that he "gave his life a ransom for many," "a ransom for all;" must he not signify by these expressions that he would give up his life to the death, instead of them who had deserved death? which sure he could not do, but he must suffer in their stead. Moreover, by the Jewish law, the first-born of every beast was to die; or, to rescue him from it, the owner was to pay, λύτρον ἀντὶ ψυχῆς, "a price to redeem his life," Numb. xviii. 15, and the pushing ox, provided the owner did not pay, τὸ λύτρον τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ, "a price or ransom for his life," Exod. xxi. 31. Every Israelite was also to bring in yearly his half-shekel, λύτρον τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ ἐξιλάσασθαι περὶ τῶν ψυχῶν ὑμῶν, "to be the ransom of his life, that he die not" (Exod. xxx. 12. 15, 16): and this money was appointed to buy the daily sacrifice which was to expiate or make atonement for their lives. Moreover, among the Jews it was a received opinion, that σπουδαῖος τοῦ φαύλου λύτρον, "the good man was the redemption of the wicked" (Philo de Sacrif. Cain, p. 111, D.): and hence Josephus* brings in Eleazar praying thus to God, "Be thou gracious to thy nation, being satisfied with the punishment I suffer for them: make my blood an expiation for them, καὶ ἀντὶ ψυχῶν αὐτῶν λάβε τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχὴν, and take my life instead of theirs" (see the note on Matt. xx. 28). When therefore, in allusion to these things, it is said Christ gave himself, ἀντίλυτρον, or λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, "a ransom for many," can we put any other sense upon these words than this,—that he gave his life instead of ours, to expiate and atone for those lives which we, by sin, had forfeited?

[5] Ὑπὲρ πάντων, For all.] These verses contain several convincing arguments that God wills the salvation of all men in particular, and that Christ thus died for all. For,

First, The apostle here enjoins us to pray for all men, because "God will have all men to be saved." Now it is unquestionably the Christian's duty, and was the constant practice of the church, to pray for all men in particular; and therefore the reason here assigned of this duty must reach to all men in particular.

Secondly, The apostle reasons thus: "God will have all men to be saved," because he is the God of all, the common Father, Creator, Governor, and Preserver of all men: now thus he is the God of all men in particular; and so this argument must show he would have all men in particular be saved. For, as the apostle argues for God's readiness to justify the gentiles by faith as freely as the Jews, by asking, "Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the gentiles?" Rom. iii. 29, and answering that there is no difference betwixt them, "the same God being rich unto all that call upon him," Rom. x. 12; so may we argue in this case by a like inquiry, Is he the God of a small remnant of the Jews and gentiles only? Is he not the God and Saviour of them all? (iv. 10.)

Thirdly, He would "have all men to be saved," saith the apostle; "for there is one mediator betwixt God and man, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all." Now if the argument from one God was, as we have proved, designed to show he was the God of all men in particular, the argument from this one Mediator must also prove Christ the mediator of all men in particular. Hence he is here emphatically styled "the man Christ Jesus," to intimate unto us, that having taken upon him the nature common to us all, to fit him for his office, he must design it for the good of all who were partakers of that nature; for, as he was a man, he surely was endued with the best of human affections, universal charity, which would excite him to promote the welfare of all; as he was a man, he was subject to the common law of humanity, which obliges us to endeavour the common benefit of men (see the note on iv. 10).

[6] Ver. 7. Ἀλήθειαν λέγω, I speak the truth in Christ.] This oath or vehement affirmation could not be necessary to confirm Timothy in the belief of this matter. But this epistle being sent to Ephesus, or some other place where there were many Jews, who either denied that salvation was to be preached to the gentiles, or only on the terms of being also circumcised, which this apostle did so stoutly oppose, it might be necessary for their sakes.

[7] Ver. 8. Ὁσίους χεῖρας, Holy hands.] It is certain that it was the custom of the heathens to wash sometimes their heads, sometimes their whole bodies, but generally their hands, before they came to their temples to pay their homage to their gods. And to this purpose they had their χερνίβια, or χειρόνιπτρα, basins, or lavers, placed before the temples, which they were to use before they sacrificed: it being thought so great a crime to come to the gods with hands unwashed, illotis manibus libare, that it is* proverbial with them to signify, by that phrase, those who come irreverently and unprepared to their service, say Diogenianus and St. Gregory; and to come reverently to the gods is,† περιῤῥαινόμενον, ἀποῤῥῳφώμενον, ἀπονιφόμενον, ὑσιωμένον προσιέναι, to come cleansed and washed; and therefore holy. As for the Jews, the learned Dr. Pocock saith that this is a law among them, that "every one must wash his hands when he arises from his bed, that he may be pure when he offers up his prayers to God," not thinking any man טהור (ὅσιος, Prov. xxii. 11) "pure," till he hath washed his hands. This they were to do, say their rabbins, "lest God, seeing his creature defiled, should be angry;" and because prayer succeeded to those sacrifices, which were not to be touched by the priest till he had washed his hands (Exod. xxx. 27, 28). This they looked upon as a part of sanctification, and therefore pray thus, "Blessed be thou, O Lord God, אשר קדשנו, who hast sanctified us by thy precepts, and commandest us to wash our hands." This washing was to signify three things:

First, That the hands should be innocent and pure from all blood and cruelty, injustice and bribery, all filthiness and impurity, before we come to this sacred Majesty, as David saith, "I will wash my hands in innocency, and so will I compass thine altar," Ps. xxvi. 6, and Philo, of the Essenes,‡ that they lifted up pure hands to heaven; that is, hands, καθαραὶ λημμάτων, καὶ ὑπ' οὐδεμίας προφάσεως τῶν εἰς πορισμὸν μιαινόμεναι, "pure from gifts, and stained with no unjust gain;" and so, saith he, must the person who lays his hand upon his offering be able to say,§ αἱ χεῖρες αὗται οὔτε δῶρον ἐπ' ἀδίκοις ἔλαβον, "These hands have received no gift to do injustice, are not polluted with innocent blood; they have maimed, wounded, done violence to no man; they have been employed in no culpable action, but have ministered to all good and profitable things."

Secondly, That our hearts should much more be purified from all lusts and filthiness of spirit, pride, hatred, malice, covetousness, &c.; so "clean hands" and "a pure heart," in the psalmist, go together, Ps. xxiv. 4; "He that offers sacrifices," saith Philo‖, "must be καθαρὸς σῶματι καὶ ψυχῇ, pure in body from whatsoever defileth that; and in soul from all evil passions and vices: for it is folly to think we may not come to the temple till we have washed the body, and yet may pray and offer sacrifice with a spotted and defiled mind."

Thirdly, That we be purified from all worldly and distracting thoughts, that the mind may be at leisure to attend purely to heavenly things, that we may bring to God, saith Philo,¶ τὴν ψυχὴν τοῦ τῶν αἰσθήσεων καὶ αἰσθητῶν ὄγκου παντελῶς ἐπικουφισθεῖσαν, "a soul eased of all the weight of the senses and sensible objects." These are the things which the apostle here enjoins, when he commands us to lift up holy hands; not that we should wash them with water, which Tertullian reckons among things vacuæ observationis, of vain observation, superstitious, and rather curious and affected than reasonable devotion, when introduced by some Christians, from the heathen or the Jewish practice, as a preface to prayer.

[8] Χωρὶς ὀργῆς, Without wrath.] As being contrary to that charity and forgiveness, and that sedateness of spirit, we ought to have when we address to God in prayer, and being the forerunner of that cruelty which defiles the hand.

[9] Καὶ διαλογισμοῦ, And doubting.] I find not that the Greek ever bears the sense of doubting, but always imports, in the New Testament, either inward reasonings, or tumultuating thoughts; διαλογισμοὶ πονηροὶ, "evil thoughts" in the heart, Matt. xv. 19, Mark vii. 21, James ii. 4, διαλογισμοὶ καρδιῶν, "the thoughts of men's hearts," Luke ii. 35, ix. 46; διαλογισμοὶ αὐτῶν, "their thoughts," Luke v. 22, vi. 8, or their imaginations, Rom. i. 21, Luke xxiv. 38, or contention and disceptation among them, Luke ix. 46, or inward murmurings, Phil. ii. 14; all which are plainly opposite to that peace, concord, and sedateness of spirit we should bring to our devotions, and are apt to distract us in them, especially "evil imaginations."

The scripture itself seems to direct us to the prime sense of this word: for what is διαλογισμοὶ, Luke ix. 47, is ἐνθυμήσεις, "inward thoughts," and "reasonings," Matt. ix. 4; and this sense the word will bear in all places where we render it either "doubting" or "disputing." So Phil. ii. 14, "Do all things without murmuring," καὶ διαλογισμῶν, and inward reasonings, whether you should continue in the faith or not; or why such commands should be laid upon you; and here, without inward thoughts or resentments of the injuries done to you. Theodoret here interprets it agreeably to the matter in hand, ἀμφιβολίας χωρὶς, "without hesitation, firmly believing thou shalt receive what thou askest;" and of this, saith Theophylact, thou mayest be assured, if thou still askest according to his will; if thou askest, μηδὲν ἀνάξιον τοῦ Βασιλέως, "nothing unworthy of God," but all things spiritual, and askest these things without wrath and hesitation, or a mind wavering betwixt hope and fear.

[10] Ver. 9. Μετὰ αἰδοῦς καὶ σωφροσύνης, With shamefacedness and sobriety, or chastity.] It seems impossible to fix a certain rule for the attire of women of all states and conditions, at all times and in all places; but from what the apostle saith here, and 1 Pet. iii. 3 (see the note there), it seems evident, first, that περιπλοκαὶ τῶν τριχῶν ἐταιρικαὶ, all attire which suspected women used, either to provoke lust in others, or to show any inclination to it in themselves; and all attire which hath any tendency to any thing of this nature, or to raise a suspicion of it, must be here forbidden, as being contrary to the modesty and chaste behaviour of a godly matron: and, secondly, all attire which, by the richness and costliness of it, shows any pride, or vanity of spirit, or an ambition to excel others: and, thirdly, all great concernment, care, and study to appear in such attire, as if it were indeed our truest ornament, and that which made us truly to excel, and be more honourable than others: this vanity and pride, this esteem of and concern for these things, being not well consistent with sobriety, and much less with the profession of true godliness. And here it is worthy to be noted by the women, first, that this precept ought not to be slighted by them, as of little moment, seeing it is so carefully inculcated by the two chief apostles of the Jew and gentile, Peter and Paul; and the contrary is represented as a practice opposite to godliness. Secondly, Let them especially mark the character here given of a Christian woman, viz. that she is one who doth not only profess and declare, that she serves and worships God, but also doth ἐπαγγέλλειν, "show forth godliness in her life and conversation." And, Thirdly, Let the men note hence that of Esthius, That if it be so unbecoming a Christian woman, to be thus concerned in adorning and tricking up her body, it must be much more unbecoming a Christian man to put on such attire, which makes him truly to deserve the name of fop.

teach.] i. e. Publicly, 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35 (see the note there). They may privately instruct, as Priscilla did Apollos, Acts xviii. 26, and as a believing wife may instruct her unbelieving husband, when he requires a reason of her faith; but then she must not challenge any authority to do this, this being to usurp an authority not due unto her.

[12] Ver. 14. Οὐκ ἠπατήθη, He was not deceived.] i. e. By the serpent, who never attempted him, but was only seduced by the woman; she therefore was both guilty of her own and of her husband's sins.

[13] Ver. 15. Διὰ τῆς τεκνογονίας, In child-bearing.] That is, some say, by bearing the Messiah, the promised seed; but there is no instance that can be produced, where this phrase is used in this sense. Say others, by education of her children; but neither is there any instance of this signification of the word; nor is it fit that her salvation should depend on the faith, and charity, and holiness of her children, these being things not in her power to produce in them. And (3.) what then shall become of barren women, and those that live and die virgins? To establish therefore the sense given in the text, let it be noted,

First, That this enallage numeri, or change of the number, in words that comprehend all of the same kind, is very common both in the Old and New Testament, and in profane authors: so Gen. xxxiii. 13, Morientur totus grex; Gen. xli. 57, Universa terra venerunt; "The whole land came into Egypt;" Psal. cxl. 8, "Grant not the desires of the wicked, further not his wicked devices, lest they exalt themselves;" Prov. ii. 12, 13, "The evil man—who leave the paths of uprightness" (see Numb. x. 3, 1 Kings i. 40, 1 Chron. x. 6, Ezra x. 12, Ps. lxviii. 11, Esd. xxv. 3, xxxiv. 10, Mark iii. 7, 8); and here, v. 4, χῆρα—μανθανέτωσαν, "If any widow—let them learn." Note, Secondly, That the preposition διὰ doth not always signify a means or a condition, but sometimes a term to be passed through; as when it is said, διὰ πολλῶν θλίψεων, "Through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God," Acts xiv. 22; "He shall be saved διὰ πυρός, as one passing through the fire," 1 Cor. iii. 15; "Let us behave ourselves as the ministers of God, passing inoffensively, διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀτιμίας, διὰ δυσφημίας καὶ εὐφημίας, through honour and dishonour, through good and evil report," 2 Cor. vi. 8; in which sense we are said ambulare per viam, per plateam. But against the interpretation given in the paraphrase, it is objected, that the following words, "If they continue in the faith," &c. cannot be mentioned here as a condition of their safe deliverance in child-bed, since that deliverance is common to the believer and the pagan, the charitable and temperate, and the uncharitable and intemperate, the chaste and the unchaste women.

Ans. Now to this I answer, That this objection seems to be of no force against the sense here given: for though health, riches, a good name, and other temporal blessings, be common to the pagan and believer, to the good and bad, that hinders not but godliness may "have the promise of this life;" as health, riches, a good name, and other outward blessings, are promised to those that fear God; it being sufficient to make good this promise, that God is pleased sometimes to vouchsafe this safe deliverance from the dangers of child-birth to women, by virtue of their trust in God, their charity to others, especially in the like condition, their temperance, sobriety, and chastity, as to the observation of the matrimonial vow; and that others may sometimes miscarry through the want or neglect of these duties. In a word, seeing it cannot be denied that these things are likely to engage God's providence to be with them in that needful hour, and the neglect of them may provoke him to abandon others, they must be deemed fit matter of a temporal promise.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1.] Note, concerning the import of the word "bishop" here, I find three different opinions among the ancients; viz. that of Theodoret, that "the apostle here calls the presbyter* bishop," which he thus proves; "because, after the rules prescribed concerning bishops, he descends to those concerning deacons, omitting presbyters; because," saith he, "anciently the same persons were styled presbyters and bishops, the name apostles being then given to them who are now called bishops; but in process of time, they left the name of apostles to them who were apostles indeed, and gave this name of bishop peculiarly to them who anciently were styled apostles. And though," saith he, "these rules are given to the presbyters by name, it is clear that they more eminently belonged to bishops, ἅτε δὴ καὶ μείζονος μεταλαχόντας τιμῆς, as being of a higher dignity."

And this opinion, if true, is a full confutation of the presbyterian hypothesis; for it declares, that there were three distinct orders from the beginning of the church, apostles or bishops, presbyters, and deacons; and that the bishops were of a higher dignity than the presbyters.

Secondly, The second opinion is that of Epiphanius, that* "the apostles could not order all things at one time, there being then a necessity of presbyters and deacons, by both which ecclesiastical matters were to be administered; they placed no bishops there, where they found no persons worthy of that office; in other places, where they found persons worthy of it, but by reason of the paucity of converts found scarce any fit to be presbyters, they constituted only bishops and deacons. And this account," saith he, "is taken, βαθυτάταις ἱστορίαις, from the most ancient histories of the church;" I suppose from the known passage of Clemens

2 A bishop then must be [2] blameless (i. e. free from just ground of blame), the [3] husband of one wife (i. e. not guilty of polygamy, or of divorcing one woman and marrying another, as many of the Jews and Greeks then were), vigilant (in his functions), sober (governing his passions), of good behaviour (in words, in habit, or in aspect), [4] given to hospitality (or the entertainment of strangers), apt to teach (not so much for his eloquence, as for his skill in divine things, and knowledge of what is fitting to be taught: so Theodoret);

Romanus to this effect. And this also yields a full confutation of the presbyterian hypothesis; for it declares, that it was the design of the apostles to institute three several orders in the church, viz. bishops, presbyters, and deacons; and where this was not done, it was only through want of persons fit to complete these orders, and only during that defect; and this being writ in answer to Ærius's heresy, that "a bishop differed not from a presbyter, they being both one order, dignity, and honour,"* shows that opinion was then counted not only false and novel, but heretical.

Thirdly, The third opinion is that of Chrysostom,† Œcumenius,‡ and Hilary the deacon, on the place,§ that "the apostle includes presbyters under the name of bishops, because there is no great difference between them, they being appointed, as well as bishops, to teach, and to preside over the church; and being only inferior to the bishops, as to the power of ordination, which belongs alone to bishops, and not to presbyters." Now even according to this opinion; the bishop is above the presbyter, and all ordinations which are not performed by the bishop are irregular, and performed by them who have no power to ordain.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἀνεπίλημπτος, Blameless.] For "the life of a bishop," saith Chrysostom, "should shine so bright, and be so free from spot, that others may not only behold it, but live by his example."

[3] Μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἄνδρα, The husband of one wife.] For "the Jews and Greeks," saith Theodoret,‖ "were wont to be married to two or three wives together." The apostle, therefore, doth not say this to depreciate second marriages, which he elsewhere allows (1 Cor. vii. 8. 39), and from which it may not be in a man's power to abstain: "If then a man, τὴν προτέραν ἐκβαλὼν, ἑτέρᾳ συνεζύγη, rejecting his former wife, be joined to another, he deserveth blame; but if death have disjoined him from his former, and nature, urging, doth necessitate him to take another, it is otherwise." Considering these and other things, I approve of this interpretation of some of the ancients, which is also mentioned by Jerome,† and by Chrysostom, declaring, that the apostle doth not here oblige the bishop to be married, but only corrects the immoderateness of some; because among the Jews it was lawful both to marry twice, καὶ δύο ἔχειν κατὰ ταυτὸν γυναῖκας, "and to have two wives together;" and it was more common with them to divorce one, and take another. And whereas against this interpretation it is objected, that the apostle requires also, that the widow should be "the wife of one husband;" whereas it never was permitted, among any but barbarians, for women to have more than one husband at once; this objections hath some strength against the interpreting that passage of polygamy, but none against that interpretation which relates to marriage after dismission of the former husband; the law allowing this in Greece, and the practice having made it common among the Romans, and not unusual among the Jews (see note on v. 9). Origen* seems plainly to insinuate, that this law, in the strict sense, seems harsh and unreasonable, since he that hath a wife might lose her in his youth, and so have need of a second; and this law allowed the bishop to enjoy his first wife even to old age, ἐσθ' ὅτε μήδὲ γυμνάζόμενον εἰς ἁγνείαν, καὶ σωφροσύνην, "though he never exercised himself to chastity and continence:" and therefore he things fit to interpret these words by analogy to the bill of divorce, plainly declaring against the church of Rome, that neither bishop, priest, nor deacon, of whom there he speaks, were either by scripture, or the laws of the church, restrained from cohabiting with their wives, after their promotion of those orders. See the confirmation of our exposition in Suicerus, vocibus δίγαμία and δίγαμος.

[4] Φιλόξενον, Given to hospitality.] Not in our common sense, of keeping a good table, or an open house, for all comers; but, τοὺς ὑποδημοῦντας ὑποδεχόμενον, "an entertainer of strangers," as the fathers say, that the word φιλόξενος, signifies.

Ver. 3. Μὴ αἰσχροκερδῆ.] These words, saith Dr. Mills, crept into the text from Tit. i. 7, whereas they are found in Chrysostom, and Œcumenius, Cod. Alex. and Basil, tom. ii. p. 416, 417; and are fully confirmed from the words following, διακόνους ὡσαύτως μὴ αἰσχροκερδεῖς, and from Tit. i. 7, where Paul treats of the same subject.

[5] Ἐπιεικῆ, Patient or gentle;] i. e. Saith Theodoret, in reference to offences committed against himself; for it is no part of meekness or patience, when others are injured, to overlook the injury.

[6] Ἀφιλάργυρον, Not covetous, or a lover of money.] Theodoret here notes, that the apostle doth not say he must be ἀκτήμονα, "one who possesseth none;" for a man may possess these things, and yet distribute them as he ought, so as not to be a slave to them, but a lord over them.

[7] Ver. 6. Μὴ νεόφυτον, Not a novice.] This, say Chrysostom and Theodoret, is not spoken with respect to age; for Timothy himself, to whom he writes, was a youth (iv. 12), but in respect to his knowledge of the faith.

[8] Εἰς κρῖμα τοῦ διαβόλου.] That the devil fell by pride, Theodoret here notes: but yet both he and Chrysostom say that by "condemnation" here, the apostle means not his sin, but his punishment for it.

[9] Ver. 7. Καὶ παγίδα διαβόλου, And the snare of the devil.] i. e. Saith Theodoret, lest, being tempted by Satan, he relapse into his former sins; or lest, being reproached by those he is set over, for his former life, Satan tempt him to apostasy, v. 15.

[10] Ver. 10. Καὶ οὗτοι δοκιμαζέσθωσαν πρῶτον, And let these be first proved.] These words καὶ αὗτοι, show that this trial belonged also to the higher orders; and so it seems to have been from the beginning, where the Holy Ghost did not immediately interpose in designation of the person. The emperor Severus takes notice of it,* as of "a practice observed both by the Jews and Christians, in order to the ordination of their priests, and fit to be imitated in choosing a rector, or procurator of the provinces subject to the Roman government." The epistles of Cyprian† make frequent mention of this practice observed in the church, in imitation of the Jews. "This," saith he, "was observed in the Acts of the Apostles in the ordination both of bishops, priests, and deacons: and therefore this," saith he, "is derived from a divine and apostolical tradition, observed almost throughout all provinces, that the bishops of that province where the bishop is to be placed, should come thither and choose the bishop, the people being present who were acquainted with his life and conversation."

[11] Ver. 11. Γυναῖκας ὡσαύτως, The women also,] i. e. That are admitted to be deaconesses, Tit. ii. 3; περὶ τῶν τὸ ἀξίωμα τῆς διακονίας ἐχούσων λέγει, Chrysostom, Theodoret.

[12] Ver. 13. Βαθμὸν καλόν, A good degree.] It being the custom to choose presbyters out of the deacons, and bishops out of the presbyters; and therefore, at his ordination, they prayed, that he, using the office of a deacon unblameably, might‡ μείζονος ἀξιωθῆναι βαθμοῦ, "be held worthy of a higher degree."

[13] Παῤῥησίαν, Boldness, or freedom.] The deacons sometimes preached and converted men to the faith, as Stephen and Philip; and this they could more freely and more successfully perform, when they lived suitably to the qualifications of their function, and to the rules of the gospel they professed and taught.

[14] Ver. 15. Ἐὰν δὲ βραδύνω, But if I tarry long.] Here Theodoret well notes, that neither the holy prophets, nor apostles, knew all things, the grace of the Spirit dictating to them only the things which were expedient; as appears from these expressions, "hoping to come shortly," and, "but if I tarry."

[15] Στῦλος καὶ ἑδραίωμα τῆς ἀληθείας, The pillar and the ground of truth.] Here, say the Romanists, the church is styled "the pillar and the ground of truth," surely from her teachers being so; they being elsewhere styled "pillars," Gal. ii. 9, and "foundations," Eph. ii. 20. Now, say they, may not all securely rely in their faith on the pillar of truth? May they not securely ground their faith upon the ground of truth? The church therefore being the pillar and the ground of truth, we may, without fear of ever erring, rely upon her.

Ans. 1. Whereas the objection represents it as certain that the church is here styled "the pillar and the ground of truth," in respect of its teachers, the text seems clearly to intimate the contrary: for whether we supply the sense of the words thus, πῶς δεῖ (σε), "How thou oughtest;" or with Theophylact, πῶς δεῖ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον, "How a bishop ought to behave himself in the house of God, which is the church," it is evident, that the church,* here mentioned, is put in opposition to the bishop of it, and is, according to Theodoret on the place, σύλλογος τῶν πιστευόντων, "the collection of believers:" and therefore not the church representative, which is only σύλλογος τῶν ἐπισκόπων, "an assemby of bishops," according to the doctrine of the church of Rome; and therefore the infallibility of the church representative can never be concluded from these words, which so expressly do relate to the whole system of believers, in distinction from their bishops.

Ans. 2. The church here is "the church of the living God;" not as it comprehends the major part of her visible members, but only as it comprehends the true and living members of Christ's body, they being only "the church of the living God;" so that we must first know who they are, before we can be guided by them. Now, because this is impossible to be known with any assurance, it is impossible that we should be obliged to rely on their judgment in deciding what is truth.

Ans. 3. There is nothing more common, in the language of the writers of the church, than to style any eminent father of the church, or assertor of her faith, "the pillar and the ground of faith." This title is by Basil† given to Musonius bishop of Cæsarea, to Athanasius, and to the orthodox bishops banished for the truth; by Nazianzen,‡ to Basil, to Athanasius, and to Eusebius, bishop of Samosata; by Lanfranc and Rupertus Tuitiensis, it is given to Austin; and yet sure they were far from thinking that any of these single fathers were infallible. Whence it must follow, that, according to the judgment of the church, this phrase did not import infallibility.

16 And without controversy (or, confessedly) great is the mystery of godliness: (consisting in these articles,) [16] God was manifest in the flesh, justified in (or by) the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.

Ans. 4. The church cannot here be styled "the pillar and the ground of truth," as being the foundation on which truth is built, and which giveth it authority; truth being, saith Chrysostom,* τῆς ἐκκλησίας καὶ στύλος καὶ ἑδραίωμα, "the pillar and the ground of the church," which is, saith the apostle, "built on the foundation of the apostles and the prophets," Eph. ii. 19, 20. She therefore is the church of Christ, because she holds the truth; as is demonstrative from this, that purely ceasing to do so, her members cease to be the members of the church: she therefore cannot, by me, be known to be the church, until I know she holds the truth, and doth not cease to make profession of it: and when I first know this, what need have I of her infallible direction to find out the truth? She therefore may be rather said to be "the pillar and the ground of truth," because it is essential to her being, to maintain and teach all necessary truths; and because her living members do and will maintain them, when concealed, denied, or misrepresented by hypocritical professors: and because she doth preserve and own those oracles in which the saving truth of Christ is fully and perspicuously maintained; and doth baptize her children into that symbol, which was always held to be a perfect summary of Christian faith.

Lastly, The church of that age might be well said to be "the pillar and the ground of truth," because then the apostles presided in it, who were the pillars and foundations of the Christian faith, according to the scriptures and the ancient fathers: thus Theodoret† styles Peter and John, τοὺς στύλους τῆς ἀληθείας, "the pillars of truth;" and Œcumenius,‡ στύλους τῆς πίστεως, i. e. "the pillars of the faith." Then also did the apostles and evangelists deliver, and the church receive, those scriptures which were to be the standard of the Christian faith, and which were written, saith Irenæus,§ "by the will of God, to be hereafter, columna et fundamentum fidei nostræ, the pillar and foundation of our faith:" and which are, saith Athanasius,‖ τῆς πίστεως ἡμῶν ἀγκυραὶ καὶ ἐρείσματα, "the anchors and stabiliments of our faith." Then did her members confirm the Christian faith by miracles, which, by St. Hilary¶ upon this place, are styled, "the confirmation of this truth;" and by their sufferings for it: on which account the martyrs are peculiarly styled by the fathers "the steady pillars and the grounds of Christians." Now seeing none of these reasons can be applied to the present church, it will not follow, that she can, in like manner, claim this title.

[16] Ver. 16. Θεὸς ἐφανερώθη, God was manifested in the flesh.] Here Grotius saith, Suspectam nobis hanc lectionem faciunt interpretes veteres, Latinus, Syrus, Arabs, et Ambrosius, qui omnes legunt ὃ ἐφανερώθη, i. e. "The Latin, Syriac, Arabic versions, and Ambrose, all read, 'The mystery which was revealed in the flesh;' which gives us reason to suspect the other reading, viz. 'God manifested in the flesh.'" But, (1.) this is a great mistake as to the Arabic version, for that reads thus, Quòd Deus, "That God was manifested in the flesh;" and so doth the Syriac, according to the version of Tremellius: in the Polyglot it runs thus, Magnum est arcanum justitiæ quod justificatus est carne; which cannot refer to mystery, but must refer to God or Christ: and though the Vulgar Latin, and the commentator under the name of Ambrose, read, Quod manifestum est in carne; yet he adds, agreeably to the opinion of the Latins, that this mystery is Christus in carne, "Christ manifested in the flesh, but concealed in the Spirit," or, as to his Godhead (see Dr. Pearson's Vindication of this place against Grotius, Creed, p. 128). In a word, the reading which our translation follows is owned by all the Greek scholiasts, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, and is found in all the manuscripts, excepting that of Clermont and Lincoln College, and the phrases here used do make it necessary to expound the words, not of the gospel, but of Christ, the subject of it. For,

1. That exposition, which refers these words unto the gospel, puts such a strained sense on some of these expressions, of which we meet with no example in the whole New Testament: for where doth "manifestation in the flesh" signify the manifestation of a thing by weak and mortal men? and where is the gospel said to be manifested in the flesh? where doth ἀνελήφθη signify the exaltation of the gospel? or where is it said, that the gospel was received into glory?

2. It turns many of those expressions into a metaphorical sense, which are literally true of Christ; for, according to this exposition, "flesh" signifies weak men; to be "justified," to be owned and approved; to be "seen," is to be known or revealed; to be "taken up," is to be exalted in the minds of men.

3. This strained exposition reduces three of these articles into one; it being, in effect, the same, to be "believed on in the world," by reason of those glorious miracles by which it was confirmed; and to be owned and approved, by reason of the operations of the Holy Spirit, which did assist the preachers of it; and, by that approbation, gloriously exalted in the minds of men.

These are the inconveniences which attend that exposition; whereas the other interpretation, which refers this mystery to Christ, affords a very plain and literal exposition of the words, confirmed by parallel expressions frequent in the holy scripture. For,

1. "The Word," saith John, "was made flesh, and dwelt among us (John i. 14), and we have seen his glory;" ἐφανερώθη, "He was manifested," 1 John iii. 5. 8; iv. 2, "and came in the flesh, who was the Son of God;" "He who was in the form of God, and thought it no robbery to be equal with God, was found in the likeness of a man," Phil. ii. 6, 7; "He that was God, blessed for evermore, was also of the seed of David, according to the flesh," Rom. ix. 5.

2. He was "justified by the Spirit," as doing those miracles on earth, by which he justified his mission against all the accusations of the Jews, by the Spirit of God, Matt. xii. 28, being "declared to be the Son of God with power, by the Spirit of holiness," Rom. i. 3, 4, by sending that Spirit after his ascension into heaven, Acts ii. 32, which he had promised to his disciples upon earth, and by which the world was convinced, περὶ δικαιοσύνης, "of his righteousness," John xvi. 10.

3. He was "seen of angels," who at his entrance into the world did worship him, Heb. i. 6; who celebrated his birth, and gave notice of it to the world, Luke ii. 9. 13; who ministered to him in the desert, Matt. iv. 11, and in his agonies, Luke xxii. 43, xxiv. 4; who were present at his resurrection, and attended him at his ascension into heaven, Acts i. 10.

4. The whole history of the gospel shows, that he was "preached to the gentiles," and "believed on in the world."

5. And, lastly, he was "received up into heaven;" ἀνεφέρετο, ἀνήφθη, ἀνελήφθη, "He was taken, he was carried up into heaven, and sat at the right hand of Majesty in glory," Matt. xvi. 19, Luke xxiv. 51, Acts i. 2. 11. And sure so plain, so full, and literal an exposition of these articles, deserves to be preferred before the strained and metaphorical interpretations of Grotius, Erasmus, and the Socinians.

CHAPTER IV.

1 Now (but though the mystery of godliness be so fully confirmed,) [1] the Spirit (in the scripture) speaketh expressly, that [2] in the latter times [3] some shall depart from the faith (once embraced by them),

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. Τὸ Πνεῦμα ῥητῶς λέγει, The Spirit saith expressly.] Hence Mr. Mede concludes, That the apostle must refer to some prophecy of these things recorded in the scriptures; for though the Spirit in the apostles advertised them of many things, viz. "The Spirit said to Peter, Behold three men seek thee," Acts. x. 19; "The Spirit said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul, for the work of the ministry," Acts xiii. 2 (see Acts xvi. 6, xxi. 11); yet he did this only, ἐν ὁράματι, "in a vision," Acts x. 19, or by secret inspirations (and so not ῥητῶς, "expressly"). But to this the fathers answer, That the word ῥητῶς here signifies only φανερῶς, σαφῶς, "clearly and perspicuously;" to which it may be added, that in those times of prophecy, when the prophets had the government of the churches, and spake still in the public assemblies, it might reasonably be said, "The Spirit speaketh expressly," what they taught expressly in the church. And whereas hence he infers, that this prophecy must be found somewhere in the Old Testament, the reverend Dr. Hammond thinks that unnecessary, this apostasy being foretold by our Prophet, who had the Spirit without measure, saying, Matt. xxiv. 11, 12, "Then many shall be scandalized, and many false prophets shall arise, καὶ πλανήσουσι, and shall deceive many; and because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold." I confess, Mr. Mede seems to have found this prophecy, Dan. xi. 36—39. But to omit all other objections against his interpretation of the words, I can by no means think that Daniel, so well acquainted with the import of "strange gods," both in the law and the prophets, should give that infamous name, אלוה נכר "a strange god," to our blessed Saviour; or that he should at the same time prophesy, that antichrist should acknowledge and increase Christ with honour, and yet divest Christ of his glory and honour, by setting up mahuzzim in opposition to his offices. But considering that this epistle, according to Bishop Pearson, was writ in the eleventh of Nero, A. D. 64, why may we not refer this prediction, either to the apostasy, ῥητῶς, "expressly" mentioned 2 Thess. ii. 3. 9, or to the predictions of the apostles mentioned by Jude, ver. 17—19?

[2] Ἐν ὑστέροις καιροῖς, In the latter times.] The Jewish doctors lay this down as a rule, that wherever we find this phrase, באחרית הימים, "in the latter days," we are to understand it of the age and times of the Messiah: so, Gen. xlix. 1, "Gather yourselves together," saith Jacob to his sons, "that I may tell you what will befall you, ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν, in the last times, i. e. the days when "the sceptre shall depart from Judah, and Shiloh (the Messiah) shall come;" Numb. xxiv. 14, "Come," saith Balaam, "and I will tell thee what shall befall thy people ἐπ' ἐσχατου τῶν ἡμερῶν, in the latter days," i. e. when "the Star comes out of Jacob, and the Sceptre ariseth out of Israel;" i. e. "when the Messiah comes," saith the Targum of Onkelos, on ver. 17; Isa. ii. 2, "In the last days the mountain of the Lord shall be established on the top of the mountains, and all nations shall flow into it:" "In the times of the Messiah," say R. Salomon, and other Jews. Jer. xxiii. 20, "In the latter days ye shall understand this;" "In the days of the Messiah," Targum on ver. 5; Dan. ii. 28, "There is a God of heaven who maketh known to the king what shall come to pass," ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν, from his times, till the kingdom of the Messiah be set up, ver. 44; see also x. 14; Hosea iii. 5, "Afterward they shall return, and shall seek the Lord, and David their king" (Targ. "Messiah their king, the Son of David"), "in the latter days;" Micah. iv. 1, "In the last days shall the mountain of the Lord be established upon the top of the mountains:" where Dr. Pocock saith, that "by 'the last days' are meant, the days or times of the Messiah or Christ, is agreed on by some Jews and most Christians." And wherever we meet with this phrase in the New Testament, it manifestly refers to the beginnings of Christianity, and signifies the last times of the Jewish state or economy, concurring with the times of the Messiah, and the erecting of his kingdom, by calling the gentiles, and settling a Christian church, to succeed that of the Jews. Thus, when the Holy Ghost fell down on the apostles and disciples, "This is that," saith Peter, "which was spoken of by the prophet Joel, saying, In the last days I will pour my Spirit upon all flesh," Acts ii. 17; so, Heb. i. 1, "God, who of old spake to our fathers by the prophets, ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν χρόνων, in these last days hath spoken to us by his Son," i. e. by him who, saith Peter, was "foreordained from the beginning of the world, but was manifested, ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν χρόνων, in the last times;" where the times of Christ's manifestation to the world, and of his preaching to the Jews, are manifestly styled "the last times." So, James v. 3, "You have treasured up your gold and silver, as fire, which shall eat your flesh, ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις, in the last days;" 2 Pet. iii. 3, "This know ye, ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν, in the last times there shall come mockers," &c., and that they were then come, we learn from ver. 5, "This they are ignorant of;" and Jude, ver. 17, 18, "Remember the words spoken before by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ, that they said unto you, that ἐν ἐσχάτῳ χρόνῳ, in the last time there should be mockers, walking after their own lusts:" and that they were then come, is evident from the following words, "These are they who separate themselves," &c. ver. 19. And, 1 John ii. 18, "Little children, ἐσχάτη ὥρα ἐστί, it is now the last hour, and, as you have heard, that antichrist shall (then) come, so now are there many antichrists, whereby you may know that this is the last hour:" so 2 Tim. iii. 1, 2, "This know, that in the last days, ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις, there shall be perilous times, for men shall be lovers of themselves;" and that those times, or days, and persons, were then come, is evident from his exhortation to "turn away" from them, ver. 5, and his character of them, ver. 6, ἐκ τούτων, "Of these are they that creep into houses," &c. And that the "last times" here mentioned were already come, we learn from his admonition to Timothy, to "put the brethren in mind of these things," ver. 4. Here, then, is another defect in Mr. Mede's ingenious interpretation of these words, that he hath not made it out that "the last times" are to be extended beyond the first century, or the age of the apostles. Mr. Mede saith, "These words are not a narration of things present, but a prediction of what shall betide the Christian faith in aftertimes." I answer, they are indeed a narrative of what the Spirit had foretold should happen "in the latter times," by an apostasy from the faith; but the determination of the time when what was thus foretold should be accomplished, depends on the fixed import of "the latter times:" for these "last times," saith Mr. Mede, being mentioned as the indication when this apostasy should take place, must therefore be sufficient to determine the time of this apostasy: and so they plainly do, according to my interpretation. But if, with others, you refer these "last times" to the whole times of antichrist, they began not till above four hundred years after the writing of this epistle; and why then is the apostle so concerned that Timothy then should "put the brethren in remembrance of these things?" ver. 6, and they contain twelve hundred and sixty years; and so cannot inform us in what period, or precise portion of that time, this apostasy should have its rise.

[3] Ἀποστήσονταί τινες τῆς πίστεως, Some shall depart from the faith.] Here seems another defect of Mr. Mede's hypothesis, that he makes these words to signify only a partial declining from the faith, and that again only virtual and consequential, by setting up doctrines opposite to or inconsistent with it, though not owned to be so by them that embrace them; whereas apostasy from the faith seems plainly to import a falling off from it wholly, or at least an actual and professed renouncing of some essential part of it.

[4] Προσέχοντες πνεύμασι πλάνοις, καὶ διδασκαλίαις δαιμονίων, Giving heed to seducing spirits, and to doctrines of devils.] These words, by all the ancient commentators, seem to be taken actively for those doctrines which are introduced by men led by the suggestions of Satan and of evil spirits; these doctrines being, saith Theodoret, ἐκείνων κινήματα, "the productions of those evil spirits;" and they who vent them are, saith Chrysostom, οἱ ὑπ' ἐκείνων ἐνεργούμενοι, "men acted by them." The false prophets and false apostles, saith the author of the interpolated Epistle to the Philadelphians, had λαοπλάνον πνεῦμα (§. 5), "a spirit that deceived the people;" they preached ἀπάτην καὶ πλάνην, "deceit and error," and had dwelling in them, τὸν ἐρῶκοντα τὸν ἀποστάτην, "the apostate dragon." These false prophets had, saith John, πνεῦμα τῆς πλάνης, "a spirit of error;" as the apostles had Πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, "the Spirit of truth," 1 John iv. 1. 6. So far it is from being true, that the word spirit signifies doctrines, and not those "deluding spirits" which taught them; yet because "the prince of devils," Matt. ix. 34, "the spirit of the devil," Luke iv. 33, Rev. xvi. 14, the "sacrifice," the "table," the "cup of devils," 1 Cor. x. 20, 21, the "habitation of devils," Rev. xviii. 2, are phrases where δαιμόνια, "devils," are still taken objectively, I admit that sense also here: and then the apostasy, procured by "the spirits of deceit," is that of the Judaizers, relapsing from the profession of the Christian faith, through those false Christs and false prophets, of which our Saviour foretold they should "deceive many," Matt. xxiv. 11. 24; whereas they, who apostatized by falling back to heathenism, are they who give heed to the doctrines of demons: for dii gentium dæmonia, "the gods of the heathens are demons."

[5] Ver. 2. Ἐν ὑποκρίσει ψευδολόγων, Through the hypocrisy of false speakers.] Ἐν pro διὰ, through, is very common; so ἐν πάσῃ ἀπάτῃ ἀδικίας, "Through all deceivableness of unrighteousness," 2 Thess. ii. 9, 10 (see Mark ix. 29, Luke i. 17, Acts xvii. 31, Rom. xii. 21, Tit. i. 9, 2 Pet. iii. 1), κεκαυτηριασμένων τὴν συνείδησιν, "of seared consciences," i. e. of consciences, which have lost the sense of good or evil, and no longer do their office: for this expression, saith Theodoret, signifies, τὴν ἰσχάτην αὐτῶν ἀναλγησίαν, "the extreme stupor of their consciences;" for the member seared, νεκρωθεὶς τὴν προτέραν αἴσθησιν ἀποβάλλει, "being mortified, hath lost its former sensation."

[6] Ver. 3. Κωλυόντων γαμεῖν, ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων, Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats.] It is here to be noted from Theophylact, that in construing these words, οὐκ ὀφείλεις ἀπὸ κοινοῦ λαβεῖν τὸ κωλυόντων ἀλλ' ἔξωθεν προσθεῖναι τὸ συμβουλεύοντων ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων, "we must not repeat the word 'forbidding,' but add, in lieu of it, 'counselling to abstain from meats:'" so all the ancients have interpreted these words of Clemens Alexandrinus,* when he saith, οὐ κωλυτέον γαμεῖν, οὐδὲ μὲν κρεωφαγεῖν, "We must not forbid to marry, nor yet to eat flesh." The apostle, saith Tertullian,† notes them who wholly forbade marriage, and interdicted meats. And Epiphanius saith,‡ This of the apostle is fulfilled in the Cataphrygæ and other heretics, for most of them, τοῦ γαμεῖν κωλύουσιν, ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων παραγγέλλουσιν, "forbid marriage, and command to abstain from meats." This, in effect, is the interpretation of all the ancient commentators on the place, who give us the same sense of the words as do the fathers cited; and of all the translations, which, though they do not add the word commanding, yet they add a copulative, and change the infinitive into a participle, thus, Prohibentes nubere, et abstinentes à cibis, Syriac; Prohibentes matrimonium, et amoventes cibos, Arabic. And Bochart gives us instances of the like nature from the Old Testament, viz. Gen. xxxi. 40, "By the heat of the day was I burnt, and by the frost of the night (obrigescebam) I waxed stiff with cold;" Ps. cxxi. 6, "The sun shall not burn thee by day, nor the moon (refrigerate thee) by night:" so Luke xiii. 9, "If it bring forth fruit (it shall stand), if not, thou shalt cut it down."

That all these things happened in the apostle's times, and many of them were to happen before the destruction of Jerusalem, is evident; that there was to be a great apostasy before that time, carried on by prophets and false Christs, our Lord expressly had foretold; and that in great measure it had obtained, especially among the Jews, we learn from the Epistle to the Hebrews, writ purposely to put a stop to it; that the great promoters of it were "deceitful workers, false apostles," and that they carried on that work in hypocrisy, esteeming gain godliness, this apostle doth often inform us (see 2 Cor. ii. 17, xi. 13—15); that they were men whose minds and consciences were defiled, see Tit. i. 15; that their doctrine was this, "It is good for a man not to touch a woman," 1 Cor. vii. 1; their vain philosophy this, "Taste not" (forbidden meats), "handle not" (an unclean thing), see Col. ii. 21. It remains only to consider, who they should be: that they could not be the Gnostics, the followers of Simon Magus, I have proved against Dr. Hammond, note on Col. ii. 21. Moreover, according to his exposition, they were to appear before the destruction of Jerusalem; for he interprets these words, "The Spirit speaketh expressly" of our Lord's prediction, Matt. xxiv. Now there were no such heretics among the Gnostics until the second century. Saturninus, saith Theodoret,* "was the first who named matrimony the doctrine of devils, and taught men to abstain from living creatures." Now this Saturninus was before Basilides,† who by Jerome,‡ is often called "the father of the Gnostics;" whereas that these men were in the apostle's times, we learn, saith Tertullian,§ from the apostles themselves. I have noted on 1 Cor. vii. 1, and on Col. ii. 21 conjectured, that they were the Essenes among the Jews; and that with them agreed the magicians and idolaters among the heathens, we learn from Clemens of Alexandria, who speaking of those heretics, who said "the resurrection had passed on them already, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο ἀθετοῦσι τὸν γάμον, and therefore rejected matrimony," he saith this was not peculiar to these Menandrians,‖ "but they who worshipped idols did also abstain from meats and venery; and the magicians, who worshipped angels and demons, did also carefully abstain from wine, from living creatures, and from venery."

And if Saturninus, who succeeded Menander, who flourished in the time of Domitian and Trajan, did in this, as in most other things, τὰ αὐτὰ τῷ Μενάνδρῳ ψευδολογῆσαι, "agree in sentiments with Menander," as Eusebius¶ saith he did, the apostle may reasonably be conceived to include him: for Epiphanius saith of him in the very words of Irenæus, that†† "he affirmed that to marry, and beget children, was from Satan, and that hence many of them abstained from living creatures; and by this feigned continence seduced many to their heresy." And this is the more likely, because it is noted of this Menander, that he proceeded εἰς ἄκρον τῆς μαγίας, "to the height of that magic," which was attended with that abstinence, Iren. lib. i. cap. 21, Euseb. H. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 26. It is no objection against this interpretation, that the Essenes mentioned by Philo and Josephus were not Christians, and so could not "depart from the faith:" for who can prove that none of them embraced the faith of Christ, or that they could not do it, and yet retain their old sentiments concerning meats and marriage? It may be also true, that the Menandrians were not yet formed into a sect when this epistle was indited; but that affects not my interpretation, since it is certain from 1 Cor. viii. 1, Col. ii. 16 (see the notes there), that their doctrines obtained before; and that the persons here intended must be Judaizers, is fairly gathered from ver. 7, and from these words, "Commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them that believe and know the truth;" for those last words show, that these persons were such as had no faith, or knowledge of that Christian truth, that "every creature of God was good (for food), and nothing was to be refused," as polluted or unclean, ver. 4. Add to this, that Dr. Lightfoot, note on Acts xv. 20, quotes this passage from Bava Bathra, fol. 602, viz. that "when the temple was destroyed the second time, the pharisees (i. e. separatists) were greatly multiplied in Israel, who taught that it was not lawful to eat flesh, or to drink wine," and a little after say, "It is but just that we should ordain among ourselves not to marry wives, nor beget children:" and if these pharisees then espoused these tenets, they may be the persons here noted by the apostle. Thus I have given my own opinion concerning the true and primary import of these words. Others, I know, conceive that they refer to the apostasy of the church of Rome, and therefore descant on them thus:

Ver. 1. "But (in opposition to this mystery of godliness, mentioned iii. 15, 16, there is another mystery of iniquity, of which) the Spirit speaketh expressly (Dan. xi. 36—39, saying), that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to erroneous spirits and doctrines of devils."

Ver. 1. Ἐν ὑστέροις, In the latter days.] That is, in the times of antichrist, 1 John ii. 18, Dan. ii. 44 (see Hos. iii. 5, Micah iv. 1).

Ἀποστήσονται τῆς πίστεως, Some shall depart from the faith.] Idolatry being represented in the Old Testament as apostasy from the law of Moses, and the God of Israel, the like idolatry in the church of Rome may well be counted an apostasy from the Christian faith.

Προσέχοντες πνεύμασι πλάνοις, Giving heed to seducing spirits.] i. e. Men acted by seducing spirits; for πνεύματα doth often signify the impulses or afflatuses of good or evil spirits; of good, so 1 Cor. xiv. 12, "You are zealous, πνευμάτων, of spiritual gifts," or afflatuses, and so throughout the chapter; of evil spirits, as 1 John iv. 1, "Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits." Accordingly, the coming of the man of sin is to be κατ' ἐνέργειαν τοῦ Σατανᾶ, "according to the energy of Satan, with all lying wonders" (2 Thess. ii. 9): so was the idolatrous worship of the gentiles promoted, say Tertullian,* Eusebius,† and Chrysostom;‡ so also was the worship of saints promoted in the church of Rome (see Mr. Mede, lib. iii. cap. 3, 4).

Καὶ διδασκαλίαις δαιμονίων, And to doctrines of devils;] i. e. To the heathen theology concerning demons, or giving heed to the doctrine concerning the worship of dead men, or departed saints, brought in by their pretended apparitions and wonders wrought at their tombs after death, which were indeed, if at all done, wrought by the illusions of devils.

Ver. 2. Ἐν ὑποκρίσει, Which apostasy shall be promoted.] By the hypocrisy of liars, which have their conscience seared.

Through the hypocrisy, &c.] Hence it is argued, that they, who thus promote and carry on this apostasy, must not be open deserters, but hypocritical professors of that faith, from which they by their actions virtually depart.

Ver. 3. Κωλυόντων γαμεῖν, Forbidding to marry.] "(And the men I speak of may be discerned by these marks, that they are) of those who forbid to marry, and command to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth:" as is done in the Roman church to monks and nuns, (see Mr. Mede, lib. iii. cap. 7), and to the clergy; and that, saith pope Siricius, quoniam qui in carne sunt, Deo placere non possunt, "because they that are in the flesh cannot please God."

Ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων, To abstain from meats.] That this is done in the Roman church, by a law obliging some orders of monks to abstain from all flesh, see Mr. Mede, ibid.: and this may well be reckoned as a character of apostasy from the Christian faith, because it seems to be a reducing of them back from their Christian liberty, to a conformity to the legal rites.

[7] Ver. 5. Ἁγιάζεται, It is sanctified.] So the Jews from these words, Ps. cxxxiv. 2, "Lift up your hands (קדש, ad sanctitatem), and bless the Lord," gather, that the benediction is the sanctification of the meat, and that it is not lawful to eat of it till it be thus sanctified (Buxt. Syn. Jud. cap. 12, p. 241).

[8] Ver. 8. Σωματικὴ γυμνασία, Bodily exercise.] The apostle in the former verse exhorted Timothy, γυμνάζειν, to exercise himself unto godliness, as the athletics did, in the Olympic games, exercise themselves for their combats; adding here, that their exercises, though they were very hard and difficult, tended little to profit, they striving for mastery only that they might obtain "a corruptible crown," 1 Cor. ix. 25; whereas that piety, in which he did advise him to exercise himself, was "profitable for all things;" or, because Philo makes mention τῶν συνεχῶν πόνων, "of the continual labours" of the Essenes,§ and Josephus,‖ of their ἐργασίαι, or "exercises morning and evening," he perhaps may oppose unto them this exercise of piety.

[9] Ver. 10. Ὅς ἐστι σωτὴρ πάντων ἀνθρώπων, Who is the Saviour of all men.] The author of the book De Vocatione Gentium expounds this very well, telling us, that "by saying (lib. ii. cap. 31), 'He is the Saviour of all men,' he confirms the general goodness of God towards all men; and by adding, 'especially of them that believe,' he shows there is one part of mankind, which, through the benefit of divinely-inspired faith, is, by special benefits, advanced to the highest and eternal felicity." He is the Saviour of all men, (1.) Leaving none of them without some testimonies of his goodness (Acts xiv. 17), sufficient to engage and direct them so to seek the Lord, that they may find him (Acts xvii. 27), lib. ii. 5, Nulli nationi hominum bonitatis suæ dona subtraxit, saith the same author. (2.) Showing to them so much of himself, i. e. of his eternal power and godhead, as might render them inexcusable, in that they "did not glorify him as God, neither were they thankful" (Rom. i. 20, 21); and writing in their hearts the law of nature, which enabled them by nature to do the things of the law, and made their consciences accuse them, when they neglected so to do; (Rom. ii. 14, 15), they knowing so far the righteousness of God, that "they who did those things" which were contrary to the law of nature, "were worthy of death" (Rom. i. 32): for, adhibita est semper universis hominibus quædam supernæ mensura doctrinæ, quæ etsi occultioris, parciorisque gratiæ fuit, suffecit tamen quibusdam ad remedium, omnibus ad testimonium. (3.) Accepting every where him that worked righteousness, of what nation soever he might be (Acts x. 35), and accounting him as circumcised who kept the righteousness of the law (Rom. ii. 26): and, lastly, rewarding the good deeds of all that diligently sought him (Heb. xi. 6). Mr. Clerc understands this salvation of deliverance from temporal dangers, in which sense it is also true; but that cannot be the entire sense of the apostle, who had said before, ver. 8, that "godliness had the promise of this life, and that which is to come," i. e. both of temporal and eternal salvation; and adds, ver. 9, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation;" i. e. that not temporal only but eternal blessings are to be expected from him, and that therefore they, the apostles, laboured and suffered reproach, "because they trusted in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men;" whereas, doubtless, they did this, not only with respect to temporal, but especially to eternal salvation (1 Cor. iv. 17).

[10] Ver. 12. Τὴν νεότητα, Thy youth.] The presbyters were generally in those times aged, as their name imports; but Timothy, because the gift of prophecy had pointed him out for that work (ver. 14), and because the gifts of the Spirit had rendered him fit, was made an evangelist in his younger age, and therefore the apostle doth exhort him to make up in the excellency of his doctrine, and the gravity of his conversation, what was wanting in his age.

[11] Ver. 13.] Here, First, It is well noted by the fathers, and by Esthius, that if Timothy, who had spiritual gifts, was yet, by Paul, commanded to be thus diligent in reading the scriptures, that in his exhortations he might profit others, then much more should other bishops and ministers be so, quos omnes Paulus in Timotheo instruit; then also should they not depend upon extemporary effusions, without attendance unto reading.

Secondly, That the illumination or gifts of the Holy Spirit should not hinder our diligence in reading and studying what we are to exhort others to, and instruct them in: for, saith Theodoret, it becomes us to bring our labour, καὶ οὕτω λαμβάνειν τὴν χάριν τοῦ Πνεύματος, "and so to receive the grace of the Spirit.

[12] Ver. 14. Μετὰ ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν πρεσβυτερίου, With the imposition of the hands of the presbytery.] The χάρισμα, or spiritual gift here mentioned, is expressly said to be given, διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν μου, by the laying on of the hands of Paul, 2 Tim. i. 6; the giving of the spiritual gifts seeming to be peculiar to this or some other act of an apostle, Acts viii. 17, xix. 6. But other seniors, or presbyters, as Irenæus, lib. iv. cap. 43, calls them, qui cum episcopatus successione charisma veritatis certum acceperunt, "who with their succession received the certain charisma of truth," might and did lay on their hands together with him. This ceremony of imposition of hands in ordination is confirmed from the practice of the apostles and apostolical men, thus ordaining deacons, Acts vi. 6, pastors, or teachers of the word, Acts xiii. 3, elders, whether bishops or presbyters, in every city, Acts xiv. 23, and evangelists, here. And this practice they certainly derived from the Jews, who created governors of criminal causes, or ruling elders, and masters, doctors, and rabbins, to be teachers of the law; i. e. to labour in the word and doctrine, by that imposition of hands which they called סמיכה, as Moses did to Joshua, Numb. xxvii. 18, Deut. xxxiv. 9, and as Maimonides* saith he did when he assumed the Seventy to assist him; and as the first-born† "laid their hands upon the Levites," Numb. viii. 10, who were chosen to serve in their stead, and so consecrated them to God in their name. And this way of consecration, by imposition of hands, say they, came down from Joshua,‡ "by a perpetual succession to their rabbins." Though therefore I scarce find any footsteps of it in the first century, or second, yet Cyprian, in the third, speaks of it as that which, de traditione divinâ et apostolicâ observatione servandum est et tenendum, "was to be observed and held from divine tradition, and apostolical observation, in the collation of the episcopal office," and as that which they§ practised in the ordination of Sabinus to that office. Eusebius saith,‖ Origen also was thus advanced to the presbytery by the bishops of Cæsarea: and the Apostolical Constitutions give us this as an ordinance of John the apostle,¶ who, doubtless, when he returned from Patmos to Ephesus, regulating the churches, and constituting bishops, did it according to the rites of the Jews, and practice of the other apostles; whence I conclude, this is no accidental but a necessary rite of the due ordination of bishops, presbyters, and deacons.

1 [1] Rebuke not [2] an elder (with severity), but intreat him as a father; and the younger men as brethren (in respect of thy youth, iv. 12);

2 [3] The elder women as mothers; the younger as sisters, (being careful to converse with them, when necessity requires it,) with all purity (with gravity in your words and countenance, observance of your eyes and heart, at times and places which can minister no suspicion of undue behaviour towards them).

5 Now she that is a widow indeed, and [7] desolate (being left quite alone, without any children to relieve her), [8] trusteth in God, and continueth in supplications and prayers night and day.

6 But [9] she that liveth in pleasure (licentiously) is dead (to God) while she (thus) liveth (and so is not to be respected as a vital member of the church, or nourished by her).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1. Μὴ ἐπιπλήξῃς, Rebuke not.] The word signifies to chastise, or rebuke with severity, and sometimes with stripes.

[2] Πρεσβυτέρου, An elder.] In the judgment of Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, the "elder" here signifies, οὐ τὸν ἱερέα, ἀλλὰ τὸν γεγηρακότα, "not a priest, but a grave ancient man," such being, in all ages and nations, styled fathers; and this sense the distinction here, of ages and of sexes, seems to plead for.

[3] Ver. 2. Πρεσβυτέρας, The elder women.] "The widows of the church," saith Dr. Hammond, very improbably; they being mentioned particularly in the sequel of the chapter.

[4] Ver. 3. Τίμα, Honour.] i. e. Yield them reverence and alimony; for that provision for them is included in this "honour," is evident from ver. 4 and 8. Thus, not to give parents what is needful for them, is to transgress the precept which commands us to "honour our father and our mother," Mark vii. 10—12. So Acts xxviii. 10, πολλαῖς τιμαῖς ἐτίμησαν ἡμᾶς, "They honoured us with many honours, giving us, τὰ πρὸς τὴν χρείαν, such things as were necessary," Hence, in the Jerusalem Targum,* Honorare, est viaticum providere; "To honour is to make provision for any person:" so here, "Honour widows;" that is, saith Theophylact, τὰ ἀναγκαῖα χορήγει, "provide them necessaries" (see note on Mark vii. 10).

[5] Τὰς ὄντως χήρας, That are widows indeed.] Answering that name, by being χηρεῦσαι, "desolate," and destitute of any other to relieve them, and being also exemplarily pious (ver. 5). "Widows," saith Cotelerius, hath divers significations; it signifies, (1.) Any woman that survives her husband. (2.) Poor women, who, after the death of their husbands, need the alms of the church (as here). (3.) Such as consecrated themselves to God, professing perpetual widowhood (ver. 5). (4.) Such as were chose into the ecclesiastical ministry, or made deaconesses (ver. 9). That there should be any ἀειπαρθένοι, or persons that were always virgins, called, τὰς παρθένους, τὰς λεγομένας χήρας, widows; though the passage of Ignatius, according to Vossius's reading, seems to make for it; yet, according to the reading of Bishop Usher (ἀειπαρθένους καὶ χήρας), it makes against it; and virgo vidua, "a virgin widow," that is admitted to the degree of a deaconess, is, in Tertullian's language,† a miracle or monster in the church. It is certain, such a one could be none of the apostle's widows here; for he supposeth his widows may have children, ver. 4, and expressly forbids any to be chosen into the number of widows, that hath not nourished or brought up children, ver. 9, 10; and it is not reasonable to conceive the church of Smyrna should so soon transgress against this rule of the apostle, or that this famous martyr should approve such a violation of the apostle's precept.

Note also, That the reading of Bishop Usher is confirmed from the like words, ἡ παρθένος, καὶ ἡ χήρα, found in the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. iii. cap. 6.

[6] Ver. 4. Μανθανέτωσαν πρῶτον τὸν ἴδιον οἶκον εὐσεβεῖν, Let them learn first to show piety at home.] The apostle here speaks of the care the children should take to nourish their parents, which are widows, πρῶτον, before they suffer them to be burdensome to the church, as it is evident from ver. 16, which saith, "If any man or woman have widows (belonging to their families), let them relieve them, and let not the church be charged with them;" and also from the following words here, "and to requite their parents," which only can belong unto the children, and was always reckoned an act of piety towards them,* "as, after God, the authors of our being;" whence anciently they were so reverenced, saith Simplicius,† "as to be called gods."

[7] Ver. 5. Μεμονωμένη, Solitary.] So Philo saith, the widow of the priest, which hath no children, must return to her father's house, as ἀνδρὸς καὶ παίδων ἔρημος, οὐδεμίαν ἔχουσα καταφυγήν, "having no other refuge, when destitute of husband and children, but her father;" but if she have sons, or daughters, it is necessary that the mother should be placed with her children, υἱοὶ καὶ θυγατέρες τῆς τοῦ γεννήσαντος οἰκίας ὄντες,‡ "for sons and daughters, being of the house of their parents, draw the mother to it:" whence also we learn, what it is to "show pity to their own house," ver. 4, viz. to do it to their parents.

[8] Ἤλπικεν ἐπὶ τὸν Θεόν, Trusteth in God.] i. e. Having no other helper, she reposeth herself on him alone, committing herself to him, by constant prayer, for his help. This is Cotelerius's third kind of widows, compared, by the author of the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. iii. cap. 1, to the widow of Sarepta, and to Anna the daughter of Phanuel, mentioned Luke ii. 36, who does not oblige herself, by vow or promise so to do, but only remains single, ἐῶσαν ἔχουσα χηρείας, "as having the gift of widowhood." So Jerome describes those widows in these words, Honora viduas, quæ verè viduæ sunt, hoc est, quæ omni suorum auxilio destitutæ sunt, quæ manibus suis laborare non possunt, quas paupertas debilitat, ætasque conficit, quibus Deus spes est, et omne opus oratio (Ep. ad Gerontiam).

[9] Ver. 6. Ἡ δὲ σπαταλῶσα, She that liveth in pleasure.] This word properly signifies to feed deliciously, and drink choice liquors; τῇ γαστρὶ ζῆν μόνῃ, "to live only for the belly," saith Chrysostom. So Ezek. xvi. 49, "This was the sin of thy sister Sodom, in pride, in fullness of bread, καὶ ἐν εὐθηνίᾳ ἐσπωράλων, and in abundance, she and her daughters rioted;" Amos vi. 4, "They lie upon beds of ivory, καὶ κατασπαταλῶντες, and, abounding with superfluities, they eat lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall:" and because such eating and drinking provoke to carnal pleasures, it is joined with them; as when the apostle saith, "Ye have lived in pleasure and been wanton," Gr. ἐσπαταλήσατε, James v. 5. Such a woman "is dead while she liveth," according to that of the Jews,* "The just in their death are styled living; the wicked, whilst they live, are styled dead" (Maimonides).

[10] Ver. 8. Ἔστιν ἀπίστου χείρων, He is worse than an infidel.] For they put this among the first and most indissoluble principles of nature, requiring us, πρῶτα θεοὺς τιμᾶν, μετέπειτα τοκῆας;† "first to honour the gods and then our parents;" placing among the things in which they are to be honoured, χρημάτων χορηγίαν καὶ σώματος ὑπηρεσίαν, "the making provision for them, and serving them with our bodies." So Aristotle‡ saith, "We must rather make provision for them than for ourselves, and yield them, τιμὴν καθάπερ θεοῖς, honour, as they do unto the gods." Plutarch§ saith, that "all men, though some may think otherwise, say, that nature, and the law of nature, require, that parents should have the highest honour next the gods; that men can do nothing more acceptable to the gods, than by readily heaping favours upon their parents, and that nothing is a greater evidence of atheism or impiety, than to despise them." Some here are guilty of a great mistake, scraping together great fortunes, and hoarding them up for their children, with a scandalous neglect of that charity to their Christian brethren, which alone can sanctify those enjoyments to them, and enable them to "lay up a good foundation against the time to come;" pleading these words to justify, or to excuse their sordid parsimony, and want of charity, that "he that provideth not for his own household, hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel;" whereas these words plainly respect the provision which children should make for their parents, and not that which parents should make for their children.

[11] Ver. 9. Χήρα καταλεγέσθω μὴ, Let not a widow be taken into the number.] The apostle now comes to speak of such widows as were not only to be maintained by the church (for they were doubtless to receive her alms, if really they were poor, without these qualifications), but of such as were to be admitted into the number of deaconesses, whose office it was to instruct the younger women, to attend the women when sick and in labour, and to assist at the baptism of the female sex.

[12] Μὴ ἔλαττον ἑξήκοντα, Not less than sixty years old.] It is the mistake of Zonaras, Balsamon, and Blastares, to think to reconcile this with the fifteenth canon of the council of Chalcedon, and the fourteenth of Trullo, by saying, That widows might only be admitted deaconesses at sixty, but virgins at forty. This last was done in after-ages, and after that Apostolical Constitution, which, agreeably to Paul,

10 Being also)Well reported of for good works; [11] if (εἰ, that) she have brought up children, if (that) she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work.

11 But the younger widows refuse: for when they have begun to [15] wax wanton against (or, grow weary of) Christ, they will marry; saith, lib. iii. cap. 1, χήρας δὲ καθιστᾶτε μὴ ἔλαττον ἐτῶν ἑξήκοντα, "Let not the widows be constituted under sixty years;" and they who first began to alter the time, did at last take away the office.

[13] Γεγονυῖα ἑνὸς ἀνδρὸς γυνὴ, Being the wife of one husband.] i. e. One who had not divorced herself from one, and married another husband; for otherwise, the younger widows, whom Paul bids to marry, could never be admitted deaconesses, though they had all the other qualifications. That such divorces were then common on the wife's side both among Jews and gentiles, we learn, concerning the Romans, from the complaint of Seneca,* that "none in his time blushed at it, their noble women marrying that they might divorce themselves, and there being scarce any marriages without divorces." Cicero† complains of many things of this kind, which happened in his time. Plutarch‡ mentions it as a thing common, and customarily done by any women that were jealous; and the law among the Athenians§ allowed it: instances we have of it in Justin Martyr‖ and Tertullian.¶ And that this also was frequent in the practice of the Jews, and allowed by their rabbins, see note on 1 Cor. vii. 11. I confess that univira, the wife of one husband, in Livy, lib. x. cap. 23, is one, quæ uni viro nupta fuisset, ad quem virgo deducta sit, who from her virginity had been married only to one man; and that univira sacerdos bears the same sense in Trebellius Pollio, c. de Tito, p. 795, and that this monogamy was counted honourable, even among the heathens; and they who were content with it, wore pudicitiæ coronam, "the crown of chastity" (Val. Max. lib. ii. cap. 1); whereas they who proceeded to a second marriage, sacerdotio arcebantur, "were thought unworthy of the priesthood," as Servius notes upon those words of Virgil (Æn. iv. 19), Huic uni forsan potui succumbere culpæ: and the flamines, among the Romans, were to be the "husbands of one wife," and the flaminicæ, the "wives of one husband" (Rhodig. Lect. Antiq. lib. xxviii. cap. 22). That therefore the sacred ministers in the church of Christ might be nothing inferior to those of heathens, the apostle may require that, in this sense, the bishop should be the "husband of one wife," and the deaconess the "wife of one husband."

[14] Ver. 10. Εἰ ἐτεκνοτρόφησεν, If she hath brought up children.] That εἰ signifies that, as well as if, see note on Acts xxvi. 23, Εἰ παθητὸς ὁ Χριστὸς, εἰ πρῶτος, &c., "That Christ hath suffered," and "that he was the first that rose from the dead;" and that so it should be rendered here, the word μαρτυρουμένη, "testified," seems to require: for a testimony of the good works of others is, that they have done such and such laudable actions.

12 Having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith.

13 And withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not.

14 I will therefore that the younger women (rather) marry, bear children, guide the house, (and so) give none occasion to the adversary (of Christianity) to speak reproachfully (of it.

15 The necessity of which precept is too great,) For some (of these young widows) are already [16] turned aside after Satan.

16 If any man or woman that believeth have widows (belonging to their family), let them relieve them, and let not the church be charged (with them); that (being free from that charge) it may (the better be able to) relieve them that are widows indeed (that is, are wholly destitute of help, ver. 5).

17 Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of [17] double honour (i. e. of a more liberal maintenance), [18] especially they who labour in the word and doctrine.

have waxed wanton against Christ.] That is, say Chrysostom and Œcumenius, ὅταν ἀκκισθῶσιν, "when they have cast off or fastidiously refused and rejected Christ; ὅταν καταβλακευσθῶσιν, when they have contemned, and made light of him; when they do βαρέως φέρειν, καὶ ἀποσπᾶν τὸς ἡνίας, bear Christ's yoke grievously, and cast off his reins:" so Hesychius and Phavorinus. So that this phrase signifies to cast off Christ and Christianity, and, as the apostle afterward explains it, ἐκτρέπεσθαι, "to turn from him after Satan," or to fall off from him to heathenism or Judaism; and then, πρώτην πίστιν ἀθετεῖν, "to violate their first faith," cannot be to violate the promise made, when chosen into the order of widows, not to marry, but their faith given unto Christ at baptism; the other, if any such promise were then made, being not their first, but second faith. So Chrysostom and Œcumenius expound it, from those words of the apostle to the Corinthians; "I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin unto Christ."

[16] Ver. 15. Ἐξετράπησαν ὀπίσω τοῦ Σατανᾶ, Have turned aside after Satan.] The converting men to the Christian faith, being the turning men "from the power of Satan unto God" (Acts xxvi. 18); the "rescuing men from the snare of the devil, who were taken captive by him at his will" (2 Tim. ii. 26), and who "walked according to the prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2); the casting off the faith may well be styled, the "turning aside after Satan."

[17] Ver. 17. Διπλῆς τιμῆς, Double honour.] That is, τῆς ἐλευθερίου τροφῆς, "of a liberal maintenance" out of the public stock; it signifies, saith Chrysostom, τὴν τῶν ἀναγκαίων χορηγίαν, "provision of things necessary," as is evident from the reason following, ver. 18, "The labourer is worthy of his hire."

[18] Μάλιστα οἱ κοπιῶντες ἐν λόγῳ καὶ διδασκαλίᾳ, Especially those who labour in the word and doctrine.] Οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, the elders among the Jews were of two sorts: first, such as governed in the synagogue; and, secondly, such as ministered in reading and expounding their scriptures and traditions, and from them pronouncing what did bind or loose, or what was forbidden, and what was lawful to be done:* for when, partly by their captivity, and partly through increase and traffic, they were dispersed in considerable bodies through divers regions of the world, it was necessary they should have governors or magistrates to keep them in their duty, and judge of criminal causes, and also rabbins to teach them the law, and the traditions of their fathers, the first were ordained, ab judicandum, sed non ad docendum de licitis et vetitis, "to judge and govern, but not to teach;" the second, ad docendum, sed non ad judicandum, "to teach, but not to judge or govern:" and these the apostle here declares to be the most honourable, and worthy of the chiefest reward: accordingly the apostle, reckoning up the offices God hath appointed in the church, places "teachers" before "governments," 1 Cor. xii. 28.

[19] Ver. 18. Λέγει γὰρ ἡ γραφὴ, For the scripture saith.] The former words, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn," being expressly found in Deut. xxv. 4, and the latter, expressly in the Gospel of Luke, x. 7, and with a little variation, Matt. x. 10, and in no other place in scripture (for in Lev. xix. 13, and Deut. xxiv. 14, there is nothing to this purpose), it follows, that Paul must here reckon the gospel of Luke among the holy scriptures; from which such doctrines, as he is now teaching, may be infallibly confirmed. Note,

Secondly, That the apostle, both here and 1 Cor. ix. 9, proves this from what was written in the law of Moses, applying in both places that which primarily must belong to the Jewish priesthood, to the preachers of the gospel; and hence allowing us to argue for the maintenance of the latter, by analogy to what was appointed for the former; as the apostle himself doth in this very case, in these words, "Do you not know, that they who minister about (legally) holy things, eat of the things of the temple; and that they which wait at the altar, are partakers with the altar?" i. e. are fed and liberally maintained, by the portions God allowed them of what was offered at his altar; "even so hath the Lord Christ appointed, that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel," 1 Cor. ix. 14. Whence note,

Thirdly, That this is a standing ordinance of Christ, to continue as long as the preaching of the gospel doth, built upon reasons of equal obligations at all times; the labourer being always worthy of his hire; the shepherd to eat of the milk of the flock, and he that soweth spirituals, to reap carnals, 1 Cor. ii. 7. 10, 11. Note,

Fourthly, From whom this reward is to be received; from them amongst whom these pastors labour, to whom they sow spiritual things, and who are taught by them: for, "Let him," saith the apostle, "who is taught in the word communicate to him that teacheth in all good things," Gal. vi. 6. So that he is to have a supply of all things needful for the discharge of his function here, double honour, i. e. a liberal maintenance. Note, Fifthly, That as the command of being charitable to the poor, gives just occasion to those laws which are made in all communities to oblige men, according to their abilities, to distribute to the necessities of the poor; because, otherwise, the general rules of scripture would not be obeyed, nor the poor provided for: so the standing ordinance of Christ and his apostles, concerning the "double honour" due to them who "labour in the word and doctrine," and the "communicating to them in all good things," justifies these laws which ascertain what shall be communicated to them; since otherwise, it is much to be feared, the general rules of scripture concerning this matter would not be obeyed, nor the clergy sufficiently provided for.

[20] Ver. 19. Κατὰ πρεσβυτέρου.] The "elder" here seems to relate not to one who was such by age, but by office, because the apostle was before speaking, ver. 17, of "elders which rule well," or "laboured in the word and doctrine:" and whereas the law had taken care that no man should be condemned, but "by the mouth of two or three witnesses," the apostle, knowing how much the church would suffer by the rash accusations of her governors, bishops, and presbyters, seems to rise higher, not suffering an accusation to be admitted against them, without the like number of witnesses.

[21] Ver. 20. Τοὺς ἁμαρτάνοντας, i. e. Them that sin]

* Morin. de Ordin. par. iii. exer. 7, cap. 4. Buxt. in voce, סמיכה.

Christ (whom thou servest, and by whose authority thou actest in this ministry), and [22] the elect angels (who are inspectors and observers of what is done in the churches, 1 Cor. xi. 10), that thou observe these things without preferring one before another (out of favour to their persons), doing nothing by partiality.

22 [23] Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins: keep thyself pure (from them).

23 [24] Drink no longer water (only), but use a little wine (together with it) for thy stomach's sake and (for) thine often infirmities.

24 (And, to preserve thee from mistake, or rash proceeding, either in ordinations, ver. 22, or in rebuking the scandalous offender, consider, that) Some men's sins are open (and discernible) beforehand (i. e. before any witnesses are come in against them), going before to (or, for) judgment (or, to bring the censures of the church upon them); and (in) some men they follow after (i. e. their evil dispositions appear afterward).

25 [25] Likewise also the good works of some are manifest beforehand (and so less examination is needful concerning them); and they that (i. e. whose works) are otherwise cannot be (long) hid (their vices will, by information of others they converse with, or by temptation, and their own evil inclinations, be at last discovered).

Grievously and scandalously, and are convinced of their offences before two or three witnesses, were to be rebuked, saith Theodoret, πάντων παρόντων, "in the presence of all;" such public censures being, according to the custom of the church, done by the presidents or rulers of the church, ὑπὸ πλειόνων, "before and with the consent of all," as Tertullian* saith (see note on 2 Cor. ii. 6).

[22] Ver. 21. And our Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels.] He joins the angels with Jesus Christ, saith Theodoret, οὐχ ὡς ὁμοτίμους, ἀλλ' ὡς δούλους, "not as equal in honour, but as servants to him," and those who are to attend him at the great day of judgment.

[23] Ver. 22. Χεῖρας ταχέως μηδενὶ ἐπιτίθει, Lay hands suddenly on no man.] This, saith the reverend Dr. Hammond, belongs to "the laying on of the bishop's hand in absolving penitents:" saith the reverend Bishop of Worcester, to "the laying of hands on bishops, priests, and deacons;" (1.) Because Paul had not mentioned laying on of hands in relation to penitents in this epistle, but he had done it with respect to ordination, and that in Timothy's own case, iv. 14. (2.) Because the apostle, in this epistle, gives no rules concerning the qualifications of penitents, saying nothing what penitents were to be reconciled, and after what time, and under what conditions they were to have hands laid on them, in token of reconciliation; nor is there a concurrent evidence of such a practice so early in the church; but he had given rules touching bishops and deacons, and their qualifications; and therefore we have more cause to apply it according to the chief intention and design of this epistle. (3.) Because the great use of laying on of hands, in the New Testament, is for the setting persons apart for the discharge of a sacred office; so it was in the first institution of deacons, Acts vi. 6, and of Paul and Barnabas to a particular charge, Acts xiii. 2, 3. This was an ancient ceremony among the Jews, in the solemn designation of persons to sacred offices, Numb. xxvii. 18. 23, Deut. xxxiv. 9, either to be rulers or teachers in their synagogues; and from thence it was brought into the church, in the solemn designation of persons to the ministry. And, (4.) if these words do not relate to ordination, Paul would have given Timothy no particular direction about that which was one main part of his office; wherefore, as he left Titus at Crete, to "ordain elders in every city;" so, doubtless, Timothy had the same commission, which yet is nowhere intimated but in these words. And, according to this sense, the following words are capable of a very good meaning, thus; Be not partaker of the sins of them, who rashly, and without due qualifications, rush upon sacred offices; for by want of due examination, and trial of them, thou wilt become partaker of their guilt.

[24] Ver. 23.] So Justin Martyr* saith, that wine is to be used "for the help of the body, and the cure of inward distempers." And Plato† saith it was given for the health and strength of the body. The Essenes abstained wholly from wine (see note on Col. ii. 21), but the Gnostics‡ freely used it, when they went to the heathen feasts, and otherwise.

[25] Ver. 25.] I find three expositions of these words: the first is that of Basil and Austin, which refers them to the judgment of God, thus: The good and evil works of some men are so manifest, that they may be discerned of all men before the day of judgment, and so, in discerning them, thou canst not err; but if they be latent here, and so escape thy examination and censure, they will be manifested at the great day of their accounts.

2. Others, referring this to the censures of the church, the ἐπιτιμία, mentioned ver. 20, make the sense run thus: Some men's sins are so open and notorious, as to bring them under the censures of the church, by way of precedent merit; others appear more criminal after the censures passed upon them, and so less fit to be absolved; and some men's reformation, or good works, are so manifest after censure, as to evidence they deserve absolution; and if they continue evil, or do but few good works, that also will be in time discernible: so that thou mayest know who are fit to be absolved, who not. But against this exposition there lies this objection, That no man should incur the censures of the church, but by way of precedent merit; and so no man's evil works, for which he is to be censured, should follow after that act of discipline: and, secondly, the last clause of the last verse seems, by the antithesis, to refer not to evil, but to good works, though done as the works of charity ought to be, so as not to be observed by men.

3. The ancient Greek expositors, with Grotius, refer these words to ordination, thus: When I said, "Lay hands suddenly on no man," I spake not of men whose good or bad works are manifest beforehand; for they, without farther discussion or examination, may be admitted, or are to be rejected: but of those whose vices or good works are latent; for they, after examination and inquiry, cannot be long hid: and so, if thou be not hasty in laying on of hands, thou timely mayest discover them; or if by this means thou canst not do it, thou wilt not be partaker with the sinner, as having done as much as was in thy power to discover them.

CHAPTER VI.

1 Let as many servants as are under the yoke (of bondage to the heathens) count their own masters worthy of all (due) honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed (or evil spoken of, as tending to dissolve those civil obligations, but rather honoured in all estates of men, as tending to make them better in their several relations, Tit. ii. 10, and more subject even to hard and froward masters, 1 Pet. ii. 18).

2 And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are (advanced to be) brethren (and so equal to them in Christ); but rather (let them) do them service, because they are faithful (of the household of faith) and beloved (of God), [1] partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort.

3 If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, [2] even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, (Matt. xx. 27, He that would be first among you, let him be your servant; or, servant of all, Mark x. 44,) and to the doctrine which is according to godliness;

4 He is proud (Gr. puffed up), knowing nothing, but doting (sick) about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings,

5 Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness: [3] from such withdraw thyself.

6 But (whatsoever they esteem so, we know that) godliness with (that) [4] contentment (which attends it) is great gain.

7 (I say, with contentment, which it becometh us to have;)For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out (of it).

8 And having (ἔχοντες δὲ, having therefore) food and raiment let us be therewith content.

9 But (for) they [5] that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition.

10 For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 2. Οἱ τῆς εὐεργεσίας ἀντιλαμβανόμενοι.] These words, being not connected to the preceding by καὶ, and the article οἱ showing that they relate not to the predicate, but to the subject, will be best rendered thus; "Because they who partake of the benefit of the service are faithful and beloved;" and therefore more worthy of their service, the more they are honoured of God, and of the number of them whom we stand bound to serve in love.

That the Gnostics taught any such doctrine, that Christian servants were not obliged to obey their heathen or their Christian masters, there is not the least hint in any of the commentators on this place, or in any of the fathers, who have given us the largest account of their doctrines: I find, in the epistle of Ignatius to Polycarp, these words,* "Despise not men and maid-servants, nor let them be puffed up: but let them serve the more for the glory of God, that they may obtain a better liberty; let them not covet to be free from their masters:" but neither doth the martyr, nor any of his commentators, intimate that this relates to any doctrine of the Gnostics; and considering how much he endeavoured to imitate Paul, we may more probably conjecture it hath relation to this very place: moreover, though I have given you the words as Dr. Hammond translates them, yet I think the true meaning of these words, μὴ ἐράτωσαν ἀπὸ τοῦ κοινοῦ ἐλευθεροῦσθαι, is this, "Let them not be importunate to be delivered, and made free by the church, or by her common stock;" for τὸ κοινὸν signifies "the community;" and so, τὸ κοινὸν τῆς ἐκκλησίας, in Eusebius,† is "the community, or body of the church;" and also in Lucian,‡ where he speaks of the Christians; and τὰ κοινὰ in Aristophanes, Demosthenes, and Lucian, signifies the common stock: now it is evident from Justin Martyr and Tertullian, that the common stock of Christians was employed to buy their brethren out of bonds and servitude (see note on 1 Cor. vii. 23, and Lucian, de Pereg. ed. Gr. p. 594, 595).

But that many of the Jews were of this opinion, and might be apt to introduce it into Christianity, we find just reason to believe: for they thought themselves privileged, by their relation to God, from being the servants of men: some of them, saith Josephus, thought it a wicked thing, μετὰ τὸν Θεὸν φέρειν θνητοὺς ἐσπότας, "to own, besides God, any mortal lords or masters." Their rabbins thought it unbecoming any Jew to be a bond-slave to a heathen or idolater; for that was, say they, to be servi servorum, "servants of servants," which the servants of the Lord must not be (see Dr. Lightfoot on 1 Cor. vii. 23).

[2] Ver. 3. Λόγοις τοῖς τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν, The words of our Lord Jesus.] This phrase being often used of the very words which Christ spake, as Matt. xxvi. 75, Acts x. 16. 20. 35, I thought fit to refer it to those words which might most likely be aimed at by the apostle; though seeing they also may refer to the doctrine of Christ, preached by the apostle, this phrase being so used, Acts xix. 10, and the doctrine of the Lord very often, 1 Thess. i. 8, 2 Thess. iii. 1, in this sense it affords this useful observation, That the words written by Paul in these epistles are the words of the Lord Jesus.

[3] Ver. 5. Ἀφίστασο ἀπὸ τῶν τοιούτων, From such withdraw thyself.] From these words it is plain that the apostle speaketh here of persons then in being; that they were Jews, seems evident from the foregoing note, showing, that they were in this matter, ἑτεροδιδάσκαλοι, "men that taught otherwise;" that these νομοδιδάσκαλοι were men knowing nothing, or not knowing what they said, or whereof they affirmed, see 1 Tim. i. 9, that they did ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖν, "teach otherwise" than the doctrine which is after godliness, ver. 3; that they had their fables which ministered ζητήσεις, "questions," ver. 4; that they had their ματαιολογίας, "vain wranglings" about words, ver. 6; that they had their "foolish questions, which begat strifes and contentions about the law," see Tit. iii. 9; that they of the circumcision were "vain talkers, teaching things which they ought not for filthy lucre's sake," see Tit. i. 10, 11, and so "accounted gain for godliness;" that their minds and "consciences were defiled" and perverted, see Tit. i. 14; that they "turned aside from the faith to vain janglings," see 1 Tim. i. 6; how they were puffed up, see note on 2 Tim. iii. 4. See the defence of these words, Examen Millii in locum.

[4] Ver. 6. Αὐτάρκεια, Contentment.] This the apostle well explains by being satisfied ἐν οἷς εἰμι, "in the condition we are in," Phil. iv. 4, and τοῖς παροῦσιν, "with the things we have at present," with "food and raiment," ver. 8, i. e. "with those things which are needful for this present life," Matt. vi. 31, 32, in opposition to anxiety, distrust, or murmuring; and it is never separable from true piety, but is the natural result of that love to, and that value the good man hath for God, and the things of God; that trust he hath in God, and the entire resignation of his will, in all affairs, to the conduct of his providence.

[5] Ver. 9. Οἱ βουλόμενοι πλουτεῖν, They that will be rich,] i. e. On whom the love of money so prevails, that they are resolved they will be rich, if by any means they can compass wealth, are in the ready way to yield to any lust which will gratify their greedy humours; μηδενὸς χρηματισμὸν συντελοῦντος αἰσχροῦ μηδ' ἀνιαροῦ φειδόμενοι, "abstaining," saith Plutarch,* "from nothing that is base or impious that tends to enrich them:" whence the ancients, agreeably to the apostle here, avaritiam omnia vitia habere putabant, "thought covetousness to comprehend all vices;" as A. Gellius, lib. xi. cap. 2, from Cato, and Cicero, n. 45, in his oration, pro Roscio Amerino, have observed: it also causeth us to make "shipwreck of faith, and a good conscience," and whatsoever else is sacred, when they cannot be held without the loss of that wealth we so love and admire: whence Cicero notes,† nullum esse officium tam sanctum atque solenne, quod non avaritia comminuere, atque violare soleat; "that there is no duty so holy or solemn which covetousness is not wont to impair and violate."

[6] Ver. 11. Δικαιοσύνην, πίστιν, &c.] That "godliness," which gives contentment, with food and raiment, and what at present we enjoy; that "faith," which assures us of "a better and a more enduring substance, reserved in the heavens for us" (Heb. x. 34); that "justice," which requires us to injure no man, but to let every man enjoy his own; that "love," or "charity," which makes us "ready to distribute, and willing to communicate" of these things to others (ver. 11); that "patience," which makes us, with tranquillity and equanimity, submit to a low fortune and adversity; that "meekness," which suppresses our wrath and indignation against them who are injurious to us in temporals, and take away that which is ours: all these are proper preservatives against, or indications of a mind free from, covetousness.

[7] Ver. 12. Ἀγωνίζου τὸν καλὸν ἀγῶνα, Fight the good fight.] These words are plainly agonistical, relating to the Olympic games, and particularly to that of racing, to which the apostle doth so oft allude, where the crown being hung up at the end of the goal, he that came first did ἐπιλαμβάνειν, "lay hold of it," and take it to himself: and because these games were performed in the presence of many spectators, the apostle continues the allusion, saying that Timothy had, in the presence of "many witnesses," shown his readiness to suffer for the faith.

[8] Ver. 14. Μέχρι τῆς ἐπιφανείας τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν, Till the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ.] Here, saith Grotius, it appears, that Paul speaks to Timothy, as one who might live to the last judgment: but this vain conceit hath been sufficiently confuted, note on 1 Thess. iv. 15. Nor doth this exhortation prove it; it being used, rather than that, "until death," saith Theophylact, to mind us of that glorious appearance: and, because, saith Austin,* the day of our death is, to us, as that day: Tunc enim unicuique veniet dies ille, cum venerit ei dies, ut talis hinc exeat, qualis judicandus est illo die: in quo enim quemque invenerit suus novissimus dies, in hôc eum comprehendet mundi novissimus dies.

[9] Ver. 15. Ὁ βασιλεὺς, &c. King of kings, and Lord of lords.] This title the great empires took to themselves: the king of Babylon is so styled by Daniel, ii. 37; by Jeremiah, xxvii. 6: of Persia, Ezra vii. 12 (see Brisson. de Regno Pers. lib. i. p. 3, 4). And therefore the apostle saith here, that it truly belongs to God only, and to our Lord Jesus Christ, Rev. xvii. 14, xix. 16.

[11] Ver. 19. Θεμέλιον καλὸν, A good foundation.] Τῶν μελλόντων ἀγαθῶν ἀπόλαυσιν θεμέλιον κέκληκεν ἀκίνητον, "The enjoyment of good things to come, he calls an immoveable foundation," say the Greek commentators. So the doctrine of the resurrection is styled "the foundation of God," 2 Tim. ii. 19; and the heavenly Jerusalem, "a city that hath foundations," Heb. xi. 10; and the "good foundation," here, being, in the words following, "eternal life," confirms their interpretation. They who think the word θεμέλιος signifies here "a treasure," or an obligation on the part of God to give them life eternal, mean the same thing, though they give us no just evidence that the word hath any such signification.

[12] Ver. 21. Περὶ τὴν πίστιν ηστόχησαν, Have erred from the faith.] These, in all reason, must be the same with the τῆς πίστεως ἀστοχήσαντες, "those who erred from the faith" (i. 5, 6); and that they were the νομοδιδάσκαλοι, "the assertors and teachers of the law," and so the opposites to the Gnostics, who were, saith Irenæus, legis adversarii, "adversaries of the law," the seventh verse demonstrates; as Theodoret* well observes upon the place: of them it is also certain, that they pretended, above all men, to be γινώσκοντες τὸ θέλημα, "skilled in the knowledge of the will of God," and ἔχοντες τὴν μόρφωσιν τῆς γνώσεως, "men that had the scheme or form of knowledge" (Rom. ii. 18—20). They were the great assertors and promoters of the cabbala, or cabbalistical doctrine, which was in their account, scientia arcana divinitus accepta,† "a secret mystical knowledge of divine things received from God," and equal, in their opinion, to the scriptures, according to their rule, Verba cabbalæ æquiparantur verbis legis. And they, doubtless, opposed this their knowledge of the law, and of these cabbalistical traditions, to the gospel taught by Paul, which opposed and slighted them; and their stiff adherence to them caused them, ἀστοχεῖν, "to shoot off from the faith" of the Messiah, which was the mark they aimed at: that therefore the ψευδώνυμος γνῶσις, the "falsely-named knowledge," mentioned here,‡ may agree to them as well as to the Gnostics, is manifest from these things, that it cannot agree to the Gnostics, if these persons were teachers of the law, as it is very probable they were (see note on i. 7); and that it cannot be attributed to Simon Magus, the father of the Gnostics, of whom alone the apostle can be supposed here to speak, appears from this —that he cannot properly be said to err concerning the faith, who was so far from being then of it, that he himself set up for the Christ, and opposed the profession of the gospel with all his might. As for the Gnostics, it is agreed among the learned, that though they conspired with former heretics, yet were they not known by that name, nor had they taken it upon them, till the time of Anicetus bishop of Rome, and the reign of M. Aurelius Antoninus and L. Verus, that is, not till the year 129. Hence Dr. Cave makes them a heresy of the second century. Eusebius says,* that Carpocrates, who flourished in the time of Hadrian, gave rise to the sect of the Gnostics: but Clemens Alexandrinus seems to affirm, that one Epiphanes,* the author of the sect of the Carpocratians, gave birth to this name and sect; and if it went so, it is improbable that the "knowledge falsely so called," here mentioned, should have relation to the Gnostics.

SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

The ancients,* from these words of this epistle, "I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand," iv. 6, do generally conclude this was the last of Paul's epistles, he being, πρὸς τῷ τέλει, "near the end of his life," when he writ it. And truly the words of the apostle are not well capable of any other sense; for he says expressly, ἤδη σπένδομαι, "I am now offered, and the time of my dissolution, ἐφέστηκε, is instant," ver. 6; "I have finished my course," ver. 7, 8, λοιπόν, "from henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of glory." Whereas he not only expected to be delivered from his first bonds, but saith expressly, "I know that I shall abide and continue with you all, for your furtherance and joy of faith, that your rejoicing may be more abundant in Christ Jesus, for my coming to you again," Phil. i. 25, 26 (see ii. 24, Philem. 22); yea, he was actually delivered, and ready to go to Judea, when he writ the Epistle to the Hebrews, xiii. 23. Secondly, This epistle, saith Bishop Pearson, was writ from Rome (i. 17), by Paul in bonds (i. 8, ii. 9). Now these bonds could not be his first bonds; for then he was in liberâ custodiâ, "in his own hired house, receiving all that came to him, none forbidding it," Acts xxviii. 30, 31; yea, his bonds were "known throughout Cæsar's palace, and to all others," Phil. i. 13. Here he is in aretâ custodiâ; so that Onesiphorus was forced to "inquire more diligently" after him, that he might find him out, i. 17. Again, in his first bonds, saith he, "many of the brethren of the Lord being encouraged by my bonds, were bold to speak the word more abundantly without fear," Phil. i. 14; here, all men forsake him, iv. 16. See a third argument for this opinion, iv. 13, a fourth, ver. 16, a fifth and sixth, ver. 20; so that I conclude, with the postscript, that this epistle ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Ῥώμης, ὅτε ἐκ δευτέρου παρέστη Παῦλος τῷ Καίσαρι Νέρωνι, "was writ from Rome, when Paul stood the second time before Nero."

That this epistle was writ to "stir up Timothy to caution, diligence, and discharge of his office, on occasion of the creeping heresy of the Gnostics (ii. 17), stolen in among them, which had much debauched the Asiatics (i. 15), and made use of magic to oppose the truth of the gospel (iii. 8)," is said by a reverend and learned person: but there is nothing in any of the ancient commentators of this nature, which speak here only of the "heresies arising from the Jewish doctors,"* as that which gave occasion to the writing this epistle. And, secondly, the places cited by this reverend person do not prove that the apostle speaketh of the Gnostics: for, i. 15, he only says, "All those that were in Asia had forsaken him;" which they might do by cleaving to the Cerinthians and Ebionites, rather than to the Gnostics (see the note there). That they who taught "the resurrection was past already," were not Gnostics, is proved, note on ii. 17; and that the words, iii. 8, 9, agree not to the Gnostic heretics, but to the Jewish false teachers, who were also great magicians, is there shown (see note on 2 Thess. ii. 10).

CHAPTER I.

1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, [1] according to the promise (for declaration of the promise) of (eternal) [2] life which is (made to us) in Christ Jesus,

2 (Writeth) To Timothy, my dearly beloved son: (wishing to him) grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord (by whom all mercies are derived to us from the Father through the Spirit).

3 I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Κατ' ἐπαγγελίαν.] Ὥστέ με τὴν ἐπαγγελθεῖσαν αἰωνίον ζωὴν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις κηρύξαι, "That I might declare that eternal life which is promised to men:" so Theodoret. So, Tit. i. 1, "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, κατὰ πίστιν, for (the promotion or declaration of) the faith of God's elect:" so κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν, "for every cause," Matt. xix. 3; Phil. iv. 11, "I speak not καθ' ὑστέρησιν, for the want of any thing."

[2] Ζωῆς ἐν Χριστῷ, Life which is in Christ Jesus.] Adam

[3] with pure conscience, that [4] without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day;

4 Greatly desiring to see thee, being mindful of thy tears (shed when thou departedst from me), that (as then I was filled with sorrow, so, by seeing thee again) I may be filled with joy;

5 (I thank God, I say,) When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and (in) thy mother Eunice (converted to the faith before thee, Acts xvi. 1); and I am persuaded that (it dwells) in thee also.

6 Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou [5] stir up the gift of God, which is in thee [6] by the putting on of my hands.

7 For God hath not given us the spirit of fear (as under the Mosaical dispensation; Rom. viii. 15); [7] but (the spirit) of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.

8 Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord (i. e. of giving testimony to the death and resurrection of Christ, 1 Cor. vi., which were the great things they chiefly were to testify, Acts i. 8. 22, iv. 33, v. 32), nor of me (though I am now) his prisoner (for that testimony): but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel (Gr. συγκακοπάθησον, suffer thou evil with the preachers of it) according to the power of God (given thee for this end, ver. 7;

9 Even that God) Who hath saved us, (i. e. designed us for salvation, 1 Thess. v. 9, see note on Eph. ii. 7, 8) and (in pursuance of that design, hath) called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace (see note on Tit. iii. 5, 6), which was given (i. e. determined to be given) us in Christ Jesus [8] before the world began,

10 But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ (the Lord and giver of life), who (by his death) hath abolished death, and hath brought (this) [9] life and immortality to light through the gospel:

11 Whereunto (εἰς ὃ, for which thing) I am appoint-brought the sentence of death upon us all, and the promise of deliverance from that death is only made to us in and through Christ Jesus, by virtue of that death he suffered in our stead.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἐν καθαρᾷ συνειδήσει, With a pure conscience.] So, Acts xxiii. 1, "I have lived in all good conscience to this day before God;" i. e. a conscience free from insincerity, or wilful disobedience to the dictates of his mind, or the rule by which he thought himself obliged to walk: for, as "touching the righteousness" which was required by the law, he was "blameless;" and as for his blasphemies against Christ, and his persecutions of his church, that he did "ignorantly in unbelief," 1 Tim. i. 13, thinking he "ought to do many things against the name of Jesus," Acts xxvi. 9. But yet he was not free from sin; for he confesses, that upon this account he was "the chief of sinners," 1 Tim. i. 15.

[4] Ἀδιάλειπτον, Without ceasing, day and night.] To pray morning and evening is to pray continually, or without ceasing: thus Zadok, and his brethren, offered burnt-offerings before the Lord continually, διαπαντός, morning and evening (1 Chron. xvi. 42, 43, see note on 1 Thess. v. 17, 18).

[5] Ver. 6. Ἀναζωπυρεῖν.] Philo* saith, that "where there is any spark of true probity, being ventilated, it will shine and break forth into a flame." And this is also true, as well of spiritual gifts as graces; even the gifts of miracles, of healing, and casting out of devils, were strengthened and increased by prayer (Matt. xvii. 21), and by faith (ver. 20), and the internal gifts of wisdom and knowledge, by reading and meditating on the word; the illumination of the Holy Spirit coming then upon gifted persons when they were so employed (1 Cor. xiv. 23—26, 1 Tim. iv. 13—15). How they may be extinguished, see Eph. iv. 30, 1 Thess. v. 19. Thus Pythagoras, saith Jamblichus,† purged the souls of the scholars from ignorance and sensual passions, and then ἀνεζωπύρει τὸ θεῖον ἐν ἑαυτῷ, cap. 16.

[6] Διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως, &c. By the laying on of my hands.] The presbytery also laid their hands upon him, 1 Tim. iv. 14, but the χάρισμα, or gift here mentioned, being the gift of the Holy Ghost, was usually conferred by laying on of the hands of an apostle, Acts viii. 17, xix. 6. Vain therefore is the inference of Esthius from these places, that ordination is a sacrament, seeing the grace here mentioned is no ordinary grace, but an extraordinary gift conferred only in those times by the hands of an apostle, and now wholly ceased.

[7] Ver. 7. Πνεῦμα δυνάμεως, The Spirit of power,] Used Luke xxiv. 19, Acts i. 8, partly to assist us in the preaching of the gospel, ἐν δυνάμει, "in the power of miracles," and in the power of the Spirit of God (Rom. xv. 19), and to render it effectual to the hearers, it being "the power of God through faith to their salvation" (Rom. i. 16), and preached by the apostles "with great power" (Acts iv. 33, 1 Thess. i. 5, Col. ii. 9); and partly to enable us to endure afflictions, for the sake of Christ, τὸ Πνεῦμα τῆς δυνάμεως, "the Spirit of power resting upon us" for that end (1 Pet. iv. 14, and here, ver. 8); and the Spirit of "love to Christ," which "constrains" us to our duty (2 Cor. v. 14), and casteth out the fear of any thing we may suffer for the performance of it (1 John iv. 18); and "of a sound mind," Gr. σωφρονισμοῦ, "of wisdom" to discharge that duty, so as either to avoid dangers (Eph. v. 15, 16, Col. iv. 5), by giving no offence to the heathens, or else to speak the word with convincing power (Luke xxi. 15), and to walk so exactly, that they may be "ashamed to speak evil of us," or to do evil to us, "who behold our good conversation in Christ" (1 Pet. iii. 16): all these were spiritual gifts, not now conferred in ordination, as Esthius vainly conceives.

[8] Ver. 9. Πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, Before any age hath passed.] The promise that the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head being made at the beginning of the world, the promise of that life to which we were to be restored by the seed, and had lost by the subtlety and malice of the serpent, is said to be given πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, Tit. i. 3 (see the note there).

Note also, that these words may be connected thus, "According to his purpose before all ages, and the grace given us in Christ Jesus." And this import of the words may be confirmed from the like passages of the apostle, saying, God hath elected us in him before the foundation of the world (Eph. i. 4), and promised us eternal life before the world began (Tit. i. 2).

[9] Ver. 10. Φωτίσαντος ζωὴν, &c. Hath brought life and immortality to light.] It is to be acknowledged, that the heathens had by tradition, and the light of nature, conceived some hope of some future good things to be received after this life was ended; that being absolutely necessary, saith the apostle, that they might "come to God," or do him any acceptable service; for, "he that cometh to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him" (Heb. xi. 6). But yet this hope was very weak and feeble in them, and scarce credited by their philosophers. It is styled by Cicero, Tusc. Q. 1, futurorum quoddam augurium seculorum, "a surmise of future ages." It is, saith Seneca,* "that which our wise men do promise, but they do not prove." Socrates,† even at his death, speaks thus: "I hope to go hence to good men, but of that I am not very confident; nor doth it become any wise man to be positive that so it will be. I," saith he, "must now die, and ye shall live; but which of us is in the better state (the living or the dead) God only knows." Both he and Cebes* do ingenuously confess, that these things relating to the soul were disbelieved by the greatest part of mankind."

Aristotle† held, that death was therefore φοβερώτατον, "the most terrible," as putting an end to all things: "neither good nor evil happening to any man after his death." Yea, he says, "It is absurd to say that any man can be happy after death, since happiness consists in operation." Hence Atticus‡ reckons him among those who held that souls could not remain after their bodies. And Origen§ saith, that he did τοῦ περὶ τῆς ἀθανασίας τῆς ψυχῆς λόγου κατηγορηκέναι, "condemn the doctrine of the soul's immortality." The poets Sophocles, Euripides, Astydamas, agree in this, that ἄλγος δ' οὐδὲν ἄπτεται νεκροῖς, "the dead are sensible of no grief or evil" (Vide Stob. Serm. 119, p. 602).

Lipsius‖ confesseth, that amongst the stoics this was a controverted point, and was not received by them with any full consent; and whosoever reads, will find them still at their ifs and ands,¶ not knowing whether there were any thing after death, εἰ ὂὴ μηδὲν ἐστι τελευτήσαντι, "or nothing," as Socrates in Phædo speaks; whether their souls should be extinguished, or only change their place; whether they were in a state of sense, or ἐν ἀναισθησία, "without sense;" whether soul and body were extinguished together, or not, as Cicero, Seneca, and others; or else were still at their disjunctives, ἢτοι, σβέσις, ἢ μετάστασις, fluctuating still betwixt extinction or translation, a profound sleep, a long peregrination, or an utter dissolution (see Hyperides, apud Stob. Serm. 124, p. 618).

Cæsar†† declares, that "death removes all our evils and our torments, as leaving no farther place for joy or fear." And Pliny,‡‡ that "neither soul nor body hath any more sense after death, than before it was born."

Cicero§§ begins his discourse upon this subject with a profession, that he intended to deliver nothing as fixed and certain, but only as probable, and having some likelihood of truth. And having reckoned up the different sentiments of the philosophers about it, he concludes thus,‖‖ "Which of these opinions is true, some god must tell us; which is most like to truth, is a great question." And when he had confirmed, as much as he was able, the doctrine of the soul's immortality, he ingenuously confesses, Caterva veniunt contradicentium, that his "opinion was contradicted, not only by whole troops of the sect of Epicurus, but also by the most learned of the other sects."*

Plutarch† saith, that if men will be restrained from their evil courses by fear, they must be kept "under the superstition of the dread of hades;" but to them who have cast off those fears must be propounded, ἡ περὶ τὸ μυθῶδες τῆς ἀϊδιότητος ἐλπὶς, "the fabulous hope of immortality." And this, saith he, is one great benefit of philosophy, that it hath taught us to look upon that death which others fear, ὡς μηδὲν πρὸς ἡμᾶς, "as nothing to us." Now the philosophers themselves saw the evil effects that this denial or doubting of these things would have upon the lives of men; viz.

1. That it would yield a great encouragement to men to go on in their evil ways; for if death, saith Socrates, in Phæd. p. 80, A, be the extinction of the whole, or a freedom from all evils, ἐρμαῖον ἂν αὖ τοῖς κακοῖς ἀποθανοῦσαι, "this will be good news to the wicked, that they have nothing to suffer."

2. That it tended to discourage men from leading virtuous and pious lives, as cramping all their hopes of happiness: for, as Dionysius Halicarnasseus‡ well observes, "If the soul, when separated from the body, perisheth, it is not easy to discern how good men can be happy, who receive no fruit of their virtue here, but often perish by it."

3. That it very much staggers our patience and perseverance in virtue, and our concern for fidelity and equity, when we must suffer for them in this world: for it is truly said by Cicero,§ that "it is not possible for any one to have that esteem for faith and equity, as to endure the most dreadful punishments to preserve them, unless he be assured that the things he hath assented to cannot be false" (see note on Heb. xi. 6). And yet, after all this uncertainty, it is worthy of our deists to reflect on Plato's inference from his discourse upon this subject; viz. that though no wise man could be positive in these things, yet it became him to do his utmost to obtain virtue and wisdom, καλὸν γὰρ τὸ ἄθλον, καὶ ἡ ἐλπὶς μεγάλη, "because great was the hope, and the prize excellent," and that it was worthy of them, κινδυνῆσαι, "to make a trial, though with hazard, as if we did believe them; καλὸς γὰρ ὁ κίνδυνος, for it is," saith he, "a noble trial, and it behoves us to have these things impressed upon our souls."

As for the immortality the body shall obtain at the resurrection, the heathens knew and believed nothing of it: they laughed at it, and looked upon it as a thing impossible, and unworthy of God to do, and without any example to convince them that it might be done. Hence then we see the necessity that this "life and immortality" should be "brought to light by the gospel;" and what continual thanks we owe to the blessed Jesus, who hath, by his death, not only removed the fear and sting, but even the being of death, and hath procured a blessed immortality, not only for the soul, but for the body also.

[10] Ver. 12. Τὴν παρακαταθήκην μου, My soul;] Which persons dying used to commit into the hands of God. So Josephus, De Bello Jud. lib. iii. p. 852, "The immortal soul, which hath its original from God, dwells in the body:

now if any one embezzles, or evilly entreats that which is committed to him by man, he is accounted a wicked and perfidious man, εἰ δέ τις τοῦ σφετέρου σώματος ἐκβάλλει τὴν παρακαταθήκην τοῦ Θεοῦ, λελῆσθαι δοκεῖ τὸν ἀδικούμενον; if therefore any one casts the depositum of God out of his body by self-murder, can he hope to conceal himself from him that is injured?" And Philo* in like manner saith, that "God hath given to man a soul, speech, and sense, which he must endeavour so to keep, that he who committed them to him may find no cause to blame him for his custody." And again,† "This is the praise of the wise man, that he keeps the sacred depositum of the soul, sense, speech, the divine wisdom, and human understanding, purely, and without deceit, not to himself, but only to him who committed them to him." And again, lib. De Abr. p. 302, "No wise man," saith he, "is offended that any one calls for τὴν παρακαταθήκην, his depositum: why therefore should he be offended, that God, or nature, calls for that which they have intrusted with us?" And Hermes saith, lib. ii. mandat. 2, "They that lie defraud the Lord, not rendering to him τὴν παρακαταθήκην ἣν ἔλαβον, the depositum they received from him; for they received a spirit free from falsehood; and therefore by lying, ἐμίηναν τὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ παρακαταθήκην, they have defiled God's depositum." The Jews,‡ make mention of two depositums of God: the lamp which is in us, or the soul: and the lamp without us, which is the law; or according to Philo,§ θείων παρακαταθήκη ὀργίων, "the depositum of the divine mysteries:" and they introduce God speaking thus; "My light or lamp is in thy hand, and thy lamp, which is thy soul, is in mine; if thou shalt diligently keep my lamp, I will keep thine; if thou extinguishest mine, I will put out thine." This depositum they, dying, did commit into the hands of God; as you may see Sepher Tephiloth Lusitanorum.‖ The apostle seems to have respect to both these depositums in his Epistles to Timothy; to the light of the gospel, when he saith, τὴν παρακαταθήκην φύλαξον, "Keep that which is committed to thee," 1 Tim. vi. 20, and here, ver. 14, to the lamp within us, ver. 13.

[11] Ver. 15. Ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ, Which are in Asia.] This Œcumenius and Theophylact expound thus, οἱ ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ, τουτέστιν, ἐκ τῆς Ἀσίας, "Those of Asia, that either went with him to Rome, or came to him there, or were found there at his coming, in the time of his distress, forsook all converse with him, for fear of Nero." But this exposition seems not consistent with the words. For, (1.) he saith, οἶδας τοῦτο, "This thou knowest:" now Timothy, being not at Rome, could not well know what was done there; and therefore the apostle gives him an account how all men had deserted him in his first defence, iv. 16. But then in Asia, or Achaia, he might know what happened there. (2.) The words ἀπεστράφησάν με, "have been averse from me," seem to import a departure from Paul and his doctrine; and may be rendered "They have turned me off." He having therefore told them long before, that "after his departure grievous wolves should enter in, not sparing the flock; and that from themselves should arise men speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them" (Acts xx. 29, 30); and charging Timothy to stay some time at Ephesus, to oppose himself to the false teachers of the Jewish nation, and to exhort the Ephesians not to give heed to these teachers of the law (1 Tim. i. 7), it seems most proper to refer these words to the rejecting St. Paul, as an adversary to the law, by the persuasions of the Cerinthians and Ebionites, who laid this charge against him.

[12] Ver. 16. Ὀνησιφόρου οἴκῳ, The household of Onesiphorus.] Onesiphorus seemed to be dead when Paul writ this, saith Grotius on the place: and if so, saith Esthius, here is a strong confirmation of the practice of praying for the saints deceased. I answer, (1.) That it follows not that Onesiphorus was dead, because Paul here mentions, and in the close of this epistle salutes his family, without mention of him; the reason of that being this, because Onesiphorus was not yet returned from Rome to Ephesus, where his family was; but, as Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact say, on 2 Tim. iv. 19, was then ἐν Ῥώμῃ, "at Rome," serving Paul. (2.) The apostle here only prays that he might "find mercy at the great day" of recompense, as doth our liturgy, and all the ancient liturgies, "for deliverance in the hour of death, and at the day of judgment;" which is perfectly exclusive of prayers supposed to be made for souls in purgatory, which, if they do them any good, must be supposed to do it before that day.

[13] Ver. 18. Δῴη αὐτῷ ὁ Κύριος εὑρεῖν ἔλεος παρὰ Κυρίου. The Lord grant he may find mercy from the Lord.] Here is a plain example of the known rule of the grammarians, that the noun is frequently repeated for the pronoun: so, Gen. xix. 24, "Jehovah rained fire and brimstone, מאת יהוה, Κύριος παρὰ Κυρίου, from Jehovah." So Exod. xxiv. 1—3, "He," i. e. Jehovah, ver. 3, "said to Moses, Ascend" אל יהוה, i. e. to me. And, 1 Sam. iii. 21, "Jehovah appeared to Samuel in Shiloh, ברבר יהוה, by the word of the Lord." So Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, say here, τουτέστι, παρ' ἑαυτοῦ· and that it is the custom of the scriptures so to speak, they prove from Gen. xix. 24, not fearing the anathema, which the great council of Sirmium, through ignorance of the Hebrew tongue, pronounced against them who did so interpret it.

sion of such persons:" so Mr. Obadiah Walker. "The things agreed on, and consented to by all the other apostles, do thou commit to able men, and appoint them as bishops of the several churches under thee:" So Dr. Hammond. I think there is no foundation for all this in the text; no intimation that these things were taught him at his ordination, or that they were things agreed on, and consented to by all the apostles, as if they had met and consulted about a system of articles of faith and good life, to be held by all that taught the Christian faith; or that God chose this way to continue down the faith, in an uninterrupted succession, from age to age, of such persons; or, that this was a commission to Timothy to appoint bishops under him in the several churches of Asia: for he doth not appoint him as he did Titus, "to ordain elders in every city" (i. 5), the bishops of Ephesus, and the adjacent cities, being before not only appointed but convened by himself (Acts xx. 27, 28): the things which Timothy had heard "confirmed by many witnesses," seem to refer to Christ's death, his resurrection, and ascension, which were matters of testimony, and contained the prime doctrines which Paul delivered to the churches, 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4, and which were confirmed by the testimony of Paul, the twelve apostles, and five hundred brethren, ibid. ver. 5—8, Luke xxiv. 50—52; or to the mystery of godliness, mentioned 1 Tim. iii. 16, and testified in every part of it by men and angels. I grant also that the apostle seems to refer to some form of doctrine delivered to them who received the Christian faith, when he speaks of "the mystery of faith," and "the mystery of godliness," 1 Tim. iii. 9. 15, 16, of "the first principles of the oracles of God," Heb. v. 12, and of "the principles of the doctrine of Christ," vi. 1—4, enumerating them in the Epistle to the Hebrews; there being a faith once, and at once delivered to the saints, Jude 3, in which they were to "stand fast," and for which they were to "contend" (Phil. i. 27): and that there was also a παρακαταθήκη, or depositum of Christian doctrine delivered to them who were to preach and instruct others in the faith; and which he commands Timothy, to keep, 1 Tim. vi. 20, 21, as being entrusted with it, in opposition to those who had erred from the faith, which he calls "the form of sound words which he had been taught," and which he was to keep, "in faith and love of the truth" (5 Tim. i. 13); and "that good thing committed to him" (ver. 14), which he was to "keep by the Holy Ghost," the Spirit which leadeth into all truth, the unction which taught them all things belonging to their office (1 John ii. 20. 27), the things in which he was to "continue, knowing of whom he had learned them" (2 Tim. iii. 14). I lastly grant, that all the fathers, from Irenæus downwards, speak of such a symbol of faith delivered to the church by the apostles and their disciples, which the church received from them, and distributed to her sons, being the one and the same faith which the church retained throughout the world, than which they believed neither less nor more, and which, for substance, was the same with the Apostles' Creed. This I have* elsewhere largely proved, and thence demonstrated the falsehood of the whole doctrine of the church of Rome, and of her new creed, delivered as necessary to be believed unto salvation: and if Obadiah Walker means no more, I shall not contend with him.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἐμπλέκεται ταῖς τοῦ βίου πραγματείαις, Entangleth himself with the affairs of this world.] The apostle here, by two plain similitudes, requires Timothy, as a good soldier and bishop of the church of Christ, and an evangelist, not to engage himself in any temporal affairs or secular negotiations; of which the first is taken from the comparison of a soldier, who was, by the Roman laws,* armis, non privatis negotiis occupari: "to be employed wholly at his arms, and not in any private business." The second is taken from the similitude of wrestlers,† who did not strive according to the laws, unless they wrestled naked, and put off all their garments, and therefore could not win the crown of laurel. Hence is that inquiry of St. Basil, τίς στεφανοῖ ποτε τὸν μηδὲ ἀποδύοντα πρὸς τὸν ἀντίπαλον; "Who crowns him who comes not naked to his adversary?" And those words of Chrysostom,‡ "If thou art a wrestler, thou must come naked to the combat; thou must put off the affairs of this life, and be made a wrestler; divest thyself of worldly cares, for it is the time of conflict." Hence the Apostolical Canons declare, can. iv., those bishops, priests, or deacons, ought to be deposed, who do κοσμικὰς φροντίδας ἀναλαμβάνειν, "immerse themselves in worldly affairs." Cyprian§ represents it as a thing worthy of the divine judgments, that bishops, contemning the office, "become proctors for secular affairs." And this practice was condemned by the general council of Chalcedon,‖ can. ii. 12, and by a council of Carthage, as repugnant to these words of the apostle; and by the council of Sardica, can. viii. And even before Cyprian was bishop, this was established in¶ Africa by council, from this very text, "No man that warreth, entangleth himself with the affairs of this life."

[3] Ver. 7. Δώῃ.] Other manuscripts read, δώσει γὰρ, "For the Lord will give thee understanding," &c. And δώῃ is oft put for δώσει. So Gen. xxvii. 28, δώῃ σοι ὁ Θεὸς, "The Lord shall give thee of the dew of heaven."

[4] Ver. 8. Μνημόνευε, Remember.] To maintain this against the unbelieving Jews, that Jesus Christ, the promised Messiah, of the seed of David, not of Joseph, was raised from the dead, according to the gospel that I preach, 1 Cor. xv.

[5] Of the seed of David.] It is certain that the Jews, before our Saviour's time, thought the Messiah, the Son of David, was not to die; and therefore, when Christ had told them he was to be "lifted up," they answer, "We have heard, out of the law, that the Messiah abideth for ever;

9 [6] Wherein (for which gospel) I suffer trouble (from the Jews, Acts xxv. 19. 26, and vi. 7, and others), as an evil doer, even unto bonds; but (though I am bound) the word of God (which I preach) is not bound, (but hath its free course.

10 And) Therefore (for this cause) I endure all (these) things (cheerfully) [7] for the elect's sakes (Col. i. 24), that they (being confirmed by an example in suffering, 2 Cor. i. 6, xiv. 15) may also obtain the salvation which is (tendered) in (and through) Christ Jesus with eternal glory.

11 It is a faithful saying (that by Christ Jesus we shall obtain this salvation): For if we be dead (Gr. have died) with him (in baptism, by dying unto sin), we shall also live with him (in conformity to his resurrection, Rom. vi. 8):

12 If we suffer (as he did), we shall also reign with him: (but) if (through persecutions) we deny him, he also will deny us (Matt. x. 33):

and how sayest thou, that he must be lifted up?" (John xii. 34.) And when first he tells his disciples of it, Peter began to rebuke him, with an absit, "This shall not be unto thee" (Matt. xvi. 22). When he tells them again of it, "They understood not the word," saith Mark ix. 32; "It was hid from them that they perceived it not," saith Luke ix. 45. And again, "They understood none of these things, and this saying was hid from them; neither knew they the things which were spoken" (xviii. 34). Surely Christ's words were plain, "They shall put him to death;" but they knew not how to reconcile them with their received doctrine, that he was to "abide for ever" (John xii. 34); and therefore, because Isaiah speaks so plainly of a Messiah, who was to suffer death, they invented, afterward,* a distinction betwixt "Messiah of the tribe of Ephraim," the son of Joseph, who was to die, and "Messiah of the tribe of Judah," the Son of David, who was to reign, and conquer, and never die. This distinction is to be found in their Talmud, in the Targum upon the Canticles, iv. 5, vii. 3, in Bereschith Rabba, in Gen. xlix. 14, in R. Solomon, and Kimchi on Zech. xii. 10. Now if this invention obtained in the times of Paul, he might here have respect unto it; if not, because in the dialogue of Justin with Trypho we read nothing of it, their notion, that the Messiah "of the seed of David" could not die, must be confuted by his resurrection from the dead.

Remember that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead.] Theodoret here observes, that Simon Magus† began to broach his heresies about this time; and he and all his followers denied that Christ had taken flesh upon him, saying, that his incarnation, or anthropism, was only in appearance, or ἐν φαντασια; and, in opposition to this heresy, he is here styled Jesus Christ "of the seed of David;" and because from that heresy it must follow, that he could not truly die or suffer in the flesh, and so could not be truly raised from the dead; therefore the apostle bids Timothy remember, that he was raised from the dead, who was of the seed of Abraham, according to the promise.

[6] Ver. 9. Ἐν ᾧ,] Pro ἐι' οὗ, cujus causâ, more Hebræo, Grotius. So, Matt. vi. 7, "They think to be heard, ἐν τῇ πολυλογίᾳ, for their much speaking." So, ἐίσμιος ἐν Κυρίῳ, "A prisoner for the Lord;" Heb. xi. 2, ἐν ταύτῃ, "For this the elders received a good report." See Nold. Concord. p. 158: see in the LXX. Gen. xxxi. 41, 2 Sam. xxiv. 24, 1 Kings x. 28, Lam. i. 11, v. 4, Hos. xii. 12, 13, Amos viii. 6, see here, ver. 10.

[7] Ver. 10. Διὰ τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς, For the elect's sake.] i. e. For the sake of Christians, who are all γένος ἐκλεκτὸν, "a chosen generation" (see the note on 1 Pet. ii. 9), and who may be confirmed in the faith, by the example of my patient sufferings, and continuing in it may obtain that salvation to which they are called. Vain therefore are these following notes of Esthius; first, that there is a certain election of God, which hath infallibly chosen us to salvation: unless he means this of a conditional election, God having infallibly determined to save them who "make their calling and election sure," by perseverance in good works (2 Pet. i. 10). Secondly, that as Paul suffered those things only for the elect, so Christ died only for them: for, "he tasted death for every man," Heb. i. 9; "he died for all," 1 Tim. ii. 6; "not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world," 1 John ii. 2; "for them that perish," Rom. xiv. 15. Thirdly, that neither Christ did, nor ought we to do, any thing that the reprobates may obtain salvation: which is horribly false; Christ's preaching to the unbelieving Jews being intended for their salvation, John iii. 17, xii. 47, and v. 34. 40. For the blinded Jews the apostle prays and labours that they might be saved, Rom. ix. 1. 11. 14.

[8] Ver. 14. Μὴ λογομαχεῖν, That they strive not about words.] Here we learn, First, What are the things which ought not to be matters of contention among Christians: (1.) Such things in which we differ from each other rather in words than sense; mean the same thing, but differ only in the expressing of our sentiments: which rule observed would put an end to many of our controversies. (2.) Such things as tend to little or no profit, either as to edification in the faith, or edifying of the body in love (Eph. iv. 16, see note on 1 Tim. i. 4, vi. 3, Tit. iii. 9), or, by knowing which, we may be the more learned, but not the better Christians. Again, Hence we learn why we should not contend about such things, viz. because they tend to beget strife and contentions (ver. 23, 1 Tim. i. 4), which divide Christians into parties, and dissolve or obstruct Christian charity. (2.) Because they tend to the disturbance of the hearers, they not knowing to which party to adhere; and also to their subversion, causing them to doubt of the truth of that faith about which the contending parties cannot agree.

[9] Ver. 15. Ὀρθοτομοῦντα τὸν λόγον, Rightly dividing, or handling, the word of truth.] This word ὀρθοτομεῖν is a sacrificial word, relating to the right dividing of the sacrifice which was to be laid upon the altar, by cutting off and laying aside those parts which were not to be offered, and severing them from those that were: and to this sense Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, refer the word here, saying, that he requires Timothy to separate from the preaching of the word all noxious and idle questions, πάντα τὰ περιττὰ, all superfluous things, and give his hearers only "the sincere milk of the word:" and this sense agrees well with the preceding and the following words. Others think it refers to the cutting out a straight path to walk in; and so it is an admonition, saith Theodoret, to keep close to the truth of the gospel, in all his exhortations, τῷ κανόνι τῶν θείων λόγων ἑπόμενος, "following the canon of the holy scriptures."

[10] Ver. 17. Ὑμέναιος, &c. Hymenæus and Philetus.] That these two were Gnostic teachers, none of the ancients do insinuate; nor did the Gnostics teach, that "the resurrection was past already," but that the flesh was not fit to rise, and that it was incapable of salvation and of incorruption. So Irenæus* often doth inform us, by saying, they deny the salvation of the flesh, denying it to be capable of incorruption, and with him agree Pseud-Ignatius,* the Apostolical Constitutions, and others. Valentinus,† who flourished only A. D. 145, and so could not be touched at in these words, was of the same opinion, say all the ancients. So that Tertullian must either be mistaken, when, speaking of them, who held the resurrection was past already, he adds, Id de se Valentiniani adseverant, or means this, not of Valentinus himself, whom he there numbers with those, qui resurrectionem carnis infringunt, "who deny the resurrection of the flesh," but of some of his followers. But then Irenæus‡ informs us, that this was part of the heresy of Menander, who taught resurrectionem per id quod est in eum baptisma accipere ejus discipulos; "that his disciples obtained the resurrection by his baptism, and so could die no more, but were to persevere immortal." Justin Martyr§ also saith, he persuaded his disciples, ὡς μὴ ἀποθνήσκοιεν, "that they should not die." He taught, saith Timothy,‖ priest of Constantinople, that "they who received his baptism should be immortal, ὡς μηκέτι ἀποθνήσκειν, and should never die." Now he was contemporary to Simon Magus, and so might be also with Paul (see note on 1 Cor. xv. 12. 44, and Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 26, Tertul. de Animâ, cap. 50).

[11] Ver. 19. Θεμέλιος τοῦ Θεοῦ, The foundation of God.] The fundamental doctrine of the resurrection to life eternal is so styled, in these words, "Let us not lay again, τὸν θεμέλιον, the foundation of the resurrection of the dead," Heb. vi. 1, 2. This is the "faithful saying," mentioned ver. 11, which he exhorts Timothy to bring to their remembrance, ver. 14, and by denying which, saith he, the Christian faith is overturned, ver. 18. But notwithstanding all the vain babblings of Hymenæus and Philetus, "this foundation," saith the apostle "standeth sure."

[12] Τὴν σφραγῖδα ταύτην, Having this seal.] Sealing seems always mentioned in the New Testament for confirmation and assurance; as when the apostle saith, "The seal of my apostleship are you in the Lord," 1 Cor. ix. 2, i. e. the effects I have wrought upon you, and the gifts of the Spirit imparted to you, prove the truth of my apostleship: and when he tells his converts, that by the Spirit they were "sealed up to the day of redemption," 2 Cor. i. 22, v. 5, Eph. i. 13, iv. 30, and were established in the truth of the gospel: the gifts of the Spirit they had already received, according to Christ's promise, being a confirmation of that glorious redemption he had farther promised.

[13] Ἔγνω Κύριος τοὺς ὄντας αὐτοῦ, The Lord knoweth who are his.] i. e. He owns and approves those he hath commissioned to reveal his mind to others: for this expression is taken from Numb. xvi. 5, where Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, rise up against Moses and Aaron, declaring they took too much upon them, in pretending the one to be their prophet, and the mouth of God to them, the other to be the high-priest, whom God had consecrated to his peculiar service above all others of the tribe of Levi. Now to this imputation Moses replies, according to the Septuagint, ἔγνω ὁ Θεὸς τοὺς ὄντας αὐτοῦ, "God knoweth who are his," and by him separated to his service, and will maintain their cause and calling against all opposers; as in that instance he did in a wonderful manner, causing the earth to open, and swallow them up: so also will God own us his apostles against Hymenæus and Philetus, and all that set up against us and our doctrine. As therefore Moses said then to the Israelites, "Depart you from the tents of those men, καὶ ἀπέστησαν, and they departed;" so say I now to all Christians, Let them depart from this impiety, i. e. from these pernicious doctrines, which increase to ungodliness, and cause men to make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience.

[14] That nameth the name of Christ.] i. e. That professeth to own him, or to be his disciple: so Isa. xxvi. 33, τὸ ὄνομά σου ὀνομάζομεν, "We have no other God but thee, we name thy name" (see Isa. xliii. 7, lxiii. 19, Ps. lxxx. 19, Gen. iv. 26, 2 Chron. xii. 13).

[15] Ἀπὸ ἀδικίας.] Justum pro vero, et injustum pro falso, frequentes tam nos quam Attici ponimus, saith Priscian: "Both Greeks and Latins frequently use the word injustice to denote falsehood" (see note on 1 Cor. xiii. 6), so that these words may thus be rendered, "Let every one that names the name of Christ depart from falsehood;" i. e. let him preserve himself from the pernicious errors of these apostates from the truth.

[16] Ver. 21. Ἡγιασμένον, Sanctified.] The vessels of the sanctuary were consecrated to the service of God, and were also, saith the apostle, purified by the sprinkling of the blood upon them (Heb. ix. 21). And so are Christians sprinkled by the blood of Jesus from their sins, and consecrated by baptism to his service, and so made meet for the service of God (see the reading of the text justified, Examen Millii, in locum).

[17] Ver. 22.] Note, that hence it follows, that we must maintain peace with, and therefore must not separate from our communion, any person who serves Christ with a pure heart

[18] Ver. 25. Μήποτε, If peradventure.] This word in the Septuagint answers to the Hebrew particle אוּל, si forte or fortassè. So, Gen. iii. 25, xxiv. 5. 39, μήποτε οὐ πορεύσεται ἡ γυνὴ, "Perhaps the woman will not come with me;" xxvii. 12, μήποτε ψηλαφήσῃ, "Perhaps my father will handle me;" μήποτε ἀγνοήμά ἐστιν, "Perhaps it is an error," Gen. xliii. 12; 1 Kings xviii. 27, μήποτε χρηματίζει, ἢ μήποτε καθεύδει, "If perhaps he be busy, or perhaps sleepeth" (see also Job i. 5, Luke iii. 15). But (1.) this seems not agreeable to the use of the two relatives, which, when they come together, seldom relate to the same person. (2.) Satan is the nearest substantive rather in place than in sense, the words being capable of this construction; "If peradventure God will give them repentance to do his will, that they who are taken captive by the devil, may awake out of his snare." This is the sense which best accordeth with the work of conversion and repentance, which is a recovering men from the service of Satan to the service of God (Acts xxvi. 18); a freeing them from sin, that they may be servants of God (Rom. vi. 17); a delivering men from the power of darkness, and translating them into the kingdom of his Son (Col. i. 13).

CHAPTER III.

1 THIS know also, that in the last days (of the Jewish economy, and the erecting of Christ's kingdom, see note on 1 Tim. iv. 1) perilous times shall come.

2 [1] For men shall be lovers of their own selves (i. e. their own temporal pleasures and profits), covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers (evil speakers), disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy (or profane),

3 Without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce (or cruel), despisers of those that are good,

4 Traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God;

5 Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away.

6 For of this sort are they which [2] creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts,

7 Ever learning (of new teachers), and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

8 Now as [3] Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses (when working his miracles in Egypt before Pharaoh),

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 2. Ἔσονται γὰρ οἱ ἄνθρωποι.] That the apostle here speaks of such persons as were in being when this epistle was indited, is evident from his command to Timothy, to "turn away" from them, and from the description of them.

That they were not the Gnostics, or the followers of Simon Magus, seems apparent; first, because Simon Magus could not make the times perilous by any opposition he could make to Christianity, he being a despicable and beggarly magician, of whose power or endeavour to persecute the Christians, I remember not one word in church history applicable to the times of this epistle; but that the Jews were zealous persecutors of them, not only in Judea, but through all parts of the world where they were dispersed, both scripture and Justin Martyr fully testify; and the supposed combination betwixt the Jews and Gnostics is not only groundless, but incredible: for what accord could there be betwixt him who set up for a god, yea, for a father over all, and them who were zealous for the true God, and hated idolatry with a perfect hatred? or between them who had the highest veneration for the law and the prophets, and him who taught they were not at all to be regarded? Secondly, because the Jews had "a form of knowledge" (Rom. ii. 20), and "a zeal for God" (Rom. ix. 1), and a settled form of worshipping the true God; they were great zealots for the observation of the sabbath, and all the sacrifices and institutions required by the law of Moses; and served God frequently day and night (Acts xxvi. 7), and so they had "a form of godliness," though not worshipping God in the spirit (Phil. iii. 3); but only with these carnal ordinances "they denied the power thereof:" but what form of godliness do we find in Simon Magus and his followers in the times of the apostles? what profession of Christianity could he make, who set himself to oppose the apostles, and the doctrines which they taught? See a third argument against this exposition, ver. 9.

But that these characters agree to the Jews, and particularly to the Judaizing Christians, and false teachers, is evident from scripture and church history, and from the writings of Josephus: for, Rom. i. 29—31, we have mention of gentiles that were "covetous, proud, boasters, disobedient to parents, without natural affection, truce-breakers, unclean, unthankful;" and, ii. 21, the Jew is condemned as doing the same things; and, ver. 22. 24, as guilty of adultery and blasphemy. They were blasphemers and false accusers of the apostles, as if they walked after the flesh (2 Cor. x. 2), contradicting and blaspheming Christianity (Acts xiii. 45); they represented it to all the world, when it was first preached, as an atheistical sect,* and were the authors of all the vile stories which the heathens objected against it: and in despising of the apostles and Christians, they were despisers of those that were good. They were great lovers and admirers of themselves, proud, boasters, and high-minded, boasting of God as their Father, and of their knowledge of the law (Rom. ii. 17. 23), magnifying themselves above others (see note on 2 Cor. xi. 12. 20), glorying in their circumcision (ver. 18), and in their being of the seed of Abraham (ver. 22, Phil. iii. 5), and exalting themselves upon these accounts above the gentiles, whom they styled dogs, and sons of the earth, and uncircumcised; whilst they were the noble, the "sons of God," and his beloved people. They were διάβολοι, "contentious, and obeyed not the truth" (Rom. ii. 8, Phil. i. 15, 16); they were covetous, perverting others "for filthy lucre's sake" (Tit. i. 11), "counting gain godliness" (1 Tim. vi. 5), "minding earthly things" (Phil. iii. 10); they were fierce, heady, cruel in their persecutions of the Christians (1 Thess. ii. 15, 16); they were traitors and truce-breakers in their revoltings from the Roman government: they were disobedient to their parents in their corban (Matt. xv. 5), and without natural affection, not in that only, but in their persecutions of Christians of their own family and blood (Luke xxi. 16): they were unholy and incontinent, defiled, and abominable (Tit. i. 14, 15), in their adulteries, and continual divorces; lovers of pleasure, making "their belly their god" (Phil. iii. 19), feasting luxuriously on their sabbaths, and given to drunkenness in their feasts of Purim (see the reading, ver. 3, justified, Examen Millii, ibid.).

[2] Ver. 6.] That these perverters of men from the truth and creepers into houses, were of the circumcision, and addicted to Jewish fables, see Tit. i. 10, 11. 14.

[3] Ver. 8. Jannes and Jambres.] Though we have no mention of the names of these magicians in the Old Testament, yet were their names celebrated both among the hea-so do these also resist the truth: (being) men of corrupt minds, [4] reprobate concerning the faith (Tit. i. 14—16).

9 But [5] they shall proceed no further (Gr. not much farther): for their folly shall be manifest unto all men, as their's also was (i. e. the folly of Jannes and Jambres).

10 But (be not troubled at such times or persons, having in me good experience of the power and readiness of God to deliver them who suffer for his sake, for) [6] thou hast fully known my doctrine, (my) manner of life, (my) purpose (to adhere to Christ, seeking his glory, not my own, and to promote his gospel to the uttermost, my) faith, longsuffering (2 Cor. vi. 6), charity (1 Cor. viii. 13, ix. 22, 2 Cor. xi. 29, my) patience,

12 Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution (especially in such perilous times; and at all times, either openly or secretly, from the hatred and malice of wicked men, or from their taunts and calumnies, which are styled persecutions, Gal. iv. 29, nor is it to be expected that it should be otherwise).

13 But (δὲ, for) evil men and [7] seducers (impostors) shall (till the wrath of God takes hold upon them) wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived.

14 But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned (from me) and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them;

15 And that [8] from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

thens, as Pliny* and Numenius† inform us, who represent them as Egyptians skilled in the art of magic; and in the Jewish writings,‡ who do not only say that they were principes præstigiatorum, "the chief of the magicians;" but also that they were the two sons of Balaam. Origen§ informs us, that there was a book writ by them, bearing this title, Jannes et Mambres liber.

[4] Ἀδόκιμοι περὶ τὴν πίστιν, Reprobate concerning the faith.] So they are styled in scripture, who, through their resistance of, and contentions against, the truth, are unworthy to have the faith made known to them, or indisposed to receive it. Thus the heathens, who, "when they knew God, did not glorify him as God, neither were thankful" (Rom. i. 22, 25), are therefore delivered up εἰς νοῦν ἀδόκιμον, "to a reprobate mind:" and they here who resist the truth, being "men of corrupt mind," are therefore "reprobate concerning the faith" (see note on 2 Cor. xiii. 5).

[5] Ver. 9. Οὐ προκόψουσιν, They shall proceed no farther.] This agrees well with the Jewish false doctors, who were soon disabled from carrying on their false doctrines, by the destruction of Jerusalem; but not so well with the Gnostic heretics, who spread themselves wide in the second century. The fancy of a reverend person, that Paul here prophesies, that as Jannes and Jambres perished in the Red sea, so should Simon Magus at Rome, falling down headlong, when he was flying in the air, perish at the prayers of Peter and Paul, is in every part of it uncertain. For,

First, Though the Jews tell us Jannes and Jambres were with Pharaoh at the Red sea, they say not that they perished there, but say they rode with Balaam to meet Balak, and lived to the making of the golden calf, and then perished (Targ. Jon. in Numb. xxii. 22).

Secondly, I have shown in the preface to the Epistle to the Thessalonians, §. 6, that the story of Simon Magus's flying in the air in a fiery chariot, and being thrown down by the prayers of those two apostles, in the sight of the people at Rome, is of no credit among learned men.

[6] Ver. 10. Παρηκολούθηκας, Thou hast fully known.] Παρακολουθεῖν, relatum ad animum, est συνιέναι, saith Constantine. So the Greek commentators thought it here signified, rendering it οἶδας, μεμάθηκας ἀκριβῶς, "Thou hast known, thou hast learnt exactly," as the word imports, Luke i. 4. The primary sense of it, "Thou hast followed, or resembled me, in my persecutions," may also be applied to Timothy, who was in bonds at Rome also, Heb. xiii. 23 (see the note on 1 Tim. vi. 12).

[7] Ver. 13. Καὶ γόητες, Impostors.] That the impostors among the Jews continued till the very time of the destruction of Jerusalem, more and more deceiving the people, and that the whole nation of the unbelieving Jews grew then to the highest pitch of wickedness, Josephus fully testifies (see notes on Rom. ii. 2, 2 Thess. ii. 10).

[8] Ver. 15. From a child thou hast learned the scriptures.] Note here, the care of the Jews to teach their children the scriptures even from their childhood: from five years old, say the Talmudists, we put our children to read the Bible. Josephus* informs us, that their children "learning their laws, ἀπὸ τῆς πρώτης εὐθὺς αἰσθήσεως, from the first dawnings of sense and reason in them," had them engraven in their souls: which, as it condemns the practice of the church of Rome, in withholding those sacred oracles from old and young, so also it does reprehend the generality of Christians, who are more concerned to teach their children things unnecessary, or, at the best, things only needful for this present life, than to instruct them in that word of God, "which is able to make them wise to salvation."

[9] Ver. 16. Πᾶσα γραφὴ, All scripture.] Here note,

First, That the scriptures of the Old Testament, not of the New, must be the scriptures here intended, they only being the scriptures which Timothy had known from a youth; that is, before the scriptures of the New Testament were written; and so he could not speak of the scriptures, as interpreted by them who were then guides of the church, viz. the Jewish sanhedrin, or the scribes and pharisees; seeing they so interpreted them, as to make void the commandments of God, and to deny our Saviour to be the promised Messiah.

Secondly, Observe, that the apostle doth not say, that these scriptures were of themselves sufficient to make Timothy wise to salvation; but only, that with "faith in Christ Jesus" they were sufficient for that end. Now faith in Christ Jesus doth only signify a firm belief that Jesus was the Christ, the true Messiah, the Son of God, the Saviour of the world; as is evident from these words, "This is the victory over the world, even our faith," 1 John v. 4, i. e. our belief that "Jesus is the Son of God," ver. 5 (see the preface to the Epistle to the Galatians, §. 2). Hence then I argue for the perfection of the scriptures thus: If the scriptures of the Old Testament were sufficient to make a man wise unto salvation, provided only that he believed that "Jesus was the Christ;" the scriptures of the Old and the New Testament must much more be so, because the scriptures of the New Testament must needs more plainly and fully contain the faith and duty of all Christians, than the scriptures of the Old only can be supposed to do.

Obj. But, saith Esthius, "If the scriptures of the Old Testament were sufficient to make men wise unto salvation, then there is no need of the gospels, or of the epistles, of the New Testament."

Ans. I answer, Yes: there was need of them, both to beget in men, and to confirm this faith in Christ, they being written "that we might believe, and believing might have life through his name" (John xx. 31); and also to give the Christians of succeeding ages a more full, plain, and perspicuous knowledge of those things, which were not so fully and plainly, to the capacity of the meanest, to be learnt in the Old Testament. Thus, though the five books of Moses sufficiently contained the whole Jewish law, it follows not that the historical and prophetical books, or the hagiographa, were superfluous.

Thirdly, Observe, that the apostle saith, these scriptures were therefore able to make Timothy, a Christian bishop, "wise to salvation," because they were "profitable for doctrine," to teach the Christian all that he was to believe, πρὸς ἔλεγχον, "for the correction" of every error in the faith, "for the conviction" of every vice which they were obliged to eschew, and for their "instruction in" every way of "righteousness;" even so profitable for these ends, as "to make the man of God perfect;" i. e. wanting in nothing he ought to practise or believe himself or teach others, for the edification of a Christian into "a perfect man in Christ Jesus," and to make him "thoroughly furnished to every good work." So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, upon the place.

False therefore here is the note of Esthius, That the scriptures are here said to be profitable, but not sufficient to these ends; vain is his subterfuge, that the apostle, by "every good work," understands only singula generum, "every kind of good works," but not "every good work of that kind," i. e. every work of faith and instruction in righteousness: for if these good works be requisite "to make the man of God perfect, and thoroughly furnished" for his office, they must be here included; if they be not, they must be needless in order to the discharge of it.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. Κατὰ τὴν ἐπιφάνειαν αὐτοῦ, καὶ τὴν βασιλείαν αὐτοῦ, At his appearance, and his kingdom.] "This appearance," saith Mr. Mede, "is the appearance of Christ, the word ἐπιφάνεια always importing Christ's advent, who, after the resurrection, and the judgment of the quick and dead, must give up his mediatory kingdom to the Father; it therefore must signify some other kingdom, proper to Christ's second coming; and what can that be, but the kingdom of the millennium?" But,

First, This appearance of Christ is his glorious appearance, when we shall receive "the blessed hope," i. e. the eternal happiness we hope for, Tit. ii. 13, when "we shall appear with him in glory," Col. iii. 4, when we shall be "made like unto him, and see him as he is," 1 John iii. 2; which cannot be expected till after this supposed millennium. It is the same with "the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ from heaven," 2 Thess. i. 7, his "glorious revelation," 1 Pet. iv. 13, and with his παρουσία, second "coming" which is, "a coming with all his saints," 2 Thess. iii. 13, "a coming of our Lord from heaven," 1 Thess. iv. 15, 16. Now Mr. Mede himself confesses, That he dares not so much as imagine, that the presence of Christ in the millenary kingdom would be visible upon earth: for the kingdom of Christ, saith he, p. 603, ever hath, and shall be regnum cœlorum, "a kingdom, whose throne and kingly residence is in heaven." And, thirdly, at this appearance, and his kingdom, saith the apostle, he shall judge the quick and the dead; not the dead only, but the quick and the dead; not some of them only, but all of them without exception. Now the judgment of the dead, is to be after the conclusion of the supposed millennium, Rev. xx. 12.

Secondly, Though Christ will, after the judgment of the quick and dead is completed, give up his mediatory kingdom; yet, since that very judgment consists in retribution of his final punishments upon his enemies, and crowning of his loyal subjects with eternal glory, which are the two chief acts of kingly government, and the very end for which all power was committed to him (John xvii. 2), it very properly is styled his "kingdom:" and though he shall then deliver up this kingdom, as it is a kingdom, which respects the rewarding of his servants, and the punishment of his enemies, when the first shall be crowned with eternal glory, and the last doomed to endless punishments; yet shall he still continue to be "King of saints," highly exalted above them in honour and dignity, and honoured still by them with religious respect and veneration.

Εὐκαίρως, καὶ ἀκαίρως, In season, and out of season.] That is, saith Chrysostom, not only when thou art in the church, but also in thine house; not only in times of peace and safety, but also when thou art in prison; not only in time of health, but even when thou art about to die.

[3] Ver. 4. Ἐπὶ τοὺς μύθους, To fables.] To the fabulous divinity of the Gnostics, and made up of gentilism and Judaism, say some; but it doth not appear that the fabulous divinity of the Gnostics, mentioned by Irenæus, was then hatched: it is far more probable, that he here speaks of the Jewish doctors, and their fabulous traditions; for in his First Epistle he saith, he left Timothy at Ephesus, that he might charge some among them not to teach other doctrines, "nor to give heed to fables and endless genealogies," 1 Tim. i. 3, 4, which, as it relates to the genealogies of the Jews, touching their tribes, their relation to the house of David, and their traditionary men (see the note there); so, ver. 7, the apostle plainly tells us, they were "teachers of the law;" which Simon and his followers said was not to be regarded. And in his Epistle to Titus, he sends a like exhortation to him, to preserve the Cretians from giving heed to Jewish fables (Tit. i. 14), and "doctrines of men that turn from the truth;" which the Gnostics, who never sincerely em-laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord (Jesus), the righteous judge, shall give me [4] at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love (Gr. have loved) his appearing (and shown that love by patient suffering for his sake).

9 Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me:

braced the truth, could not do; and to avoid "foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, καὶ μάχας νομικὰς, and quarrels about the law," as being unprofitable and vain (iii. 9).

[4] Ver. 8. Ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, At that day.] The council of Florence hath defined "That pure and cleansed souls, when they quit the body, are presently received into heaven, and there have a clear vision of the holy Trinity." And the Trent council, sess. 25, hath laid this as the foundation of the invocation of saints departed, that they do now, cum Christo regnare, et æternâ felicitate in cœlu frui; "reign with Christ, and enjoy eternal felicity in heaven." But in this they seem to deviate from scripture and the primitive antiquity: I say, from scripture; for,

First, Charity is represented by Paul as the most excellent of Christian virtues, and therefore that which will obtain the highest recompense; and yet the motive by which our Lord excites us to perform it runneth thus, "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just" (Luke xiv. 14).

Secondly, To those who suffer death and persecution for the name of Christ, our Lord hath promised "a great reward in heaven" (Matt. v. 12), but this reward will only be conferred upon them "at the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ from heaven with his mighty angels" (2 Thess. i. 7). "The trial of their faith shall be found to praise, glory, and honour, ἐν ἀποκαλύψει, at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. i. 17). Then they, who communicate with him in sufferings, shall rejoice with him, ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει, "at the revelation of his glory" (1 Pet. iv. 13); till then, the souls of them who were slain for the word of God are represented as "under the altar," Rev. vi. 9.

Thirdly, To those who "feed the flock of Christ," a great reward is promised, even a never-fading "crown of glory;" but it is to be received then only, "when the great Shepherd doth appear" (1 Pet. v. 4). A reward is to be rendered to the servants of God, the saints, and prophets; but it is to be rendered, "when the time comes that the dead shall be judged" (Rev. xi. 18). The apostles are to have their mansions in heaven with Christ, but not till he comes again from heaven: for then, saith he, "I will receive you to myself; that where I am, you may be also" (John xiv. 2, 3).

Fourthly, The retribution "to every man according to his works" is also to be made at the same time; for "the Son of man will come in the glory of his Father, with his holy angels; and then will he render to every man according to his works" (Matt. xvi. 27): "At the end of the world shall the righteous shine as the sun, in the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. xiii. 40. 43): this shall be done, "in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men's hearts" (Rom. ii. 15), and when we shall "appear before the judgment-seat of Christ" (2 Cor. v. 12, Rev. xxii. 10).

Fifthly, Hence, in the scripture, the time of recompense and the time of judgment are represented as the same; as in these words, "The time is come that the dead shall be judged, and that thou shouldest give rewards to thy servants the prophets, and to the saints" (Rev. xi. 18). The time of glory, and of the apparition of our Lord; as in these words, "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall you appear with him in glory" (Col. iii. 4). The time of Christ's appearance, and of our salvation; for, "he shall appear a second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 28). The time of his appearing, and of our beatific vision; for, "when he doth appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is" (1 John iii. 2).

Sixthly, Hence Christians are so often said to expect "the adoption of the sons of God, viz. the redemption of the body" from corruption (Rom. viii. 23); to "expect the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. i. 7); to "expect the Son of God from heaven" (1 Thess. i. 10): to "expect the blessed hope and glorious appearance of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Tit. ii. 14); to "hope for the grace that shall be given them at the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. i. 13).

Now let it be observed, That the body, compared to the soul, is the vilest and least considerable part of man; and therefore, the hope, the glory, the reward, inheritance, adoption, bliss, and happiness, reserved to the time of the resurrection, cannot respect the body only. Moreover, the apostle saith of the incestuous person, that his body was "delivered up to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, that his soul might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (1 Cor. v. 5), which shows, that the complete salvation of the soul is then to be expected.

As for the judgment of primitive antiquity in this matter, it may be learned from these considerations:

First, That they ascribe this opinion of the soul's immediate ascent to heaven, and its enjoyment of God's immediate presence after death, to the heretics of those times; representing it as proper to the followers of Valentinus, Basilides, and Marcion; and, after them, as a part of the heresy of the Manichees. Thus Justin Martyr, speaking of those who were called Christians, but blasphemed the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, saith, in his Dialogue with Trypho, p. 307. 354, "They denied the resurrection, and held, ὅμα τῷ ἀποθνήσκειν τὰς ψυχὰς αὐτῶν ἀναλαμβάνεσθαι εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν, that as soon as they died, their souls were received into heaven." Irenæus saith in like manner,* that "the heretics despised the formation of God," i. e. the body formed by him, "and not receiving (the doctrine of) the salvation of the flesh, simul atque mortui fuerint, dicunt se supergredi cœlis et demiurgum, et ire ad matrem vel ad eum qui ipsis affingitur patrem, say, that as soon as they are dead, they ascend above the heavens, and go to him whom they call their Father." And having said, that "our Lord's soul went not to heaven, but continued in the place of the dead till the resurrection;" he saith, "This is sufficient to confound these men, qui dicunt interiorem hominem ipsorum derelinquentem, hoc corpus in super-cœlestem ascendere locum, who say, that their inward man, leaving the body here, ascends to the super-celestial mansions." And then he gives the orthodox opinion thus;† "It is manifest that the souls of the disciples of our Lord shall go into the invisible place appointed for them by God, expecting the resurrection; and then receiving their bodies, and rising with them, as our Lord did, shall come in the presence of God." Tertullian, having produced the same instance of the death of Christ, and the continuance of his soul apud inferos, till the resurrection of the body, positively concludes, that,‡ nulli patet cœlum, terrâ adhuc salvâ, cum transactione enim mundi reserabuntur regna cœlorum; "heaven is open to none whilst the earth remains; the kingdom of heaven being only to be opened at the dissolution of the world." And in his fourth book against Marcion, he saith,§ "The bosom of Abraham, which is higher than the inferi, but not so high as heaven, is that which gives refreshment to the souls of the just, till the consummation of all things produces the resurrection of all, with a full reward."

The Manichees, who also denied the resurrection of the body, contended, that good souls had their whole reward immediately after death; because Christ promised to the thief, that he should be that day with him in paradise. To which objection Chrysostom answers, by concession, that the thief was indeed admitted to paradise; but then he adds, that paradise was not the same with heaven, μὴ γὰρ ταὐτά ἐστι τὰ ἀγαθὰ, ἅπερ ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῖν ἐπαγγέλλεται, "for it contains not the good things which God hath promised to us;" and then con-

11 Only [6] Luke is with me. Take Mark, and bring him with thee: for [7] he is profitable to me for the ministry (Mark therefore was not then in Egypt).

16 [13] At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men (of my acquaintance at Rome) forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge.

17 Notwithstanding the Lord (Jesus) [14] stood with cludes, that if God promised "the kingdom of heaven," and only brought the thief into paradise, οὐέπω ἀπέδωκεν αὐτῷ τὰ ἀγαθὰ, "he hath not yet given to him the good things promised."

2. That they expressly teach, that the souls of good men remain till the day of judgment in a certain place, extra cœlum beatorum, "out of heaven," expecting the day of judgment and retribution. Thus Justin Martyr* saith, that no souls die; but, τὰς μὲν τῶν εἰσεβῶν ἐν κρείττονί τινι χώρῳ μένειν, τὰς δ' ἀδίκους καὶ πονηρὰς ἐν χείρονι, τὸν τῆς κρίσεως ἐκδεχομένας χρόνον, that "the souls of good men remain in a better place, the souls of bad men in a worse, expecting the day of judgment." Irenæus† gives us the tradition of the church touching this matter, thus; "The presbyters, who were the disciples of the apostles, say, Those that were translated, were carried into paradise; for that place is prepared for just men, and such as have the Spirit, and there they remain till the consummation, expecting, or beginning immortality;" and that there shall be "new heavens and new earth;" and then, οἱ μὲν καταξιωθέντες τῆς ἐν οὐρανῷ ἐιατριβῆς ἐκεῖσε χωρήσουσιν, "they that are worthy of the celestial mansions shall go thither." Tertullian,‡ having cited those words of the apostle, "And the God of peace sanctify you throughout, in body, soul, and spirit, and keep you unblameable to the coming of the Lord" (1 Thess. v. 23), saith thus, Habes omnem substantiam hominis saluti destinatam, nec alio tempore quàm in adventû Domini, qui clavis est resurrectionis; "Here you see the whole substance of man designed for salvation, nor at any other time but the appearance of our Lord, who is the key of the resurrection." There is a place, saith Novatian,§ quò piorum animæ impiorumque ducuntur, futuri judicii præjudicia sentientes, "whither the souls of good and wicked men are carried, having some foretastes of their future judgment." And Caius,‖ a presbyter of the church of Rome, saith, that just souls being celebrated by the angels placed over them, ἄγονται εἰς χωρίον φωτεινὸν ἐν ᾧ οἱ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς δίκαιοι πολιτεύονται, "are led by them into a place of light, called the bosom of Abraham, where the just from the beginning have been; where they are delighted with the vision of the just fathers, expecting, τὴν μετὰ τοῦτο χωρίον ἀνάπαυσιν, καὶ αἰωνίην ἀναβίωσιν ἐν οὐρανῷ, after this place, their rest and everlasting habitation in heaven." Let no man think, saith Lactantius,¶ animas post mortem protinùs judicari, "that souls are forthwith judged after death; they are all held in one common custody, till the time may come that the great Judge shall make a trial of their merits" (see Dall. de Pœn. et Satisf. lib. v. cap. 3—6).

[5] Ver. 10. Ἀγαπήσας τὸν νῦν αἰῶνα, Having loved this present world.] He doth not say, that Demas had forsaken the Christian religion, or that he betook himself to his own secular affairs, forsaking his attendance on the service of God in the church, or preferred the things of this life before those of a future; but, as the ancients do expound the words, he left the apostle in this time of danger, consulting the safety of his own life; for ὁ νῦν αἰὼν, in the scripture phrase, still signifies "this present life:" so, οἱ πλούσιοι ἐν τῷ νῦν αἰῶνι are "those that are rich in this life" (1 Tim. vi. 17). "To live soberly, righteously, and godly," ἐν τῷ νῦν αἰῶνι, is to do it in "this present life" (see Mark x. 30, 1 Tim. iv. 8). He seems therefore only to say of him here, what he says of others, ver. 16, "In my first apology no man stood by me, but all left me."

[6] Ver. 11. Luke.] Hence it appears that Luke must be alive at the twelfth or thirteenth of Nero, when this epistle was indited.

[7] Εὔχρηστός εἰς διακονίαν, He is profitable for the ministry.] i. e. For the work of an evangelist (ver. 5). As Peter, being shortly to put off his tabernacle, was the more diligent in giving instruction to the churches of the Jews (2 Pet. i. 13, 14), so was Paul, now in bonds, in sending his messengers to the churches of the gentiles (ver. 10. 12).

[8] Ver. 12. To Ephesus.] Hence it is evident, that Timothy, at the writing of this epistle, was not at Ephesus; for if so, why should the apostle advertise him, that he had sent Tychicus thither?

[9] Ver. 13. Τὸν φελόνην, The cloak.] Or rather, "the roll:" for φελόνη, saith Phavorinus, is εἰλητάριον μέμβρανον, "a parchment rolled up; φελόνη εἴλητον τομάριον μέμβρανον, a folded vellum or parchment:" and Hesychius saith the same.

[10] Ὃν ἀπέλιπον ἐν Τρωάδι, Which I left at Troas.] Not when he went from Troas to Assos, in his journey to Jerusalem; for then, saith Bishop Pearson, he could have no cause to leave any thing of moment with him, having so many that accompanied him in that journey (Acts xx. 4. 6), and a ship still attending on them (ver. 13): but in his travels, after he was set at liberty, and had left Rome.

[11] Ἐρχόμενος, Coming,] Probably from thence; for he does not bid him send thither for them, or go thither to fetch them: whence it follows, that Timothy was then at Troas, when this epistle was directed to him.

[12] Ver. 14. Ἀποδώη.] The king's manuscript reads ἀποδώσει, "will or shall reward him." And all the ancients note, that this is not an imprecation, but προφήτησις πρέπουσα ἀνδρὶ ἀποστόλῳ, "a prediction becoming an apostle." So Pseudo-Justin, Qu. et Resp. 125. So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, on the place. Who this Alexander was, or where he lived, is uncertain; as also whether he were a Christian, but zealous for the Jewish rites, as he must be, if he were the Alexander delivered up to Satan (1 Tim. i. 20), or a heathen, zealous, as Demetrius was, for his trade, and on that account opposing the apostle.

[13] Ver. 16. Ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ μου ἀπολογίᾳ, In my first apology.] If the date of this epistle, contended for in the preface, stand good, this could not be his first defence of the gospel, of which he speaks, Phil. i. 17. For after that, he was set at liberty; whereas after this, he is still a prisoner (i. 8, ii. 9). Moreover, Timothy was then with him at Rome, as appears from the salutations then sent to the churches of Philippi (i. 1) and Colosse (i. 1), from Paul and Timothy; yea, he was a prisoner there, even after that Paul was set at liberty, and so needed not to be taught how things went with the apostle then. He therefore calls this his "first apology," or defence, because, after he had made it, he was still kept in bonds (i. 8, ii. 9), and so reserved for another hearing. He escaped then, say Chrysostom* and Œcumenius: "but when he instructed Nero's butler or cupbearer in the faith, he was cut off."

and support me; as, Acts xviii. 9; so ἐπιστὰς is used Acts xxiii. 11, and παρέστη, Acts xxvii. 23; or to "give me mouth and wisdom," according to his promise, Luke xii. 12, xxi. 14, 15.

[16] Ver. 18. Καὶ ῥύσεταί με, And will deliver me.] If he will deliver him, saith Chrysostom, why saith he, "I am now offered?" Mark therefore his words, he saith not, He will again deliver me out of the mouth of the lion; but only, that "he will preserve me from every evil work, and to his heavenly kingdom."

[17] Ver. 20.] That Paul was in bonds when he writ this epistle, and at Rome, he himself saith, i. 8. 17. Now this verse affords two arguments, to prove he could not be then in his first bonds: first, from these words, "Erastus abode at Corinth:" when was it? when Paul went from Corinth to go to Jerusalem? then Timothy accompanied him, at least as far as Asia, and so needed not to be told that, from Rome, so long after: it therefore must refer to the time when, saith the reverend Bishop Pearson, Paul went from Nicopolis to Corinth, A. D. 65, and the twelfth of Nero. Secondly, From these words, "Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick:" now this cannot relate to the time when Paul went to Miletus, near Ephesus (Acts xx. 17); for as Timothy was then with him (Acts xx. 4. 15), so was not Trophimus then left at Miletum, but carried up thence with Paul to Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 29); nor did Paul ever return thither (Acts xx. 25): he must be therefore left at Miletus in Crete, where Paul was, saith Bishop Pearson, after his first bonds, A. D. 64, Ner. 10.

EPISTLE TO TITUS,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

§. 1. That Paul was at Crete, we learn from these words of this Epistle to Titus, "I left thee in Crete:" when he went thither is uncertain. Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that he touched there when he went from Macedonia to Greece, Acts xx. 2. "For," saith he, "if we consider that after their parting at Ephesus, when Titus was sent to Corinth with his first epistle to them, they never met till Titus cometh up to him, when he was come from Ephesus to Macedonia, 2 Cor. vii. 5, 6; we may thence learn, that in that first journey to Macedonia, he left him not at Crete, because Titus and he were not yet met again after their parting at Ephesus; and yet, after his second return thither, he had not only left him there, but writes to him to come thence to Nicopolis, bordering on Macedonia, iii. 12, so that this epistle must be writ in his return, or at his coming thither, A. D. 55; and not from Nicopolis, as the postscript dates it; for he saith not, I have determined to winter ἐνταῦθα, here, but ἐκεῖ, there; which shows he was not yet come thither."

§. 2. But that it could not be written at that time, the learned Bishop Pearson proves, not only from the silence of Luke in that very chapter, where he so particularly enumerates all Paul's journeys, after he came from Ephesus, till his arrival at Jerusalem, without the least mention of his being at Crete; but saith expressly, that διελθὼν, "passing through those parts (viz. of Macedonia), and exhorting them with many words, he came to Achaia," representing him still in transitû, and as passing immediately from Macedonia to Greece, not going from Macedonia farther beyond it than was to it, and then returning back to Greece, as he must have done had he gone from Macedonia to Crete, and so to Achaia. Secondly, This opinion he more demonstratively confutes from these words, iii. 12, "When I send to thee Artemas, or Tychicus, make haste to come unto me to Nicopolis, for I have determined there to winter:" for, besides that Artemas, before his going to Jerusalem, seems not to have joined Paul, and Tychicus then was part of his retinue, there is not any mention of Paul's going to Nicopolis, in the whole history of his journey to Jerusalem; nor is it possible he should then determine to winter at Nicopolis, who being at Philippi in the days of unleavened bread, made all the haste he could to be at Jerusalem before pentecost, Acts xx. 6. 16 (see more to this purpose, Dissert. 1, de Success. Prim. Romæ Episc. cap. 9, §. 7). He therefore places Paul's journey to Crete after his freedom from his bonds at Rome, A. D. 63, and the tenth of Nero, and saith, that this epistle was written the year following: that it was writ after his freedom from the bonds in which he was from his going to Jerusalem till his freedom at Rome, he gathers from this note of Chrysostom* and Theophylact, That the apostle seemeth to have been then at ease, as making mention in it of his bonds, or his temptations, as he doth in his Epistle to the Ephesians, iii. 1, iv. 1, to the Philippians, i. 7. 13, 14, to the Colossians, iv. 18, to Philemon, ver. 1. 9; and in his Second Epistle to Timothy, i. 8, ii. 9. That after his freedom he determined to go to Philippi in Macedonia, he himself intimates, Phil. i. 26, ii. 24. "And this," saith Bishop Pearson, "he did in the twelfth of Nero, in which year he wrote this epistle." And that he writ it a little after he had been at Crete, may be gathered from these words, Tim. iv. 20, "Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick;" which cannot be understood of Miletus near Ephesus, mentioned Acts xx. 17, for from thence he carried him to Jerusalem, Acts xxi. 29, never returning thither, Acts xx. 25. He must be therefore left sick at Miletus in Crete, mentioned by Homer,* and by Strabo.†

* Δοκοῦσι δέ μοι χρόνοι εἶναι μεσοί τινες, καὶ ἐν ἀδείᾳ Παῦλος γράφει ταῦτα· οὐδὲν γὰρ περὶ πειρασμῶν φησί. Proem.

§. 3. It is the opinion of all the ancient commentators upon this epistle, that Titus was left in Crete, not only to ordain bishops in every city, and deacons to minister to them, but also to rebuke sharply, and with authority, unruly walkers; and this epistle was writ to him, say the ancients,‡ "to make him watchful over, and to oppose himself against the Jews and Judaizers in that island, as many passages in this epistle do sufficiently demonstrate.

§. 4. But the great controversy concerning this, and the Epistle to Timothy, is, whether Timothy and Titus were indeed made bishops, the one of Ephesus and the Proconsular Asia, the other of Crete, having authority to make, καὶ τοσούτων ἐπισκόπων κρίσιν,§ "and jurisdiction over so many bishops as were in those precincts." Now of this matter, I confess I can find nothing in any writer of the first three centuries, nor any intimation that they bore that name: but this defect is abundantly supplied by the concurrent suffrage of the fourth and fifth centuries. For,

First, As for Timothy, he is styled bishop of Ephesus by Eusebius,‖ and that with respect to former histories; and the same he saith of Titus. And the council of Chalcedon¶ reckons from Timothy to their time twenty-seven bishops. The anonymous author of his life, in Photius, makes him bishop of the metropolis of Ephesus, with seven assistants; and either he, or Photius, say that he was constituted bishop by Paul; and the Apostolical Constitutions say the same,†† as do also Jerome,‡‡ and all the ancient commentators on his epistles.

Secondly, That Titus had τὴν νῆσον ὁλόκληρον, "the whole island" of Crete committed to his care, is testified not only by Eusebius, but also by Jerome in his Catalogue, by Ambrose, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius in the preface to this epistle, to omit many others cited by Dr. Cave in the Life of Titus, p. 58, 59. Now to pass my judgment in this case:

First, I assert, that if by saying Timothy and Titus were "bishops," the one of Ephesus, the other of Crete, we understand that they took upon them those churches or dioceses, as their fixed and peculiar charge, in which they were to preside for the term of life, I believe that Timothy and Titus were not thus bishops: for,

First, Both Timothy and Titus were evangelists, and therefore were to do the work of an evangelist: now the work of an evangelist, saith Eusebius* was this, "to lay the foundations of the faith in barbarous nations, to constitute them pastors, and having committed to them the cultivating of those new plantations, they passed on to other countries and nations."

Secondly, As for Titus, he was only left at Crete to "ordain elders in every city, and to set in order the things that were wanting;" having therefore done that work, he had done all that was assigned him in that station: and therefore Paul sends for him the very next year to Nicopolis, Tit. iii. 12. And so, according to Bishop Pearson's chronology, he was left at Crete only A. D. 64, and sent for thence A. D. 65, and returned thither, as the ancients conjecture, after the death of Paul: for they say† he died in the ninety-fourth year of his age, and was buried in Crete.

As for Timothy, Paul saith he exhorted him to abide at Ephesus when he went into Macedonia: now, as he writes to the church of Philippi in Macedonia A. D. 62, and the ninth of Nero, that he hoped to be shortly with them, Phil. i. 25, 26, ii. 24; so, saith Bishop Pearson, he went thither A. D. 64, and the eleventh of Nero, and writ his First Epistle to him, A. D. 65. Two years after this he sends for him to Rome, 2 Tim. iv. 9. 21; and there he continued, as the ancients conjecture, till the martyrdom of St. Paul; after which time he must, as they suppose, return to Ephesus: for they tell us, that in the reign of Domitian he was martyred in that city, and lay buried there. But since we read not any thing in scripture of their return to either of these places afterward, and the authorities on which his return dependeth are not very ancient, we cannot much rely upon them.

Prop. 2. But if by "bishops" we only understand persons who had authority to ordain, and to govern the clergy of their province, and to exercise acts of discipline and censure over more than one single congregation, I believe both Timothy and Titus had this episcopal jurisdiction, and so might properly be styled "bishops."

First, That the jurisdiction of Titus extended to all the Christians in the whole island of Crete, is apparent from these words, "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou mightest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city," Tit. i. 5. Hence is he said to have received "the episcopal care, τῶν ἐπὶ Κρήτης ἐκκλησιῶν, of the churches in Crete," and to have the whole island committed to him.

And if the church at Ephesus, committed to the care of Timothy, did not exceed the compass of one particular congregation, Paul had very little success in the great pains he took "for three whole years to teach them publicly, and from house to house, exhorting every one of them night and day," Acts xx. 30, 31. Whereas Paul himself informs us, that at Ephesus "a great door, and effectual, was opened to him," 1 Cor. xvi. 8, 9; Luke, that "all that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and gentiles;" that "the word of God prevailed and grew mightily, and that fear fell upon them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified," Acts xix. 10. 17. 20. But that which puts this matter beyond doubt, is the observation of the learned Bishop Stillingfleet, that the elders Paul sends for to Miletus were all of Ephesus, and to them he commits, not only the church of Ephesus, but all the flock over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers, i. e. all that had been converted in Asia through his means, during his abode there three years. Irenæus, indeed, saith he summoned them "from the neighbouring cities," as well as Ephesus: "but," saith he, "Paul was in so great haste, that he would not so much as go to Ephesus, nor send any whither but to that city; and yet those to whom he committed the whole flock, then in Asia, came from Ephesus to Miletus:" which makes it probable that there Paul had raised a nursery for the churches thereabout; as Clement observes the apostles were wont to do in fruitful soils, with a prospect of such churches as were to be formed, τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν, "of those that should after believe:" and the same Clement observing that they did this, δοκιμάσαντες τῷ Πνεύματι, "making trial of them by their spiritual gifts," he very probably conjectures that the twelve persons who, "when he laid his hands upon them, received the Holy Ghost, and spake with tongues, and prophesied," Acts xix. 6, 7, being thus qualified in an extraordinary manner to be teachers of others, might be in the number of those elders whom Paul charges to "take heed to themselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers," ver. 28.

As to the jurisdiction belonging to them in their several districts, it is also manifest concerning Timothy, that he was set over the house of God, 1 Tim. iii. 14, 15; that in that house he was to ordain, and to lay hands on the elders to be chosen to that office, v. 22; to choose such to the episcopal office, or to the office of elders, who were duly qualified for that work, iii. 2. 7; to admit and consecrate others to the office of deacons, ver. 8; to take widows into the number of deaconesses, under such qualifications, and to refuse others, v. 9. 11; to receive accusations against the elders, v. 19; and to rebuke them, ver. 20. Which plainly shows there was a right of judging and censuring offenders in Timothy, by virtue of his office. He had power also to order the maintenance of the elders, ver. 17; to take care that the public offices of divine worship were performed regularly, ii. 1. 8; to "charge others not to teach any other doctrine" than what they had received, i. 3; to "command and teach with authority," v. 11; and not to suffer others to "despise his authority," ver. 12. And all these things seem plainly to belong to the trust committed to him, vi. 20.

And as for Titus, it is certain he was left in Crete by Paul, "to set in order the things which were wanting," i. 5; and, in order to this end, to inspect the qualifications of them who were to be admitted to the episcopal office, ver. 17; and so "to ordain elders in every city." And he was also to admonish and reject heretics, iii. 10.

Now I confess that these two instances, absolutely taken, afford us no convincing arguments for a settled diocesan episcopacy, because there is nothing which proves they did or were to exercise these acts of government rather as bishops than evangelists; for it is certain that the order of evangelists was superior to that of governments, and so included an authority to do those acts of government which belonged to bishops. Accordingly, in those places where these evangelists preached they did, ποιμένας καθιστάναι,* "constitute pastors," and then went on to preach in other places. Yet these things evidently follow hence:

1. That such superiority over other pastors cannot be contrary to the gospel rule; or that the nature of church government doth not imply an equality among the governors of it: and that the apostles, if they pleased, might have fixed persons in any other churches, to exercise these acts of ecclesiastical authority and jurisdiction, as well as Paul placed these two persons, the one at Ephesus, the other at Crete, for these ends.

2. That it is not repugnant to the constitutions of churches in the apostolical times, for men to have jurisdiction over more than one particular congregation; for such a power Titus had over all Crete, and Timothy over many elders: which, had it been contrary to the nature of church-government, would not have been permitted, and much less ordained, by St. Paul, in any of the churches planted by him.

3. Hence also it appears, that the apostolical power of governing churches and ordaining elders in them, was not so limited to the persons of the apostles but that it might be communicated to others, whom the apostles would entrust with it; and therefore might be continued in the church after their decease: and if it be granted that such an apostolical power of governing churches might be committed to others, and was actually so, by the apostles; it remains only to inquire, whether, upon their remove or departure, they did entrust any persons in such a manner as, it is certain from scripture, Paul did Timothy, as to the churches of Asia: of which we shall discourse hereafter.

4. From these words, "The things which thou hast heard from me, confirmed by many witnesses, commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also;" it may be fairly argued that the apostle here appoints Timothy* to constitute a succession of men vested with ecclesiastical authority, to teach them, and command others to observe them. And from those words to Titus, "I left thee in Crete, to ordain elders, κατὰ πόλιν, ὡς ἐγώ σοι διεταξάμην, in every city, as I ordered thee," Tit. i. 5; "for a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God," ver. 7, it is also fairly gathered that a succession of bishops was to be constituted in every city, as persons that were to take care of the church of God there, 1 Tim. iii. 5. And my conjecture is, that Paul, after his liberty from his first bonds, having travelled into Spain and Judea, and from thence to Macedonia, began to settle this church-government in all the churches where they before were wanting; that so, after his death, they might be all provided with them: that upon this account Titus was sent by him to Crete, i. 5, and afterward to Dalmatia, 2 Tim. iv. 11; and that the First Epistle to Timothy was not writ to him to require him to stay at Ephesus, where bishops had been settled long before, but to instruct him "how to behave himself in the church of God" in general, iii. 15; doing the office of an evangelist, by ordaining church-governors where he found them wanting, and ordering other matters, as he saw them needful, in any of those places to which he resorted. But then, if we take in the suffrage of antiquity, and consult them who were nearest to the fountain of church-government, we shall find still greater reason to believe that it was διάταξις ἀποστολικὴ, "an apostolical ordinance," to appoint bishops with the chief jurisdiction over cities: for we find plainly, by the forementioned instances, that the apostles had this power in themselves, and did convey it to some others; but whether they did this universally, and with a design to continue this order, being an inquiry about matter of fact, must be proved by the best means we can use in a matter of fact of so great antiquity. Now there can be no stronger proof of such a matter of fact, than the general sense and concurrent practice of the Christian church in the ages next succeeding the apostles. And this general sense of the Christian church may be demonstrated,

1. From undoubted testimonies affording a clear evidence of this succession in the most conspicuous churches. And as for the undoubted testimonies of this succession in the most conspicuous churches, "I shall first appeal," saith the learned Bishop of Worcester, "to Irenæus and Tertullian, at least liable to exception." The former not only mentions a succession of persons to the apostles, but he saith,† "The apostles committed the care of the churches to them, and left them to succeed in their places:" which implies, that as the apostles had themselves the care of ministering to the church, and the power of governing and presiding over it, so they committed it to the bishops whom they chose to succeed them. Tertullian not only mentions them in general who succeeded the apostles,‡ but particularly instances in Polycarp, placed by John at Smyrna, and Clemens, by Peter at Rome; and then he adds, that "the other churches had bishops placed in them like to these:" so that what authority Clemens had at Rome, and Polycarp at Smyrna, that, Tertullian affirms, the bishops had in other churches.

† Habemus annumerare eos qui ab apostolis instituti sunt episcopi in ecclesiis, et successores eorum usque ad nos, quibus etiam ipsas ecclesias committebant, quos et successores relinquebant, suum ipsorum locum magisterii tradentes. Lib. iii. cap. 3. Lino episcopatum administrandæ ecclesiæ tradebant. Ibid.

‡ Evolvant ordinem episcoporum suorum (hæretici), ita per successiones ab initio decurrentem, ut primus ille episcopus aliquem ex apostolis, vel apostolicis viris, qui tamen cum apostolis perseveraverit, habuerit auctorem, et antecessorem; hôc enim modo ecclesiæ apostolicæ census suos deferunt, sicut Smyrnæorum ecclesia Polycarpum ad Joanne conlocatum refert, sicut Romanorum Clementem à Petro ordinatum itidem: perinde utique et cæteræ exhibent, quos ab apostolis in episcopatum constitutos apostolici seminis traduces habeant. De Præscript. Hæret. cap. 32.

Now Irenæus saith that Linus and Clemens had the episcopal power of governing the church: and as for Polycarp, he, even by the Jews* and gentiles‡, was styled, ὁ τῆς Ἀσίας διδάσκαλος, "the master, or teacher of Asia;" by Jerome,† πάσης τῆς Ἀσίας ἀρχηγός, "the governor of all Asia;" and by Ignatius,‡ κυβερνήτης, "the governor of the church of Smyrna."

Add to this, these words of Mr. Dodwell, to those who denied the presidency of bishops over the church in those ages: "What can they say to the angels in the Revelation? What, to the testimony of Irenæus, concerning Polycarp? What, to the testimony of Clemens Alexandrinus,§ who mentions bishops among other officers of the church, settled by John? What, to the testimony of Hegesippus,‖ who makes the kinsmen of our Saviour, ἡγήσασθαι τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, 'to have been governors of the churches, from Domitian's time to that of Trajan?' What to those who mention James¶ as made bishop of Jerusalem by the apostles themselves? What, of the seven Polycrates mentions as bishops in his own see before himself? Nay, what, to all those catalogues of bishops succeeding in the four patriarchal sees, particularly the fifteen in Jerusalem, from James, to the destruction of the Jews under Hadrian? Nay, what, to the succession of all the apostolical sees, to which the fathers of the second century do so solemnly appeal, to prove their own doctrine apostolical, in opposition to the contrary pretences of the heretics? Can they think them all to have been either wilful forgeries, or general mistakes, in a matter of fact, so near their own time, without so much as any likely ground in history? How will they then assure us, that they were not mistaken, in delivering to us the books of the apostles, which were not more notorious to them than their government."

2. This general sense of the church may be demonstrated, from the unreasonableness of the supposition, that the form of government, left to the churches by the apostles, should be so quickly changed, as they suppose, who do conceive that the apostles left no governors superior to presbyters, or pastors of one congregation, in the church: for it is clearly proved, by the learned bishop of Chester, that the writers of the second century distinctly mentioned the several orders of bishops, and their inferior presbyters in the same church; and thereby give us reason to conclude, that disparity was settled in that age, and therefore it is very improbable it should be otherwise in the preceding age of the apostles: for that, in the frame and substance of the established government of the church, a thing always in use and practice, there should be so sudden a change, so universal a corruption, in so short a time; and that all Christians, all the degraded clergy, without the least degree of opposition that we meet with, or we read of, should conspire in, or consent to this innovation and corruption, is a thing morally impossible: for, as Tertullian argues in a like case, "What all Christian churches did so early agree in practising uniformly, came not by error, but by tradition." The improbability of this sudden and general innovation will be farther evident, if we consider,

1. The subjects of this constitution, viz. the persons appointed by the apostles, or apostolical men, to govern and preside in every church; they being constant objects of every person's common sense, seen in every assembly, employed in every ecclesiastical affair, public or private, in which Christians, sick or well, living or dying, were concerned. Now in a matter of this kind, which was the daily object of the senses of all Christians, we cannot easily conceive how they could possibly mistake, and not perceive that such a change was made, if really it was done.

Again, We shall be more convinced, that this was not performed by conspiracy, or by a joint consent of Christians, to make this alteration in that form of government which the apostles had established, if we consider,

1. The general agreement of all churches in this matter; since not one single church can be produced, in which this government did not obtain. For how can we imagine, that, in a time when no general council could meet to appoint it, and when there were no Christian princes to set it forward on a political account; and when, by reason of the heat of persecution, and the distance of Christian churches, there was so little commerce and intercourse between them, from the churches of Armenia and Persia in the east, to those of Spain in the west; from the African churches in the south, to our British churches in the north; this constitution should universally be received, and submitted to, if it had not been established by the apostles, or the first founders of those churches?

2. If we consider how much it did concern all churches, that such an innovation should not obtain amongst them, and tamely be submitted to; for all the people were obliged to know their governors, to which they were by scripture obliged to submit, and so they could not yield to this innovation, without the greatest danger to their souls: the presbyters, if they had by the apostles been advanced to the highest power, would not so weakly have submitted to an authority usurped over them; but either out of a just zeal to assert their freedom, or out of indignation at the insolence of the usurping bishops, or out of that unwillingness to submit and obey, which is natural to all men, would have asserted their equality.

3. This will be farther evident, if we consider, that even the persons then exalted could have no motive or temptation to accept of this advancement: for men do not easily desire a change, but upon prospect of some ease or temporal advantage; much less when they perceive the change is like to add to their trouble, and increase their danger. Now this was really the case of the first Christian bishops, they being still exposed to the sharpest fury of their persecutors, and commonly begun with first, when any storm was raised against the church: their labours also were very great; for the care of the flock lay on them, and they were unwearied in the discharge of the pastoral care. Can we then reasonably think, that they could be so fond of so much toil and peril, as to violate the institution of the blessed Jesus or his apostles to obtain it?

CHAPTER I.

1 PAUL, [1] a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, [2] according to (κατὰ, for the promotion of) the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging of [3] the truth which is after godliness;

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Δοῦλος Θεοῦ, A servant of God.] He writes not this to confirm his authority to Titus, who doubted not at all of it; but to confirm it to others with whom he did converse, or to whom this epistle might come; it being of use not only to direct Titus then, but all bishops and rulers of the church for ever.

[2] Κατὰ πίστιν, For the promotion of the faith of God's elect.] i. e. The faith of Christians in the general, they being all γένος ἐκλεκτὸν, "an elect generation," 1 Pet. ii. 9, and Paul being an apostle in reference to them all, to them to whom he was "a savour of death," as well as to them to whom he was "a savour of life," 2 Cor. ii. 16.

[3] Τῆς κατ' εὐσέβειαν ἀληθείας, The truth which is after godliness.] The "mystery of godliness," 1 Tim. iii. 16, the "doctrine which is after godliness," 1 Tim. vi. 3. This is therefore only necessary to be believed, so far as that belief

2 [4] In (ἐπ', with that) hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, (hath) promised before the world began (i. e. from the beginning of ages);

3 But hath in due times manifested (ἐφανέρωσε δὲ καιροῖς ἰδίοις, and hath, in its proper season, manifested this) his word (of promise) through preaching (of it to the gentiles), which (office) is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour;

4 (I, Paul, write this) To (thee, O) Titus, mine own son after the common faith: (wishing to thee) grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and (from) the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour.

5 (Advertising thee, that) For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that (as yet) are wanting, and ordain [5] elders in every city, as I had appointed thee:

6 If any be blameless, [6] the husband of one wife (neither guilty of polygamy, nor married again after is necessary to a holy life. To confirm this inference, let these following arguments be considered:

First, That which "hath the promise of this life, and that which is to come," must be sufficient to secure us of the enjoyment of the life to come; but godliness, saith the apostle, "hath the promise of this life, and that which is to come," 1 Tim. iv. 18. Ergo, again, that which hath contentment is great gain, and must sure avail us to salvation, seeing, without salvation, we can gain nothing which is truly good; but "godliness with contentment is great gain," 1 Tim. vi. 6. Ergo,

Secondly, If this be the great end, for which ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡ σωτήριος, "the saving grace of God hath appeared to us, viz. To teach us that, denying all ungodliness, and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godlily, in this present world;" and if, by doing so, we may "expect the blessed hope and glorious appearance of our Lord" with comfort, then must this holiness administer to us an assurance of our future happiness. Now all this is the express saying of Paul, Tit. ii. 11, 12. 14. Ergo,

Thirdly, By what we do entirely attain the end for which our Saviour died, or suffered on the cross, by that we must attain assurance of the benefits of his death and passion, viz. remission of sins, justification, and salvation; but this we do, by "dying to sin and living unto righteousness;" that is, by being holy in our lives and conversations: for "Christ bore our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sin, might live to righteousness," 1 Pet. ii. 24. And to as many as are thus conformed to his death, by dying unto sin, he hath promised that they "shall be conformed to him in likeness of his resurrection," Rom. viii. 11. Faith therefore can be no farther necessary, than it is requisite to engage us "to die unto sin, and to live to righteousness."

Fourthly, This will be farther evident even from the nature of true holiness; for seeing that consisteth in a participation of the divine nature, 2 Pet. i. 4, in "putting on the new man, which is created after God in righteousness and true holiness," Eph. iv. 24, in being "holy in all manner of conversation, as he that has called us is holy," 1 Pet. i. 15, it plainly follows, either that they who live to God, who are like him in holiness, who have the image of God instamped upon them, and who are "made partakers of the divine nature," may notwithstanding, perish everlastingly, or that true holiness may render us secure of happiness.

Fifthly, It seems evident, that a good and a wise God cannot reveal things only to stuff our heads with notions, when they have no influence upon our hearts to make us better: since, then, to disbelieve them would be pernicious, and yet the believing them would do us no good, and a wise God must require this faith to no end, his design in requiring us to believe in Jesus Christ being this, "that believing we may have life through his name," John xx. 31, and the very "end of our faith" is "the salvation of our souls," 1 Pet. i. 9, he therefore can require us to believe nothing but what hath a real tendency to the obtainment of that life, and that salvation, which is the end of our whole faith.

[4] Ver. 2, 3.] Note, By comparing these two verses with those words in Timothy, "He hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, before the world began; but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel; whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the gentiles," 2 Tim. i. 9—11; I say from these words compared together, it may be inferred,

First, That the promise of eternal life, mentioned in both places, is the promise of calling those gentiles, to whom Paul was an apostle, to that faith which had the promise of eternal life annexed to it: for this promise God is said to have performed, by Paul's preaching this word of life to the gentiles.

Secondly, That this hope of eternal life was not made manifest till the appearing of our Saviour, and the preaching of the gospel to the world; he having "brought life and immortality to light by the gospel," 2 Tim. i. 10, and manifested the hope of it by the preaching of the word of faith.

Thirdly, Seeing no such promise could be made to men, no such grace given to them, before there were any men in the world, these words, πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, cannot properly be rendered "before the world began;" but, as Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Œcumenius, render them, ἄνωθεν· ἐξ ἀρχῆς, "of old time," or "from the beginning:" so, the revelation of the calling of the gentiles is styled, "The revelation of the mystery, χρόνοις αἰωνίοις σεσιγημένου, kept secret from men since the world began," Rom. xvi. 25, but now manifested by the scriptures of the prophets. This promise therefore was contained in the writings of the prophets, and either must relate to the promise made to Adam immediately after the fall, that "the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head," which was a promise made from the beginning, and πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, before any of the three ages of the world were passed; or, to the promise made to Abraham, that "in his seed should all the families of the earth be blessed," which was a promise made a long time ago, and before the first age of the world expired. So Zacharias speaks of the promise of the Messias, made διὰ τῶν ἀπ' αἰῶνος προφητῶν, "by the holy prophets from the beginning," Luke i. 70. And Jerusalem is mentioned as an apostatizing city, ἀφ' ἡμέρων αἰῶνος "from the days of old," Ezra iv. 15. 19, and, ἀπ' αἰῶνος, "of old," Esd. ii. 23. 26. If it refer to the promise or declaration made to Adam, that "the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head," that must be a declaration that the Messiah should exempt us from that mortality the serpent had brought upon the seed of Adam, and consequently a promise that he should procure for us a happy resurrection to eternal life: if we refer it to the promise made to Abraham, "In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed," we, by that blessing, being made the adopted "sons of God, and heirs according to the promise," Gal. iii. 29, must have a title by it to the "redemption of our bodies," and must become sons of the resurrection to eternal life, and by it receiving the promise of that Spirit, which is the earnest of that inheritance, Gal. iii. 14, must thereby be assured of it.

[5] Ver. 5. Πρεσβυτέρους.] Hence it appears, that at the first conversion of the Cretians to the faith, they had no bishops or presbyters set over them, but had all their church-offices performed by men assisted by that Holy Spirit, which God shed on them abundantly, through faith in Christ (iii. 6), though out of these, bishops and deacons usually were chosen: but then it is observable, that things were then wanting: or, that this was a deficiency in that church.

[6] Ver. 6. Μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἀνήρ, The husband of one wife.] Here Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, have well observed, against the heretics and papists, that marriage is so honourable, that any clergyman may ascend to the episcopal throne with it, ὥστε μετ' αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν ἅγιον θρόνον δύνασθαι ἀναβαίνειν, Chrysost. Theoph.: yea, that he may do the office of bishop, and retain the nuptial bed, ὡς δυναμένου καὶ μετὰ γάμου ἐπισκοπῆς προϊστῆναι τινος. Œcumenius.

To show the antiquity of that interpretation of those words, "the husband of one wife," which I incline to, Jerome saith, that, quidam de hôc loco ita sentiunt; Judaicæ, inquiunt, divorce from his former wife; see note on 1 Tim. iii. 2), having faithful children not accused of riot or unruly.

7 [7] For a bishop must be blameless, as (being) the steward of God; not selfwilled, not soon angry, not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre;

8 [8] But a lover of hospitality, a lover of good men (or things), sober (or prudent), just, holy, temperate;

9 Holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught (κατὰ τὴν διδαχήν, according to the doctrine of Christ and his apostles), that he may be able by sound doctrine [9] both to exhort (both to admonish, or instruct in sound doctrine,) and to convince the gainsayers.

10 For there are many unruly [10] and vain talkers (in Crete) and deceivers (of men's minds), [11] specially they of the circumcision:

11 Whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not (to teach), for filthy lucre's sake.

12 One of themselves, even (Epimenides) [12] a prophet of their own, said, The Cretians are alway liars, evil beasts, [13] slow bellies (i. e. gluttons).

13 This witness is true (of them who inhabit Crete, whether natives or Jews). Wherefore [14] rebuke them sharply (ἔλεγχε αὐτοὺς ἀποτόμως, convince them powerfully), that they be sound in the faith;

14 Not giving heed [15] to Jewish fables, and commandments of men, that turn from the truth.

consuetudinis fuit vel binas uxores habere, vel plures, quod etiam in veteri lege de Abraham, et Jacob, legimus; et hoc nunc volunt esse præceptum, ne is qui episcopus est eligendus, uno tempore duas pariter habeat uxores. He also seems to show his dislike of the other opinion, in these words, Multi superstitiosiùs magis quam veriùs, etiam eos, qui cùm gentiles fuerint, et unam uxorem habuerint,—quâ amissâ, post baptismum Christi alteram duxerint, putant in sacerdotio non eligendos.

[7] Ver. 7. Ἀνέγκλητον εἶναι, (I left thee in Crete to ordain elders; if any be blameless;) for a bishop must be blameless.] Hence, say the Greek and Latin commentators, it is manifest that the same person is called a presbyter in the fifth, and a bishop in the seventh verse, καὶ ἐντεῦθεν δῆλον ὡς τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους ἐπισκόπους ὠνόμαζον, εἰρηκὼς γὰρ ἵνα καταστήσῃς κατὰ πόλιν πρεσβυτέρους, ἐπήγαγε, δεῖ γὰρ ἐπίσκοπον ἀνέγκλητον εἶναι· ἐν ἑκάστῃ δὲ πόλει οὐκ ἐπισκόπους, ἀλλὰ πρεσβυτέρους ἔδει εἶναι πόλλους, Theodoret. "When he had said, I left thee in Crete, that thou mighest ordain presbyters in every city,* postea intulit; Oportet enim episcopum sine crimine esse, tanquam Dei dispensatorem; idem est ergò presbyter qui episcopus: he after makes this inference, For a bishop must be blameless: the bishop therefore and presbyter are here the same." The reverend and learned Bishop Pearson proves, from Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen, that in their judgment, the apostle speaks of presbyters properly so called; as doth also Theodoret, from this argument, That the apostle requires presbyters in the plural to be ordained in every city, whereas there was to be only one single bishop in a city. But I find no answer to the argument, that the same person is a presbyter in the fifth, who is a bishop in the seventh verse; and therefore I still incline to the opinion of Chrysostom, Theodoret, Jerome, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, that the names were then common.

A bishop must be blameless.] Jerome, understanding this of presbyters, speaks to the bishops thus; Audiant episcopi, qui habent constituendi presbyteros per urbes singulas potestatem, sub quali lege ecclesiasticæ constitutionis ordo teneatur: and then proceeds thus; At nunc cernimus plurimos hanc rem beneficium facere, ut non quærant eos qui possunt ecclesiæ plus prodesse et in ecclesiâ erigere columnas: sed quos vel ipsi amant, vel quorum obsequiis sunt deliniti, vel pro quibus majorum quisquam rogaverit, et ut deteriora taceam, qui ut clerici fierent, muneribus impetrârunt.

[8] Ver. 8. Φιλόξενον, A lover of hospitality.] Not in the modern sense of keeping hospitality, that is, a great table for persons of quality to come to; but, say Chrysostom and Theophylact, τὰ αὐτοῦ τοῖς ξένοις προϊέμενος καὶ τοῖς δεομένοις, "one so far from filthy lucre, that he spends what he has upon the stranger and the poor." Σώφρονα οὐ τὸν νηστευτὴν εἶπεν ἐνταῦθα, ἀλλὰ τὸν πάσους κρατοῦντα, "He saith sober, i. e. not one that is much in fasting, but an exact governor of his passions, his tongue, hands, and eyes."

[9] Ver. 9. Παρακαλεῖν.] i. e. Νουθετεῖν, Theoph. See Rom. xii. 8. Τὸ δὲ μάλιστα χαρακτηρίζον τὸν ἐπίσκοπον, τὸ διδάσκειν ἐστὶν, "The chief character of a bishop is τὸ διδασκαλικόν, his ability to teach," say Chrysostom and Theophylact."

[10] Ver. 10. Ματαιολόγοι, Vain talkers.] That the Jews were ματαιολόγοι, "vain talkers," and ἑτεροδιδασκαλοῦντες, "teachers of things which they ought not," we learn, 1 Tim. i. 3, 4. 6, and that they were desirous of filthy lucre, robbing and devouring those they taught, see 2 Cor. xi. 20. Of the covetousness of the pharisees, the great sticklers for the necessity of circumcision, and of the observation of the law of Moses, by all Christians (Acts xv. 5), our Saviour gives us a large account, Matt. xxiii. 14. 25, Luke xvi. 14. Their mouths must be stopped, not with force, but with conviction (ver. 2), by such strength of conviction, say the fathers, as will not suffer them to speak any thing by way of answer, or gainsaying the truth.

[11] Μάλιστα δὲ οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, Especially they of the circumcision.] He doth not say, Especially those gentiles or Samaritans, who are advocates for the observation of the Jewish law, but οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, "they of the circumcision," which, throughout the New Testament, signifies the Jews, men of that nation and religion: so Acts x. 45, "And οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, the Jews which came with Peter were amazed, when they saw the gift of the Holy Ghost poured out upon the gentiles;" Acts xi. 2, οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, "The Jews contended with Peter, saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them" (see Rom. iv. 12, xv. 8, Gal. ii. 7—9, Eph. ii. 11, Col. iv. 11). Moreover, the Gnostics and Simonians were so far from being advocates for the observation of the Jewish law, that it was one part of their doctrine,* νόμῳ καὶ προφήταις μὴ χρᾶσθαι, that "no man should observe the law or the prophets" (see note on 1 Tim. i. 7): they therefore cannot be the men here intended.

[12] Ver. 12. Προφήτης, A prophet of their own.] Theodoret expressly says, this poet was Callimachus; Œcumenius and Theophylact cite the words of Callimachus, and so doth Chrysostom, though he confesses the poet was Epimenides. Callimachus it could not be, for he was no Cretian, but a Cyrenian, nor hath he this whole verse, but only the beginning of it, Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, which, saith Jerome, he borrowed from Epimenides; who by Plato† is styled ἀνὴρ θεῖος· by Diodorus Siculus,‡ ὁ θεόλογος, "the divine;" by Diogenes Laertius,§ θεοφιλέστατος, and γνωστικώτατος, "one skilled in divination;" by Cicero,‖ futura præsentiens, et vaticinans per furorem, "one that foretold things future by ecstasy;" by Plutarch,¶ σοφὸς περὶ τὰ θεῖα, "a wise man concerning divine things;" by Apuleius, fatidicus, "a soothsayer;" by Maximus Tyrius,†† δεινὸς τὰ θεῖα, "one skilled in divine things;" by Dion Prusiensis, and the apostle here, "one of their prophets."

[14] Ver. 13. Ἔλεγχε αὐτοὺς ἀποτόμως, Rebuke them sharply.] If these words relate to the Cretians deceived by the Jews, as the verse following seems to hint, they are fitly translated, "Rebuke them sharply." To be "sound in faith," is, say Œcumenius and Theophylact, to retain it so as it was delivered by the apostles, without adding any thing to it from Judaism or gentilism, and especially without adding to it the necessity of observing the Jewish law or rites by the gentiles.

15 (For, whatsoever they may say or think, concerning unclean meats, persons, or things) Unto [16] the pure (the gentile, whose heart is purified by faith,) all things are pure (in their use): but unto them that (though they count themselves the only pure persons) are defiled and unbelieving is nothing (truly) pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled (and by that their actions).

16 [17] They profess that they know God (above others, Rom. ii. 17); but in works they (practically) deny him, being abominable (now, to him, of whom they were once beloved), and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.

here understand the Gnostics' cabbalistical interpretations of the Old Testament: but (1.) if we look into Irenæus, we shall find their senseless interpretations chiefly related to the New Testament. Their thirty æons they gathered from the thirty years our Saviour spent in silence, before he preached, and from the parable of those who wrought in the vineyard, and from Paul; from whom he shows, lib. i. cap. 1, p. 16, 18, they gathered most of their wild fancies, and so they must, in time, be after the writing of his epistles. (2.) It does not appear that the cabbalistical Jews had any such interpretations as favoured the mad doctrines of the Gnostics. The fathers therefore generally interpret these words of the vain traditions of the Jews, especially concerning meats, and other things, to be abstained from, as unclean, which our Lord also styles "the doctrines of men," Matt. xv. 9; and of the teachers of them, Paul, in his Epistle to Timothy, saith, that "they were turned from the faith," 1 Tim. i. 5, 6. And this, saith Œcumenius, is evident from the ensuing words.

[16] Ver. 15. To the clean all things are clean.] Here, saith Jerome, considerandum ne ista tractantes, occasionem illi hæresi demus, quæ juxta Apocalypsin, et ipsum quoque apostolum Paulum scribentem ad Corinthios, putant, de idolothytis esse vescendum, quia omnia munda sunt mundis.

[17] Ver. 16.] It is the opinion of all the ancient commentators upon the place, that the apostle speaks this adversùs Judæos, "against the Jews," nor is there any thing said in these two verses which may not be applied to them. For,

First, We have observed already how the scripture gives those very names to the unbelieving Jews, which they were wont to give unto the gentiles, styling them "dogs," Phil. iii. 2, as they styled the gentiles; and "vessels of wrath," Rom. ix. 22, 1 Thess. ii. 16, who thought themselves the only vessels of mercy;" and here (ver. 15) "defiled," who counted themselves the only "pure servants of God," Neh. ii. 20.

Secondly, Of their profession "to know God, when in works they deny him," the apostle gives a large account, Rom. ii. from ver. 17 to ver. 25; and again, ch. iii. from ver. 10 to ver. 19. That they were "abominable" in the sight of God, our Lord not only saith of the pharisees, Luke xvi. 15; but Paul of the Jews in general, declaring that they "pleased not God;" yea, they were so displeasing to him, that "wrath was come upon them to the uttermost," 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. Of their disobedience to the law, we read in the forecited places of the Romans, and of their "evil works," Phil. iii. 2, 2 Cor. xi. 13. 15. And, lastly, that a defiled mind and conscience polluted all their actions, even those that were done according to the will and the command of God, see Isa. i. 11. 16, lxvi. 3, Jer. vi. 20, Amos v. 21, 22.

4 [3] That they may teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands, to love their children,

5 To be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands, [4] that the word of God be not blasphemed (by reason of their crimes).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 2. Πρεσβύτας, The aged.] See the note on Philem. 9. So the word signifies in all the other places of the New Testament where it is found; so ἐγὼ γάρ εἰμι πρεσβύτης, "I am aged," saith Zacharias, Luke i. 18, and Παῦλος πρεσβύτης is "Paul the aged," Philem. 9. And in this sense the true St. Jerome, and all the Greek commentators on the place, expound it. The reverend Dr. Hammond thinks it here signifies "church officers," and in particular the deacons, mentioned in Timothy, after the bishops, 1 Tim. iii. But of five qualifications there required of the deacons (ver. 8), the apostle here mentions only one, that of gravity; nor is it necessary that these πρεσβύται should be church officers, because the apostle here enumerates their qualifications: for, as Jerome on the place observes, he reckons up the qualifications of the younger women, ver. 4, 5, and of the younger men, ver. 6, and of the servants, ver. 9, 10. But hence it will not follow that they were church officers: nor, secondly, because Titus was sent to ordain such; for we find not that he was sent to ordain any but presbyters or bishops, ii. 5. 7; though doubtless he did ordain deacons to attend them.

[2] Ver. 3. Πρεσβυτίδας.] That "the aged women" here imports the deaconesses of the church, some of the commentators say was the opinion of some ancients; and indeed they were so necessary, (1.) for the baptism of women, when that was performed by dipping, as in the apostle's days it was; and (2.) for the converting some young women to, and the instructing others in, the faith they had already owned (which aged women, though not permitted to "speak in the church," might do in private houses, without scandal; but the apostles, and a young Timothy, could scarcely do without suspicion); that for these reasons I doubt not but this office obtained in the first preaching of the gospel.

[3] Ver. 4. Ἵνα σωφρονίζωσι τὰς νέας, That they may teach or admonish the young women.] Stephanus renders the words thus, "That they may teach them by chastisement;" but women, who had husbands and children, as these in the next verse are supposed to have, were not to be chastised by others. Observe then, that young men and women become wise by hearkening to the admonitions and instructions of persons aged and experienced in the practice of it, and they who were set over the youth and the young women for this end were called by the Greeks σωφρονιστῆρες, that is, "directors of their manners," because they admonished them how to behave themselves in their stations: hence σωφρονιστὴς is by Hesychius rendered νουθετὴς, "an admonisher," and in Julius Pollux, σωφρονίζειν is νουθετεῖν, "to admonish," and σωφρονισμὸς is the same with νουθεσία, "admonition," lib. iii. cap. 17, p. 153, lib, xli. &c.

[4] Ver. 5. That the word of God be not blasphemed.] For, say Theodoret and Theophylact, when wives leave their husbands, or servants their masters, προφάσει τῆς εὐσεβείας, works: in doctrine shewing uncorruptness, gravity, [5] sincerity,

8 [6] Sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part (whether Jew or gentile) may be ashamed (of his opposition to you), having no evil thing to say of you.

9 Exhort servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all (lawful) things; [7] not answering again;

10 Not purloining (or filching from their masters), but shewing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things (belonging to their station).

11 For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men (as well servants as masters, yea, to men of all nations),

12 [8] Teaching us that, denying (all) ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world;

13 Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious

"from a pretence of religion, they cause men to speak evil of the gospel."

[5] Ver. 7. Ἀφθαρσίαν, Sincerity.] This word is not to be found in Chrysostom, Theophylact, nor in many copies; but it is in Theodoret, Œcumenius, Cod. Alex. Arab.

[6] Ver. 8.] The doctrine to be preached must be pure, and free from all corrupt mixtures; it must be entire, so as to want nothing necessary to be known; it must be such as is ὑγιὴς, wholesome and beneficial to the hearer; it must be delivered with gravity and with care, that there be nothing spoken which may be subject to reprehension. And he that teacheth it must in his conversation practise suitable to what he teacheth, lest his own heart should inwardly condemn him, and he should be condemned both by God and man from his own mouth.

[7] Ver. 9. Μὴ ἀντιλέγοντες, Not answering again.] Not murmuring against their commanders, or contradicting them, but only with submission pleading their own cause; for that even nature doth allow.

[8] Ver. 12.] The first thing Christianity requires of them, who would enjoy this saving grace, is to deny all practical ungodliness, by carefully abstaining from all idolatry, superstition, and false worship, and to discard all those principles which tend to cherish in us a profane and irreligious conversation, viz. all principles of atheism and infidelity, all denial of providence, and of a future recompense; for as all our false worship will render our whole service vain, and our pretended piety a provocation, so these pernicious principles will render our religion none at all: for how can he be seriously employed in religious actions who questions the very object of religion, denies the motives to it, and reckons it "a vain thing to serve the Lord."

Secondly, To deny all worldly lusts; i. e. all inordinate affections to the enjoyments of this present world, as knowing that the friendship of this world is enmity to God; all "the pollutions which are in the world through lust" (2 Pet. ii. 20); "walking not in riot and drunkenness, in banquetings and revelling, in lasciviousness and uncleanness, in strife and envy; but putting on the Lord Jesus Christ, and making no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof" (Rom. xiii. 13, 14, 1 Pet. iv. 2, 3).

Thirdly, To live soberly, in the due moderation of all our appetites, the exact government of all our passions, and in the regular exercise of our affections and desires; i. e. we must so far restrain our angry passions, that they do never indecently boil up within us, or break forth into opprobrious words or rancorous expressions, or proceed to malicious and spiteful actions; and that we never do exert them, but upon occasion of something that is truly evil and displeasing to God, or when it may be for the benefit of others: we must so moderate our affections to, and our desires of, all worldly things, as to sit down contented with our present portion, not being anxiously solicitous about them, not pursuing them by unlawful means, not much cast down when we lose them, nor much delighted with them when we do enjoy them; but living still as men whose conversation is in heaven, and whose hearts are chiefly set on things above. We must so temper our desires of applause and reputation in this world, as only to pursue it by exact regards to what is virtuous and praiseworthy, and for virtuous ends, the doing good to others; never endeavouring to obtain or to preserve it by any sinister attempts, sinful compliances, or by neglect of duty. We must so regulate the cravings of the throat, and the gratifications of the palate, as not to eat or drink to the impairing of our health or reason, to the inflaming of our lusts or passions, or to the rendering ourselves unfit for the performance of that duty which we owe to God. We must be so moderate in reference to the pleasures of the world, that all the pleasures in which we do allow ourselves may be still ἡδοναὶ ἀμεταμέλητοι, "such as call for no repentance;" we must pursue them with such indifference, as that we can freely deny ourselves in the enjoyment of them, when the concernments of God's glory, or the welfare of our own or other men's souls is prejudiced by them; preferring still the pleasures of religion much above them.

Fourthly, We must live righteously, i. e. in all the offices of exact truth and justice betwixt man and man, being true in our words, exact to the performance of our promises, doing no injury to any in his good name, estate, or person, much less in the concernments of his soul, but dealing still with others as we would be dealt with.

We must live δικαίως, charitably; preserving an unfeigned good-will, an affectionate kindness to, and having a sincere concernment for, the good of all men; and this affection must restrain us not only from biting them with the tongue, suspecting evil of them, or doing evil to them; but must engage us to hope well, and believe well of them, where we know nothing to the contrary; to rejoice in their prosperity, to be ready to promote it, to sympathize with them in their afflictions; and, as far as we are able, to supply their wants, relieve their miseries, and contribute to the ease and comfort of their lives; and more especially to labour to prevent their ruin, and further the eternal interests of their precious souls; to conceal the evil that we know of others, where no necessity, i. e. no duty to ourselves, our brother, or the public, requires us to divulge it; to endure all things, without returning evil for evil; to be long-suffering, and bear with patience the infirmities of others: that, lastly, upon any reasonable submission, any fair acknowledgment of the offence, any desire of reconciliation, we be easy to be entreated, and ready to forgive: in a word, that in all cases of the same kind, we prefer the public before our private interest.

Fifthly, To teach us to live godlily; (1.) By keeping up a high esteem, an admiration of God in our minds, acknowledging his excellences, by our repairing to, and our continual dependence on, his wisdom, power, and goodness, in our addresses to the throne of grace; by ascribing all the mercies we enjoy to his sole, free, and undeserved goodness, and therefore highly esteeming them, paying the tribute of our praises, and suitable returns of duty for them, and by performing that public and external homage to the Author of them, which may best testify to others the inward veneration we have for him. (2.) By yielding a firm assent to all his revelations, depending on his all-sufficiency and goodness, to order all things for us to the best, and hoping in his mercy for preservation from, or support under, and a good issue from, the troubles of this present life, and a supply of all those blessings which he sees needful for us, or most conducing to our good. (3.) By valuing him as our chief and all-sufficient good, the only proper object of our happiness, and upon that account preferring him before whatever stands in competition with him; having none in heaven but him, and none on earth that we desire in comparison with him; doing all things to his glory, and for the promotion of his honour, and being zealous to remove whatsoever doth obstruct or oppose it. (4.) By being in the fear of the Lord all the day long, and herein exercising ourselves to have always consciences void of offence towards God, so that we never wilfully do any thing which argues a contempt of him, or is a provocation to the pure eyes of his glory. (5.) By acquainting ourselves with his sacred will, that we may do it; esteeming all his commandments con-appearing of [9] the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ;

14 Who gave himself for us, that he might [10] redeem us from all iniquity, and (so might) purify unto himself [11] a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

15 These things speak, and exhort, and rebuke (the opposers of this doctrine) with all authority. Let no man despise thee (but use the censures of the church, and deliver up to Satan those Jews who gainsay this doctrine).

cerning all things, to be right; yielding a cheerful, constant, and sincere obedience to them, labouring to walk before him in all well-pleasing; and when we are convinced that we have deviated from his good and holy laws, returning by a speedy and sincere repentance and reformation of our evil ways. (6.) By an humble submission to his chastisements, and a contented acquiescence in all the dispensations of his providence, and an entire resignation of ourselves and our concernments to the pleasure of his good and holy will.

Thus Philo doth inform us, That he that would be truly virtuous, must, in the first place, μεταναστεύειν τοῦ σώματος, "become an exile from the enjoyments of the body, so far as not to be enslaved, ἐπιθυμίαις καὶ ἡδοναῖς, to the importunate desires of worldly things, or to the pleasures of the world, οὔτε φόβοις οὔτε λύπαις, nor to the fears of losing them; nor to excess of grief, that he doth not enjoy them, that, being thus prepared, he must govern his whole life by these three rules or canons, τῷ φιλοθέῳ, καὶ φιλαρέτῳ, καὶ φιλανθρώπῳ, the love of God, the love of virtue, and the love of man" (Lib. Quòd omnis probus liber, p. 676, C).

[9] Ver. 13. Τοῦ μεγάλου Θεοῦ, The great God.] Here it deserveth to be noted, that it is highly probable, that Jesus Christ is here styled "the great God;" first, because in the original the article is prefixed only before the great God, and therefore seems to require this construction, "the appearance of Jesus Christ the great God, and our Saviour." Secondly, because, as God the Father is not said properly to appear, so the word ἐπιφάνεια never occurs in the New Testament, but when it is applied to Jesus Christ, and to some coming of his; the places in which it is to be found being only these, 2 Thess. ii. 8, 1 Tim. vi. 14, 2 Tim. i. 10, iv. 1. 8. Thirdly, because Christ is emphatically styled "our hope," "the hope of glory," Col. i. 23, 1 Tim. i. 1. And lastly, because not only all the ancient commentators on the place do so interpret this text, but the Ante-Nicene fathers also; Hippolytus,* speaking of the "appearance of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ;" and Clemens of Alexandria* proving Christ to be both God and man, our creator, and the author of all our good things, from these very words of Paul (Vid. Tract. de Verâ Christi Deitate, p. 44, 45).

[10] Ver. 14. Ἵνα λυτρώσηται, &c. That he might redeem and purify.] The words λυτρῶσαι and καθαρίσαι, here used, being sacrificial; the first signifying redemption, by paying a price, here said to be, the "giving himself;" the second, to purify from the guilt of sin, by an atonement offered for it (Heb. ix. 22, 1 John i. 7. 9); I conceive the import of them to be this, That Christ our Saviour gave himself a ransom for us to redeem us from the guilt and punishment of our sins; that being, by this atonement, thus purified and reconciled to God, we might become, as the Jews were before, "a peculiar people" to him, and upon that account "zealous of good works."

[11] Λαὸν περιούσιον, A peculiar people.] So סגלה is rendered by the Septuagint, Exod. xix. 5, "You shall be to me, λαὸς περιούσιος, a peculiar people above all people;" Deut. vii. 6, "Jehovah thy God hath chosen thee to be unto him, λαὸν περιούσιον, a peculiar people above all the people of the earth:" so, xiv. 2, xxvi. 18. This, by the Chaldee, is always rendered, "a beloved people." This title belonged to all Israel in general, Ps. cxxxv. 4, "Jehovah hath chosen Jacob for himself, and Israel for his peculiar people." As therefore all Israel, being sanctified to the Lord, became to him a peculiar treasure, and a beloved people, above all other nations or religions in the world; so are now all Christians, God having "purified their hearts by faith" (Acts. xv. 9). Secondly, As then salvation was of the Jews (John iv. 22), and belonged to others, only by being proselytes so far as to own their God, or their religion; so now that salvation which is promised in the gospel, and which consists in life eternal, is promised only to them who own the God and Saviour of the Christians, or embrace their religion: for "this is the testimony that God hath given us eternal life; and that life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son hath not life" (1 John v. 11, 12).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἀρχαῖς καὶ ἐξουσίαις ὑποτάσσεσθαι, To be subject to principalities.] Besides the turbulent spirit of the Jews then in Crete, Suidas* hath left upon record concerning them, that the Cretians, fearing they should suffer punishment from their superiors, stirred up the people, "exhorting them to maintain the liberty which they always had enjoyed." By which we see how needful this instruction was.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἐπιείκεια, Meekness.] This is that virtue which inclines us to be easy and merciful to offenders, kind in interpreting the actions of others, and yielding, in matters of our own concern, for peace' sake: and we "show all meekness," not by being never severe (for severity, at some times, towards some persons, is necessary), but by being mild in all cases, in which the circumstances of time, place, and persons, will admit of it.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἦμεν γάρ ποτε, For we ourselves were sometimes.] That these were the vices that reigned in the heathen world, see Rom. i. 26. 31, xiii. 13, Col. iii. 5. 8. That the Cretians were prone to disobedience, we have proved from Suidas: that they were foolish, and deceived, is evident from their multitude of false gods, mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, lib. v., and their vain imagination, in thinking that their gods were mortal, with which Callimachus charges them. The lusts and pleasures they served were unnatural lusts, say Œcumenius and Theophylact: of which the Athenian, in Plato, speaketh thus to Clinias of Crete;* "Of unnatural lusts your cities are chiefly guilty; for, taking up your laws from Jupiter, and retaining the fable of his Ganymede, they committed this unnatural lust in imitation of their Jupiter."

doth, that Paul here condemns himself as one formerly guilty of all these vices; for then he could not have said, that "he had lived," before his conversion, "in all good conscience towards God" (Acts xxiii. 1); that he had "served God, from his progenitors, with a pure conscience" (2 Tim. i. 3), and that, "as to the righteousness which was by the law, he was blameless" (Phil. iii. 6). Nor is any thing more common with Paul, than to speak thus, in the person of those to whom he writes (see the note on Eph. ii. 3).

[5] Ver. 4—7.] For the explication of these four verses, let it be observed;

First, That the apostle, in the very next verse, saith, "This is a faithful saying; and of this I will that thou affirm constantly, that they who have believed in God should be careful to maintain good works:" and, as he saith, that "we are justified by grace;" so doth he teach us, that this grace hath appeared for this very end, to "teach us, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present world, looking for this blessed hope;" clearly insinuating, that without living godly, righteously, and soberly, we cannot reasonably hope for happiness at our Lord's second coming. Wherefore these words could never be intended to excuse Christians from a necessity of being holy, in order to their being happy.

Secondly, That the apostle only saith, "We are not saved by works of righteousness which we have done," before faith, before the laver of regeneration; but doth not in the least exclude the works of righteousness they should hereafter do by virtue of the new nature given to them, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, from being conditions of their future happiness; and therefore hence it doth not follow, as Esthius suggests, that God hath predestinated us to salvation of his mere mercy, without any respect to our works; but only, that he hath thus freely called any nation to the knowledge of that faith, that will, in the end, bring salvation to them that obey the prescripts of it.

Thirdly, That when the apostle saith, "By his mercy he saved us;" his meaning is, that by his free mercy he brought us from a state of wrath and condemnation, into the way of salvation; in which if we walk, and continue, we shall assuredly obtain salvation (see note on Eph. ii. 8, 9).

Fourthly, Some, by "the laver of regeneration," understand that inward renovation which cleanseth the soul, as washing doth the body; but that the apostle, by "the laver of regeneration," understands that baptism by which Christians, coming then from heathenism, engaged to renounce idolatry, the works of the flesh and of the world, and dedicated themselves to the service of the sacred Trinity, and testified their faith in Christ, cannot reasonably be doubted, if we consider,

First, How expressly our Saviour saith, we must be born again of water and of the Holy Ghost, that we may "enter into the kingdom of God" (John iii. 5): how he commissionated his apostles to "make disciples in all nations, by baptizing them" (Matt. xxviii. 16); and how, from the beginning, the word παλιγγενεσία, "regeneration," used here, was used to denote baptism, as Justin Martyr,* Irenæus,† and Clement of Alexandria,‡ do inform us.

Secondly, That the same apostle elsewhere ascribes this virtue to baptism, saying that Christ doth "purify and cleanse his body, by the washing of water" (Eph. v. 26); and that Peter saith, that "baptism now saves us" (1 Pet. iii. 21); and that baptism, at the first, was still attended with the vouchsafement of the Holy Ghost, here joined unto this "laver of regeneration" (John iii. 5): so that all Christians are said to be baptized into one Spirit (1 Cor. xii. 13), which is here said to be plentifully poured out upon believers.

Thirdly, That being justified by faith, we become "the sons of God" (John i. 12), and being sons of God, are "heirs of glory" (Rom. viii. 17), and "sons of the resurrection;" or such as, if we do continue in the faith, and our baptismal covenant, shall enjoy a happy resurrection (Luke xx. 36, see note upon that place, and upon Rom. viii. 17).

[6] Ver. 8. Καλῶν ἔργων προΐστασθαι, To maintain good works.] That is, say some, to employ themselves in honest trades and professions: but all the ancient commentators, on this and the fourteenth verse, interpret these words of alms-deeds or charity, to supply the necessary wants of orphans, widows, &c. And they are followed by the learned Dr. Barrow, who observes, "That as in every kind, that which is most excellent doth commonly assume the name of the whole kind; so are these works of charity, by way of excellency, styled 'good works;'" thus Dorcas was "full of good works; i. e. of alms-deeds which she did," Acts ix. 36; "See you abound in every good work;" i. e. in all charitable offices, 2 Cor. ix. 8; "Let a widow be well reported of for good works," 1 Tim. v. 10, i. e. for "bringing up children, lodging strangers, washing the saints' feet, relieving the afflicted, and following every good work;" "Charge them who are rich in this world, that they be rich in good works," 1 Tim. vi. 18 (see Heb. x. 24). And this sense may be confirmed, first, from the phrase itself; for it is not ἐργάζεσθαι τὰ καλὰ ἔργα, but προΐστασθαι καλῶν ἔργων. Now προΐστασθαι signifies to excel and outstrip others in good works; which, as to works of charity, is certainly the Christian's duty, and was the thing by which the primitive ages gained great credit to Christianity: but it is not the Christian's duty to labour more than others at their trades or callings. Secondly, from the reason here assigned, why they must excel in good works; because they were not only profitable, but καλὰ, "creditable," in the sight of men, as are such works of charity more conspicuously than labouring in our professions; and ver. 15, "that they be not unfruitful;" i. e. saith Dr. Hammond, that they may have to give to others: these acts of charity being styled, "fruit abounding to their account," Phil. iv. 17, "good fruits," James iii. 17, "the fruits of righteousness," ver. 18.

[7] Ver. 9.] See note on 1 Tim. i. 4; and note here, and from that place, this excellent rule; That disputes about matters which only serve to beget strife and contention, but tend little to edification in the faith, or to the edifying of the body in love (Eph. iv. 16), or the promoting that doctrine which is after godliness (1 Tim. vi. 3), are vain talking and unprofitable disputes.

[8] Ver. 10.] Hence we may learn who is a heretic, in the apostle's sense.

(1.) He is one who ἐξέστραπται, "is perverted from the true faith;" holding some doctrine or opinion which subverteth the foundation of it (2 Tim. ii. 18, 1 Tim. i. 19, 20). (2.) He is αὐτοκατάκριτος, a man "condemned by his own conscience," and who, in what he doth maintain or practise, sins against his own convictions: for, (1.) the apostle saith not to Titus, Do thou convince or inform him of his error, but, Do thou admonish him of his fault; which shows the crime lay not in his head, or his mistaken judgment, for that can never be corrected by admonition, but only by instruction; but that it lay in the irregularity of his affections, and the perverseness of his will: and, (2.) because otherwise he could not "condemn himself" by maintaining his heresy; for no man who acts according to his judgment, how erroneous soever it may be, is self-condemned in that action.

Obj. 1. Against this exposition it is objected, First, That he who oppugns a doctrine, which he knows to be true, is indeed perverse, but he is no heretic.

Ans. 1. Yes, he is properly a heretic, according to St. Austin, because he follows or starts a new opinion, not from regard to truth, but to vain-glory, or temporal advantage: whence, saith he, Errare possum, hæreticus esse nolo; "I may err, but I will not be a heretic;" placing heresy not in the judgment, but in the will.

2. He is so also, according to the proper import of the word, because he properly doth choose to be of his opinion: whereas the judgment of the erroneous person doth oblige him to hold his error, it being not in our power to believe otherwise than our mind and judgment doth inform us; so that, in this case, we do not properly αἱρετίζειν, choose what opinion we will hold. And, 3. he is most properly a heretic in the scripture sense; which still ascribeth to such men something relating, not to the error of their judgments, but to the perverseness of their wills, or the corruption of their affections; as, that they designed not to "serve the Lord, but their own bellies" (Rom. xvi. 18); that they "turned away from the truth, supposing that gain was godliness" (1 Tim. vi. 5); that they "taught things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake" (Tit. i. 11); that "through covetousness, with feigned words, they made merchandise of them whom they deceived" (2 Pet. ii. 3. 14); "having hearts exercised with covetous practices;" and that they "went greedily after the error of Balaam for reward" (Jude 11, Matt. xxiv. 11, 1 John iv. 1, 2 Cor. xi. 13, 2 Pet. ii. 1, 1 Tim. iv. 2).

Hence they are often styled "false prophets, false Christs, false apostles, false teachers, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ;" men who insinuated their doctrines, ἐν ὑποκρίσει ψευδολόγων, "by hypocritical falsehoods," who preached up the necessity of circumcision, "not that they themselves observed the law," or thought it necessary so to do, "but that they might avoid persecution" (Gal. vi. 12, 13); that they were men risen up among Christians, "speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them" (Acts xx. 30); "wolves in sheep's clothing" (Matt. vii. 15), men that "went out from them, when indeed they were not of them" (1 John ii. 19).

Obj. 2. Secondly, It is objected, That there be few who oppose the truth wittingly, and they are only known to God, not to the church; which therefore cannot admonish, avoid, or excommunicate them. He therefore must be self-condemned, not because he maintains what himself thinks to be false, but because he inflicts upon himself that punishment and condemnation which the bishop and church useth to do upon malefactors, by separating himself from the communion of the faithful.

Ans. To this I answer, (1.) That I do not find that the word αὐτοκατάκριτος bears any other sense but this; viz. "one condemned by his own mind, or inward sentence;" ὑφ' ἑαυτοῦ, καὶ τῆς οἰκείας συνειδήσεως κατακρινόμενον, saith Œcumenius. (2.) Nor is it true that heretics did always cut themselves off from the church; for then what need was there of their excommunication? The scripture shows the contrary, declaring, that these false teachers, that brought in damnable doctrines, were ἐν ὑμῖν, lurking among Christians (2 Pet. ii. 1, 1 John ii. 19, 2 Pet. ii. 13, Jude 12. 19); yea, saith the apostle, "there must be heresies, ἐν ὑμῖν, among you," 1 Cor. xi. 9; they kept their love-feasts with them, till for fear of persecution they departed from them (Gal. vi. 12). They were inwardly "wolves," but "in sheep's clothing," εὐπροσωπήσαντες ἐν αὐτοῖς, "making a fair show among them." Moreover, what need was there of avoiding men already separated, and gone out from them? or to what end should the apostle give them any admonitions, or excommunicate them, who had already excluded themselves from the church's communion? This exposition therefore agrees not with the words of the apostle.

And whereas it is said, such heretics are only known to God; I hope they might be known also to Titus, the only person here bid either to admonish or avoid them, especially if we consider, that to him belonged, in those times, διάκρισις πνευμάτων, "the discerning of spirits." Moreover, the church of those times, in which the apostles were still preaching, could easily know whether the doctrines which others taught in opposition to them, were indeed doctrines received from the apostles, or not; if they were not, they who taught them must know they received no such doctrine from them, and so must be self-condemned in teaching it, as received from them, or as the faith once delivered to the saints; and they who heard them must know they wilfully opposed the doctrine of those apostles, who had confirmed the faith with such authentic testimonies as their opposers could not question. Moreover, they being then bid to "try the spirits, whether they were of God" (1 John iv. 1), and the gift of discerning spirits being then given to the prophets, who managed the church affairs, they might then very well be able to judge of these deceivers and false teachers.

[9] Ver. 12.] These words made the author of the postscript date this epistle from Nicopolis of Macedonia, whereas they rather prove the contrary; for he saith not, I have determined to winter here, but there, which shows he was not yet come thither.

EPISTLE TO PHILEMON,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

Some have thought this epistle was not worthy to be ranked among the epistles of Paul, as being writ upon an occasion of no great moment: but it contains instructions sufficient for so short an epistle; as, v. g.

First, That no Christian, though of the meanest sort, is to be contemned: that Christianity makes the vilest servant both profitable and worthy to be highly loved and honoured by persons in the highest dignity; Onesimus being by the apostle styled his "son," and his "bowels."

Secondly, That Christianity doth not impair the power of masters over their servants, or give any authority to them who convert them to use them as their servants, without leave granted from their masters.

Thirdly, That servants ought to make satisfaction for any wrong or injury they have done to their masters.

Fourthly, That there is an affection due from the master to a profitable servant.

"Who then," say the Greek interpreters,* "would refuse to number an epistle so profitable, with the rest?"

The Apostolical Constitutions† have made this Philemon bishop of Colosse, and Jerome seems to incline to that opinion; but Hilary‡ the deacon saith expressly, that "he was of no ecclesiastical dignity, but one of the laity." Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, seem also of the same opinion.

This epistle was writ in the same year with that to the Philippians, viz. the eighth of Nero, A. D. 62, when Paul expected to be delivered from his bonds, ver. 22.

ANNOTATIONS.

[1] Ver. 1. Καὶ συνεργῷ ἡμῶν, Our fellow-labourer.] Hence Chrysostom conjectures, that he must be one of the clergy: but this is no good argument, seeing Christians in general, that promoted the interests of Christianity, and even women, are by the apostle styled συνεργοί, his "fellow-labourers." For the first, see 3 John, ver. 8, for the second, Rom. xvi. 3.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἀπφίᾳ τῇ ἀγαπητῇ.] He salutes also Apphia the wife of Philemon; as Œcumenius and Theophylact conjecture, and Theodoret positively asserts, and that very probably, she being here ranked before Archippus: and this he doth, that he might obtain her good will also in behalf of Onesimus.

[3] Συστρατιώτῃ, Our fellow-soldier.] So also he calls Epaphroditus fellow-prisoner with him at Rome, Phil. ii. 23. 25, either because they suffered with him as good soldiers of Jesus Christ (2 Tim. ii. 23), or, as Jerome* saith, because, being ministers with him in the work of the gospel (Phil. ii. 25, Col. iv. 17), they were more particularly engaged in fighting the good fight of faith (see note on 1 Tim. i. 18).

[4] Καὶ τῇ κατ' οἶκόν σου ἐκκλησίᾳ, And to the church in thy house.] He calls his house a church, saith Theodoret, ὡς εὐσεβείᾳ λαμπρυνομένῃ, "as being illustrious for the piety of all its members" (see note on 1 Cor. xvi. 19).

[5] Ver. 3. Ἀπὸ Θεοῦ πατρὸς, καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, From God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ.] Ex quo ostenditur unam filii patrisque esse naturam, cum id potest filius præstare quod pater, et dicitur id pater præstare quod filius. Hieronymus in locum.

[6] Ver. 5. Τὴν ἀγάπην καὶ τὴν πίστιν, Thy love and faith.] Here the apostle useth the figure synthesis; for "faith is to be referred to Christ, and love to the saints;" according to those words of the same apostle, "We give thanks for you, since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which you have to all the saints," Col. i. 4. So Matt. xii. 22, "The blind and dumb both spake and saw;" i. e. the blind saw, and the dumb spake: 1 Cor. vi. 11, "But ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God;" i. e. ye are sanctified by the Spirit, and justified by the name of Jesus. And so Theodoret interprets these words. Hence therefore papists vainly gather, that we may place our faith in saints departed; for even their own Esthius declares,* that, "in the ecclesiastical phrase, to believe in any one, is a profession of divinity."

It is also farther to be noted from these words, That we ought to render thanks to God, not only for the blessings vouchsafed to ourselves, but to others also (Rom. i. 8, 1 Cor. i. 4, Eph. i. 16).

[7] Ver. 6. Ἡ κοινωνία, The communication.] Κοινωνίαν πίσ-having great power) in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient,

9 Yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee, (or, I rather beseech thee for love's sake), being such an one as Paul (the apostle of Christ) [8] the aged (and upon that account worthy of reverence), and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ (and therefore worthy of respect, Gal. vi. 17, Eph. iv. 1, Col. iv. 18).

10 I beseech thee (I say) for my son Onesimus, whom I have begotten (i. e. converted to the faith, when I was) in my bonds:

11 Which in time past was to thee (an) [9] unprofitable (servant, ver. 18, 19), but now (if received, will be) profitable to thee and (if sent back) to me:

12 Whom I have sent again (unto thee, he being in duty thine, and not to be employed by others, or detained without thy leave): thou therefore receive him, (him, I say,) that is, mine own bowels (he being as dear to me as if he had proceeded from mine own bowels):

13 Whom I would (willingly) have retained with me, that [10] in thy stead he might have ministered unto me (being) in the bonds of the gospel:

14 But without thy mind would I do nothing (of this nature); that thy benefit (or, the advantage I receive from him who is thy servant) should not be (on thy part) [11] as it were (a matter) of necessity (because thou couldest not have him returned to thee), but willingly (by thy own grant).

15 For perhaps he therefore departed (from thee) for a season, [12] that thou shouldest receive him for ever (i. e. to serve thee during life;

16 That thou shouldest receive him, I say,) Not now as a servant (only), but above a servant, (as being also in Christ) a brother [13] beloved, specially (or, particularly) to me, but how much more unto thee, both in the flesh, and in the Lord? (i. e. as being of thy family, and of thy faith.)

17 If thou count me therefore a partner (in thy friendship), receive him as myself.

18 If he hath wronged thee (in any thing), or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account;

19 I Paul have written it with mine own hand, (and so have entered into a solemn obligation, that) I will repay it: albeit I do not say to thee (i. e. I insist upon it) how thou owest unto me (by whom thou wast converted) even thine own self (or, the well-being of thy soul) besides.

20 [14] Yea, brother, (Gr. ναὶ, I pray thee therefore) let me (for thy compliance with me in this matter) have joy of thee in the Lord: [15] refresh my bowels in the Lord.

21 Having confidence in thy obedience I wrote (thus) unto thee, knowing thou wilt also do more than I say.

22 But withal prepare me also a lodging (wherefore prepare me a lodging also): for I trust that [16] through your prayers I shall be given unto you.

23 There salute thee Epaphras, my fellowprisoner in Christ Jesus;

24 Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellowlabourers.

25 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

¶ Written from Rome to Philemon, by Onesimus a servant.

τεως τὴν ἐλεημοσύνην καλεῖ, ὡς διὰ πολλῆς πίστεως γενομένην. Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, expound these words thus, "I pray that the faith in Christ, which thou hast common with us, may be operative in thee, to make thee know how to perform every good work."

[8] Ver. 9. Πρεσβύτης, The aged.] This epistle being writ, at the farthest, but twenty-eight years from his conversion, when he is styled νεανίας, "a young man" (Acts vii. 58), it is inquired, How he could be now πρεσβύτης, "Paul the aged?"

I answer, That both the words, νεανίσκος, "young," and πρεσβύτης, "aged," are of that large signification, as is sufficient to remove this seeming difficulty. Phavorinus,* from Hippocrates, saith, a man is styled νεανίσκος, "a young man," till twenty-eight, and πρεσβύτης, "aged," from forty-nine to fifty-six; making but twenty-one years' difference betwixt them: elsewhere he saith, that old age begins, ἀπ' ἐτῶν ἑξήκοντα ἑννέα, "from sixty-nine years;" but then he saith, a man is, νεανίσκος "young from twenty-three, ἕως ἐτῶν τεσσαράκοντα ἑνός, till forty-one years;" making the difference between them twenty-eight years. Varro, in Cœlius Rhodiginus, lib. xxix. cap. 21, says, a man is juvenis "young," till forty-five, and aged at sixty. And thus Paul, according to the computation of Chrysostom,† might be a young man of thirty-five years at his conversion, an old man at the writing this epistle, as being then sixty-three, and suffering martyrdom in the fourteenth year of Nero.

[9] Ver. 11. Ἄχρηστος.] Not only an unprofitable, but an injurious servant, having not only run away from his master, but purloined some of his goods, and spent what he had thus purloined: for had it not been thus, saith Jerome,‡ the apostle needed not to have stipulated for satisfaction of the injury (ver. 18, 19).

[10] Ver. 13. Ὑπὲρ σοῦ, In thy stead.] A ministry seems due from all that are able, towards those that suffer, and are in bonds for Christ's sake; and when it is not performed, there seems to be a lack of service due to them, especially to the ambassadors of Christ (Phil. ii. 30).

[11] Ver. 14. Ὡς κατ' ἀνάγκην, As of necessity.] Here again, freedom of will is put in opposition to necessity (see note on 2 Cor. ix. 7): according to those words of Seneca, De Benef. lib. ii. cap 4, Si vis scire an velim, effice ut possim nolle.

[12] Ver. 15. Ἵνα αἰώνιον αὐτὸν ἀπέχῃς, That thou mightest have him during life.] Δουλεύσει αὐτῷ εἰς αἰῶνα, "He shall serve him during life," Exod. xxi. 6; ἔσται σοι οἰκέτης εἰς αἰῶνα, "He shall be thy servant whilst he lives," Deut. xv. 17; καθήσεται εἰς αἰῶνα, "He shall abide for ever there," 1 Sam. i. 22; that is, ἕως ἡμέρας θανάτου αὐτοῦ, "till the day of his death," ver. 11, "all the days of his life," ver. 28.

[13] Ver. 16. Ἀγαπητὸν, Beloved.] Note here, that love is due even to bond-servants from their masters, when they are useful and profitable to them; for where advantage is received from the labours of another, there love is due.

[14] Ver. 20. Ναί.] As the Hebrew נָא is verbum obsecrandi, "a word of entreating;" so is the Greek ναὶ very frequently (see note on Matt. xv. 27).

[15] Μου τὰ σπλάγχνα, Refresh my bowels.] Either meaning Onesimus, whom he calls his "bowels," ver. 12, or rather himself, whose bowels would be refreshed by Philemon's receiving Onesimus kindly, for the Lord's sake.

[16] Ver. 22. Διὰ τῶν προσευχῶν ὑμῶν, By your prayers.] The apostle knew the efficacy of the prayers of the church, for preservation of Christ's eminent servants from impendent dangers; as in the case of Peter, Acts xii., and therefore, in most of his epistles, he doth most earnestly entreat them, that he might be enabled to preach the gospel with freedom and success (Eph. vi. 19, Col. iv. 3, 2 Thess. iii. 1), and for deliverance from the malice of his persecutors (Rom. xv. 30, 31, 2 Thess. iii. 2); or else express his confidence that their prayers will be effectual to that end, as here, and 2 Cor. i. 10, 11, iv. 14, 15, Phil. i. 19. And had he thus conceived of prayers directed to angels and departed saints, why doth he not afford one instance of them in all his epistles?

EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

By way of preface to this excellent epistle, I shall inquire,

1. Concerning the author of it.

2. Touching the canonical authority of this epistle.

3. Concerning the language in which it was originally written.

4. To whom it was indited and sent, and when.

5. Concerning the occasion and design of writing this epistle. And,

1. That Paul was the author of this epistle, I prove,

First, From these words of Peter, "As our dear brother Paul, according to the wisdom given to him, hath written unto you, as in all his epistles," 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16; whence it is evident, (1.) that the apostle Paul had writ to them to whom Peter was then writing; i. e. to the believing Jews in general, 2 Pet. i. 1, to those of the dispersion, mentioned 1 Pet. i. 1; (2.) that he writ to them some certain letter, distinct from all his other epistolary writings; as appears from those words, "as also in all his epistles," i. e. his other epistles. Since then none of the ancients say that this epistle was lost, it must be that which bears the name of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Obj. To this it is answered, That the epistle intended by Peter may be that written to the Romans, in which he speaketh to the Jews by name, ii. 17; and in which is an exhortation found, to "count the long-suffering of God salvation," or that which "leadeth to repentance," ver. 4.

Ans. But, (1.) that which is written there, is plainly written to the unbelieving Jews, and concerns them only: whereas Peter writes to the "brethren," iii. 12, the "beloved," ver. 1. 14. 17, to them "who had received like precious faith," i. 1; he therefore could not mean the Jews of whom Paul speaks in the Epistle to the Romans: nor, (2.) can that epistle be properly said to be writ to the dispersed Jews, it being writ to those at Rome only, i. 7, and chiefly to the gentiles there, i. 13, xi. 13, xv. 15, 16. (3.) The words, ii. 4, are not an exhortation to "count the long-suffering of God salvation;" but a reproof for despising this long-suffering; whereas, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. x., he commends their patience under sufferings, and assures them it would find salvation; and that if they lived by faith, the Lord would come and would not tarry.

Arg. 2. A second argument to prove Paul the author of this epistle, is taken from these words, "Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty; with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you: they of Italy salute you," xiii. 23, 24; and from those also, "Pray for us;" and, "Do this now the rather, that I may be restored to you the sooner," ver. 18, 19. For, first, it is customary with Paul, when he writes to others, to call Timothy his "brother:" so, "Paul the apostle of Jesus Christ, and Timothy our brother," 2 Cor. i. 1; and again, Col. i. 1, in the same words; "We sent Timothy our brother," 1 Thess. iii. 2; and, "Paul, a prisoner of Jesus Christ, and Timothy our brother," Philem. ver. 1. This Timothy was a prisoner at Rome in the seventh year of Nero; and set at liberty the eighth, saith Dr. Lightfoot, Harm. p. 139, 140, of which here the author of this epistle gives notice, and saith, he would come with him to them; i. e. to the Jews in Judea, to whom I shall prove, anon, that this epistle was indited. Now Timothy, we know, was still the companion of Paul. Lastly, he desires them to pray for him, which is frequently done by Paul in most of his epistles, viz. in that directed to the Romans, Rom. xv. 30; to the Ephesians, Eph. vi. 19; to the Philippians, Phil. i. 19; to the Colossians, Col. iv. 3; and to the Thessalonians, 2 Thess. iii. 1; and is never done in any of the catholic epistles. "Pray for me," saith he, "that I may be restored to you the sooner." Now Paul was sent bound from Judea to Rome, and therefore his return from Rome to Judea was properly a restoring of him to them. And that he was thus restored to them, we learn from Chrysostom,* declaring, that being at liberty, he went to Spain, thence to Judea, and so back to Rome.

Arg. 3. That this epistle was written or composed by Paul, may yet more strongly be concluded from the authority of the ancients; for that they did deliver this as the epistle of Paul, and that they were not rash in so doing, we learn from the words of Origen.† Now among these ancients we may reckon,

1. Clemens Romanus, the companion of and co-worker with Paul, who, as Eusebius‡ and Jerome§ note, "hath many notions which are in this epistle, and used many expressions, word for word, taken thence:" which show this epistle not to be new, and to be duly reckoned among the writings of this apostle.

2. Irenæus, in the second century, by whom this epistle is supposed to be cited as a book written by the Spirit, Adv. Hær. lib. iii. cap. 6. But not to insist on that, as being uncertain,

3. Clemens Alexandrinus‖ cites those words of Paul, "Without faith it is impossible to please God," Heb. xi. 6; adding that "faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," ibid. ver. 1, κατὰ τὸν Θεῖον ἀπόστολον, "according to the divine apostle." And again he saith,¶ ὁ Θεῖος ἀπόστολος, "The divine apostle fears not to say, Remember the former days, in which ye, being enlightened, suffered a great fight of affliction," Heb. x. 32; and so he cites him on to the end of that chapter; then gives the substance of the eleventh chapter, and the exhortation in the beginning of the twelfth, ver. 1, 2. And that this divine apostle was Paul, we are assured from these words, ἐπεὶ καὶ Παῦλος τοῖς Ἑβραίοις γράφων τοῖς ἀνακάμπτουσιν εἰς νόμον ἐκ πίστεως· "Paul also writing to the Hebrews, relapsing from faith unto the law, saith, Ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God, and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat," Heb. v. 12.

4. In the third century, Origen†† citing the very words now mentioned, and the following words, ver. 13, "For every one that useth milk is unskilful in the word of righteousness;" he saith, "He that writ this was the same Paul who said to the Corinthians, I have fed you with milk, and not with meat," &c. 1 Cor. iii. 2. In his Philocalia* he saith, "The apostle Paul, who said to the Corinthians, These things happened in a figure, and they were written for us, on whom the ends of the ages are come (1 Cor. x. 11), doth also, in another epistle, use these words, relating to the tabernacle, Thou shalt make all things according to the pattern shown thee in the mount" (Heb. viii. 5); and that the apostle who said,† "Jerusalem which is above is free, and is the mother of us all," Gal. iv. 26, said also in another epistle, "Ye are come to mount Sion, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to myriads of angels," &c. Heb. xii. 22, 23. In his Exhortation to Martyrdom,‡ he hath these words, φησί που ὁ Παῦλος, "Paul, speaking somewhere to them who suffered from the beginning, and exhorting them to suffer patiently the trials which afterward fell upon them for the word, saith, Call to remembrance the former days in which ye, being enlightened, suffered a great fight of afflictions—Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward; for ye have need of patience," Heb. x. 32—36. And in his answer to Africanus, having cited these words from this epistle, "They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were slain with the sword," Heb. xi. 37, he saith,§ "If any person being pressed with these words should fall into the opinion of them who reject this opinion as none of Paul's, he would use other words, to demonstrate to him that it was the epistle of Paul." He also adds,‖ that "the sentences contained in it are admirable, and no whit inferior to the writings of the apostles; as he who diligently reads them must confess."

In a word, when this epistle was denied by the Arians in the fourth century, because they were not able to resist the conviction it affords us of our Lord's divinity, Theodoret¶ saith, "They ought at least to revere the length of time in which the children of the church have read this epistle in the churches, viz. as long as they have read the apostolic writings: or, if this be not sufficient to persuade them, they should hearken to Eusebius, of whom they boast, as of the patron of their doctrine; for he confesses this was Paul's epistle, and he declares that all the ancients had this opinion of it."

That they of Rome, and other Latins, did, for a while, reject this epistle, will not much weaken this tradition, if we consider,

First, That this epistle was not writ to them, but to the Hebrews, who, as Eusebius†† testifies, "delighted much in it."

Secondly, That it was rejected by them, not that they had any thing to say against it, but because they could not answer the arguments which the Novatian schismatics among them produced from the sixth and tenth chapters of this epistle, against receiving lapsed penitents into the church, whence, as Philastrius informs us, they rejected it, as thinking it was depraved by heretics: or

Thirdly, Because it wants its name, which he concealed, not as Jerome conjectures, διὰ φθόνον, "to avoid the offence of those who liked not his person," by reason of his doctrine concerning the non-observation of their law; for it is evident, from his desire of their prayers, and from his intimation that he designed shortly to be with them, that he must be well known unto them; but, as Theodoret observes, "because he was made an apostle, not of the circumcision, but of the gentiles."

Lastly, The difference in style some mention, is so nice a thing, and may happen upon so many accounts, that it deserves not to be looked on as an argument of any force, against plain testimonies of the ancients, that Paul was the author of this work.

2. That this epistle was written and directed to the Jews dwelling in Judea and Palestine, is the opinion of the ancients,* though not so as to exclude the believing Jews of the dispersion. This may be argued from the endorsement of it, "To the Hebrews," rather than "To the Jews." It cannot be imagined but that he sends it to be delivered at a certain place, within some reasonable compass, seeing the bearer of it, whoever he was, could not deliver it to all the Jews dispersed through the whole world; and because he directs them to pray, that he "might be restored to them," and promiseth to come and see them. The title therefore, "To the Hebrews," must determine the place, and point out the Jews that dwelt in Judea, or the land of Israel; and this sense doth the Holy Ghost put upon the title, "the Hebrews," when it is said, "There was a murmuring of the Hellenists against the Hebrews," Acts vi. 1; by the Hellenists meaning the Jews that dwelt in foreign countries among the Greeks; and by the Hebrews, those that dwelt in Judea. So again, 2 Cor. xi. 22, "Are they Hebrews? so am I. Are they Israelites? so am I." And, Phil. iii. 5, "Of the stock of Israel, a Hebrew of the Hebrews;" i. e. a Hebrew not only by descent, as were all of the stock of Israel, but by language, which some of them had lost; and by habitation in the holy land, and not among the uncircumcised gentiles, he being bred up at the feet of Gamaliel. And so it is most proper to understand the inscription of this epistle, namely, that Paul directs and sends it to the believing Jews of Judea, which he styles his own nation, Acts xxiv. 17. For though he, doubtless, did intend it also for the benefit of the believing Jews dispersed, yet might he send it first and chiefly to those in Judea, the principal seat of the circumcision; from whence it might, in time, diffuse itself through the whole circumference of the circumcision.

3. But hence it cannot reasonably be concluded, that this epistle was writ in Hebrew, or in Syriac: for the Gospel of John, and his First Epistle, the catholic epistles of James, Peter, and Jude, were also written to the Jews, and yet were writ in Greek, that being a tongue so well known to the Jews, that they call it the vulgar tongue; therefore in all the discourses of the Jews with the Roman governors, who understood the Greek tongue, we never read, either in scripture or Josephus, that the Jews spake to them, or they unto the Jews, by an interpreter; nor is there any of the ancients, who pretends to have seen any Hebrew copy of this epistle. That it was writ in Greek appears not only from the passages of scripture so often cited in it from the Septuagint, even where they differ from the Hebrew, i. 6, iii. 8—10, viii. 8, 9, x. 5. 37, 38; but also from vii. 2, where we read thus, πρῶτον μὲν ἑρμηνευόμενος βασιλεὺς δικαιοσύνης, "First being interpreted King of Righteousness, and afterward King of Salem, which is, King of Peace;" for both the word Melchisedec and King of Salem, being in the first verse, should have been there interpreted, had this been the addition of the interpreter; for so we find it is throughout the New Testament, where the interpretation immediately follows the Hebrew word or phrase, as Mark v. 41, "Talitha, cumi; which is, by interpretation, Daughter, arise;" "Golgotha, which is, by interpretation, The place of a skull," Mark xv. 22. So Matt. xxvii. 46, Mark xv. 34, John i. 38, "Rabbi, which is, being interpreted, Master;" and, ver. 41, "Messiah, which is, being interpreted, The Christ." So ix. 7, xix. 37, Acts iv. 36, ix. 36, xiii. 8. Whereas here the word Melchisedec is in the beginning of the first verse, and the supposed addition of the interpreter is added where the word is not; so "King of Salem" is in the first verse not interpreted, and when it is repeated, then comes the interpretation; which plainly shows, that it is not made to give the sense, but the mystery contained in the words, viz. that Christ was "our peace," Eph. ii. 14, and "his sceptre was a sceptre of righteousness," i. 8.

4. As for the time when this epistle was indited, (1.) it seems evident, that it was written after that to the Colossians and to Philemon; for there he is Paul the prisoner, here he is set at liberty, and hoping to come quickly to them to whom he writes: those epistles therefore being writ in the sixty-second year of Christ, and the eighth of Nero, this must at least be written in the following year. Again, in the Epistle to the Colossians, we have mention of Timothy, but nothing of his bonds; here we have mention both of his imprisonment and his ensuing liberty, which may well cast this epistle into the ninth of Nero, where it is placed by Bishop Pearson.

5. To speak a little of the occasion of it: I have shown, in the preface to the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, and in the preface to the Epistle of James, that it was written chiefly to prevent that epidemical apostasy from Christ to Moses, which the believing Jews were then too prone to. But we learn also from the matter of the epistle, that it was written to prove that Jesus was the Son of God: now in what sense this chiefly was denied by the Jews, we learn from the Gospel of John, where, when our Lord had said, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," John v. 17, the Jews seek to kill him, because πατέρα ἴδιον ἔλεγε τὸν Θεόν, "he said God was his own Father, making himself equal to God," ver. 18. And again, "We stone thee," say they, "for blasphemy, because thou, being a man, makest thyself God," John x. 33. What was this blasphemy of which they thus accuse him? It was only this, that he said, "I am the Son of God," ver. 36. It is therefore plain, they judged it the same thing to say he was "the Son of God," and to say that "he was God;" whence we may rationally conclude, it was also in this sense that the apostle here asserts, and doth endeavour to confirm this truth.

And, Lastly, This epistle being written to persons now relapsing from Christ to Moses, and to the law given, said they, by angels; this seems to be the reason why the apostle is so large in showing that Christ was greater than the angels, a greater lawgiver than Moses, a greater priest than Aaron, and that the Levitical priesthood, covenant, and law, were to give place to Christ our great high-priest, to his new law of liberty, and that new covenant he had established upon better promises.

CHAPTER I.

1 God, who [1] at sundry times and [2] in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets,

2 Hath in these last days (the times of the Messiah, see note on 2 Tim. iii. 1) spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed (ἔθηκε, constituted) [3] heir of all things, [4] by whom also he made the worlds;

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Πολυμερῶς, At sundry times.] Before the flood by Enoch, Jude 14, and by Noah, 2 Pet. ii. 5; after the flood by Abraham the prophet, Gen. xx. 7, who gave to his "children and household after him" the commandments of the Lord, Gen. xviii. 19. By Jacob, "prophesying to his sons of things to come in the last days," Gen. xlix. 1. By Moses, during their abode in the wilderness. By Deborah, Samuel, and other prophets, in the time of the judges, Judg. vi. 8. By Nathan in the time of David and Solomon. By Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, in the time of the kings. By Daniel, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, in and after the captivity.

[2] Πολυτρόπως, In divers manners.] In a cloud, fire, a still breath; by visions, dreams, a voice from heaven, and by the Holy Spirit speaking in the prophets, 2 Pet. i. 21.

[3] Ver. 2. Κληρονόμον πάντων, Heir of all things;] As it were by succession to his Father, who now "judgeth no man, but hath given all judgment to his Son," John v. 22, Heb. iii. 6. We cannot desire a fairer comment on these words, than that of the Socinians on the place,* "That Christ is made heir of all things in heaven and earth, yea, of heaven and earth itself; that he is heir and Lord of all angels, and of all men living and dead, Rom. xiv. 8, 9. That he is absolutely the heir of all things, and hath the highest empire and dominion over all angels and men; by which words is signified the highest excellency and divinity, and, as it were, the unity of Christ with God, though with diversity," in that he is his Son and heir, and received this dominion from another. And I believe it is as impossible to understand how a man should have this empire over all things in heaven and earth, and over death itself, and yet be a mere man, as it is to understand any mystery of the sacred Trinity. The word "heir" doth also signify "Lord of all things" (see the note on Col. i. 15).

[4] Δι' οὗ καὶ τοὺς αἰῶνας ἐποίησεν, By whom also he made the worlds.] That is, saith Grotius, propter quem, "for whom he made them," according to the doctrine of the rabbins, that "the world was made for the Messiah." But this exposition is contrary to the rule of all grammarians,* that τὸ διὰ, ὅτε μὲν συντάσσεται γενικῇ, μεταιτείαν, ὅτε δὲ αἰτιατικῇ, αἰτίαν δηλοῖ, "that the preposition διὰ, when it is joined with a genitive case, signifies the means by which, and the final cause only when it is joined with an accusative case." It is contrary to the exposition of all the Greek fathers, who unanimously say, τοῦτο δηλωτικὸν τῆς θεότητος, "This shows the divinity of Christ." It is also without example in the New Testament, for διὰ τῆς δόξης τοῦ πατρὸς, Rom. vi. 4, which is the only place he cites, signifies "by the glory" or power "of the Father," by which Christ was raised from the dead (Eph. i. 19, Col. ii. 12). The Socinians by "the worlds" here understand the new creation, or the church begun by Christ's ministry upon earth, begotten and renewed by the evangelical dispensation. But neither can this exposition stand: for (1.) though Christ be styled, in some of the Greek versions, πατὴρ τοῦ μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, Isa. ix. 6, "the Father of the age to come," yet οἱ αἰῶνες, absolutely put, doth never signify the church or evangelical state; nor doth the scripture ever speak of "the world to come" in the plural, but in the singular number only, preserving the phrase עולם הבא, as they received it from the Jews. (2.) Were this the import of the words, the worlds might as well have been said to have been created or made by Christ's apostles, they being the great converters of the world; or, at least, this being done by them, assisted by the power of Christ, after he had been thus made "heir of all things," it must have properly been said that Christ made the worlds by his apostles, which yet the Holy Ghost never thinks fit to intimate. Moreover, whereas this making of the world by Jesus Christ is done by his prophetic office, i. e. his speaking to us in the last days, the apostle had mentioned this already, and makes a plain gradation from it to his kingly office, in saying he was constituted "Lord of all things," not speaking of making the world by way of consecution, thus, καὶ δι' οὗ, "and by whom," but, by way of farther gradation, δι' οὗ καὶ, "by whom also" he made the world; as if he should have said, Nor is it to be wondered that he should be constituted Lord of the whole world, seeing he made the whole. And that the apostle here doth speak, not of the reforming of the new, but of the forming of the old world, he himself sufficiently instructs us, by saying in this same epistle, "By faith we understand, καταρτίσθαι τοὺς αἰῶνας ῥήματι Θεοῦ, that the worlds were formed by the word of God," xi. 3. For that by τοῦς αἰῶνας we are to understand the material world, the Socinian commentators grant, and the parallel place in Peter doth enforce, when he saith that "the heavens were of old, and the earth, ἐξ ὕδατος συνεστῶσα τῷ τοῦ Θεοῦ Λόγῳ, consisting out of water by the Word of God," 2 Pet. iii. 5, and this "world" is mentioned in both places in the plural number, agreeably to the phrase and doctrine of the Jews,* who speak of עולמים, i. e. "the worlds," in the plural, and divide them into עולם הזה, or עולם חיצפל, i. e. "this inferior and habitable world," called by Peter, ὁ τότε κόσμος, "the then world," which perished by water, ver. 6, and "the עולם העליון, superior world," that is, the heavens. And it is no improbable conjecture, that when Peter saith, "The heavens and earth consisted by the Word of God," and Paul, that "by faith we learn that the worlds were framed, Ῥήματι Θεοῦ, by the Word of God," they mean this substantial world, of which the apostle is here speaking; for the word דבר seems plainly to be used in this sense, when we read in the Targum of Jerusalem, on Gen. xxviii. 11, דהוה דבוריה, "For his Word," i. e. the Word of God, "desired to speak with Jacob;" and in that of Jonathan, דביראּ, "The Word would speak with him;" which in Bereschith Rabba, §. 68, runs thus, "God would speak with him:" and the word Ῥῆμα seems also to be either used in this sense, or applied to the Λόγος, often by Philo;† as when he saith that "Moses was translated, διὰ Ῥήματος τοῦ Αἰτίου, δι' οὗ καὶ σύμπας κόσμος ἐδημιουργεῖτο, by the Word of the First Cause, by which the world was made;" and that God "made both‡ the heavens and the earth by a Word, by his most illustrious and resplendent Λόγος." And to be sure, Philo was of the same opinion with Paul, that the Word made and fashioned the world; whence he so often mentions the divine Word§ "adorning all things," "the Word of God that maketh the world," "the Word by which the world is fashioned and made, and by which, as his organ, God gave being to it;" and saith, in words like those of the apostle,¶ that "God possesseth all things, using that Word as the dispenser of his gifts, by which also he made the world." And this was also the doctrine of all the primitive fathers from the beginning, as well as of all the commentators on this text. Barnabas¶ declares that he is "the Lord of the world, the maker of the sun, the person by whom and to whom are all things." "He is," saith J. Martyr, "the Word by which the heaven, the earth, and every creature was made, by whom God at the beginning made and ordained all things, viz. the heavens and the earth, and by whom he will renew them." This Irenæus†† delivers as the rule of faith contained in the scripture, "which they who hold to may easily prove that the heretics had deviated from the truth." He adds, that "the barbarians who held the ancient tradition did believe in one God, the maker of heaven and earth, and of all things therein, by Jesus Christ the Son of God;" and this doctrine he repeats almost a hundred times elsewhere. "Our doctrine," saith Athenagoras,* "celebrates one God, the creator of all things, who made all things by Jesus Christ, from whom and by whom all things were made." "God," saith Theophilus,† "made all things by him, and he is called the beginning, because he is the principle and ruler of all things made by him." He adds, that "by this principle God made the heavens: that God said to him, Let us make man; he being his Word, by which he made all things." "Him," saith Tatian,‡ "we know to have been the author of the world, for that which was begotten in the beginning, gave beginning to the things made: he made man the image of his immortality, and before man he made the angels." "We rational creatures, saith Clement of Alexandria,§ "are the work of God the Word; for he was and is the divine principle of all things, by whom all things were made, and who, as the framer of all things in the beginning, gave also life to us; by whom are all things; who made man; our God and Maker, the cause of the creation." In the third century we learn the same from Origen,¶ Tertullian,¶ Novatian, Cyprian,†† and others cited by the learned Dr. Bull. So that in these two verses there be visible these gradations; one, from Christ's prophetic office to his kingly office, conferred on him as "heir of all things;" the other, from his kingly office to the foundation of it, laid in his divine nature, and in the work of the creation; it being, say Irenæus and the ancient fathers, fit that he should reform and govern the world, by whom it was formed, that he should give new life to man who gave him his being and first breath.

[5] Ver. 3. Ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης, i. e. The resplendence or shining forth of his glory.] This metaphor, some of the fathers think, is taken from the sun, whence Justin Martyr‡‡ saith he proceedeth from the Father, as τὸ τοῦ ἡλίου φῶς, "the light of the sun, without division or separation, from him." Others, with him, παραδείγματος χάριν, "for example's sake," say,* "He proceedeth, ὡς ἀπὸ πυρὸς ἀναπτόμενα πυρὰ, as fire is kindled from fire, without the diminution of the fire that kindles it," or as ἀπὸ λαμπάδος ἑτέρας, "as one torch is lighted from another," which is the metaphor of Tatian, p. 145; which metaphors they have borrowed from Philo,† who, speaking of the Spirit in Moses, derived upon the seventy elders, cautions us not to understand this to be done, κατὰ ἀποκοπὴν, καὶ διάζευξιν, "by abscission, or disjunction, ἀλλ' οἷα γέγονεν ἂν ἀπὸ πυρὸς, but as light from fire, at which if you light a thousand torches, it is not diminished." Accordingly the Nicene council style him "Light of light," and hence they argue his consubstantiality with the Father, who produces not another essence, or substance in the Son, but communicates the same essence to him. The like notions the Jews seem to have had of their Λόγος, or "Wisdom," which is with them the same: for the book of Wisdom saith of her, that she is ἀπόῤῥοια τῆς τῶν παντοκράτορος δόξης εἰλικρινὴς, καὶ ἀπαύγασμα φωτὸς ἀϊδίου, an efflux of the sincere glory of the Almighty, and the splendour of eternal light" (vii. 25, 26). And Philo‡ saith of the Λόγος, that he is τὸ τοῦ ἀοράτου καὶ μεγίστου Θεοῦ περιφεγγέστατον καὶ περιαυγέστατον φῶς, "the most illustrious and splendid light of the invisible and highest God." And this the Jews might better understand, if it were taken, as probably it was, from the glory that conducted them out of Egypt, and led them through the wilderness, and dwelt among them, first in the ark and tabernacle, and afterward in the temple. For it is observable,

First, That this δόξα, "glory," or Shechinah, so often mentioned in the Old Testament, and in the writings of the Jews, was not the cloud itself, that being only the cover of it, but the light, fire, or splendour that issued from it. So Exod. xxiv. 16, "And the glory of the Lord dwelt upon mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it (viz. the glory of the Lord) six days; and the sight of the glory of the Lord (when it broke out of the cloud after six days) was as burning fire on the top of the mount, in the sight of the people of Israel." And, Exod. xl. 34, "Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle." And, ver. 35, "Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the house." 1 Kings viii. 10, 11, "When the priests were come out of the holy place the cloud filled the house of the Lord, so that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord." Ezek. x. 4, "And the house was filled with the cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of the glory of the Lord." Note, Secondly, That this glory is styled "the glory of the Lord," not as being itself a divine thing, or a ray of divinity, but as being the symbol of God's glorious presence and abode where it appeared and resided. Thus the cloud, which consisteth of a dark part to cover the fire, or light, and a bright side by the appearance of the light, is called "the cloud of Jehovah," Exod. iv. 38, Numb. x. 34, because God was gloriously present in it; or, as Rabbi Moses ben Nachman, on Exod. xl. 34, saith, כי הכבוד שוכן בהוך הענן, "because the glory dwelt in the midst of it;" whence God said, "Lo, I come to thee in a thick cloud," Exod. xix. 9; "I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy-seat," Lev. xvi. 2; "He spake to Moses out of the cloud," Numb. vii. 89. And when he went to receive his commands, it is said, "And Moses drew near to the thick darkness, where God was," Exod. xx. 21. And, lastly, God is said to "go before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, and by night in the pillar of fire," Exod. xiii. 21, Numb. xiv. 14.

Again, The ark in which this glory dwelt between the cherubims, is called כבוד יי, "the glory of the Lord," i. e. of that glorious Majesty who dwelt in it; whence the God of Israel is often styled "the God that sitteth between the cherubims;" because here, say the Jews,§ he fixed his residence and presence, notwithstanding that he fills heaven and earth, and his majesty is in heaven, and in all the earth. And when the ark was to be taken up and carried any whither, they sang thus, "Arise, Jehovah, and let thine enemies be scattered," Numb. x. 35, Ps. lxviii. 2; and when it rested, thus, "Give rest, Jehovah, to the many thousands of Israel;" not styling the ark "Jehovah," but "the glorious Majesty that dwelt in it," or "him, and the ark of his strength," Ps. cxxxii. 8, where also it may be noted, that the Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan read thus, "Rise up, O Word of the Lord," and, "Return, O Word of the Lord." And, Ps. xxiv., when the ark was brought from the house of Obed-edom, and settled in mount Sion, and placed in the holy of holies, they sang thus, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, that the King of glory may come in;" i. e. "the Lord of hosts," who dwelt in the ark.

Accordingly our Lord Jesus, after his ascension, appeared still in or with the glory of the Lord. When he was transfigured on mount Tabor, he was in this splendour, Matt. xvii. 2, styled by Peter, μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα, "the magnificent glory," 2 Pet. i. 17; so he appeared to Stephen, who "saw the glory of the Lord, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God," Acts vii. 55; so to Saul, when "a light brighter than the sun shone round about him, and he heard a voice out of it, saying to him, I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest," Acts ix. 5, xxvi. 13; he being ὁ Κύριος τῆς δόξης, "the Lord of glory," 1 Cor. ii. 8 (see Rev. i. 14, 15, ii. 18, xviii. 1, xix. 12); and because of God's residence in this glory, the word "glory" doth often signify God himself, as when we read of "the throne" and "the house of Glory," i. e. of the glorious God. So Rabbi Joseph Abbo;* "It is the manner of the scripture to call the visible glory and splendour of the divine Majesty by the name of God." So Ps. cvi. 20, "They turned their Glory into the similitude of a calf:" Jer. ii. 12, "My people have changed their Glory for that which doth not profit:" and so the fathers seem to take the word "glory" here for "the divine Glory." Note,

Thirdly, That from this glory, when God did any wondrous works of power, mercy, and judgment, there is said to be an emanation or shining forth of glory; as when "fire went forth from the glory of the Lord to consume their sacrifices," in token of his favourable acceptance of them: so Lev. ix. 23, 24, "The glory of the Lord appeared, and there came a fire out from before the Lord, and consumed upon the altar the burnt-offering and the fat:" so 2 Chron. vii. 1—3; accordingly they begged his favour in these words, "Thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth," Ps. lxxx. 1 (see Ps. l. 2, Deut. xxxiii. 2). And to consume transgressors, viz. Nadab and Abihu, Lev. x. 2, and "the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense," Numb. xvi. 35 (see Exod. xiv. 24, 25). And in like manner may the Son be said to be ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης, "an emanation or shining forth from the glory of the Father;" as being before all things, prolatus à patre sive generatus, "begotten or brought forth by the Father," saith Irenæus, lib. ii. cap. 48, 4, 28; being always in him, "but τῶν ὑλικῶν ξυμπάντων ἰδέα καὶ ἐνέργεια εἶναι προελθὼν, coming forth before all things, to be the idea and active power of all material beings:" so Athenagoras, p. 10, "The Word, whom the Father begat, ἐξερευξάμενος πρὸ πάντων sending him forth before all things, who was always in God, and became Λόγος προφορικὸς, when he would create the world." So Theophilus.† "Whom he made προπηδᾶν, to leap from him," say Justin Martyr‡ and Tatian. "He being in him before all ages; προελθὼν ὁ Λόγος ἐημιουργίας, the Word coming forth, which is the cause of the creation, προγεννηθεὶς, ἐν' οὗ τὰ πάντα, and fore-begotten, by which all things were made," saith Clemens Alexandrinus.§ "The Word brought forth by the Father, and by that prolation generated, and therefore the Son of God," saith Tertullian.‖

[6] Καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, The impression, or representation of his subsistence.] The phrase signifies, saith Theodoret, that he subsists by himself, καὶ ἐν ἑαυτῷ δείκνυσι τοὺς παρικοὺς χαρακτῆρας, and in himself represents the characters of his Father." Χαρακτὴρ, saith Phavorinus, is stance), and [7] upholding all things by the word of his power, [8] when he had (Gr. having) by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high;

διατύπωσις δηλοῦσα τὴν ὑπόστασιν, "a form or draught manifesting the substance whence it was taken." Ὑπόστασις, saith he, "is the substance with the properties;" οὐσία μετὰ τῶν ἰδιωμάτων, or συνδρομὴ τῶν περὶ ἑκάστου ἰδιωμάτων, "a concourse of all the properties of any being;" so that "the character of his subsistence" here is, according to him, "a draught manifesting or exhibiting the substance and properties of God." According to the Greek commentators on the place, it is the same with our Lord's being "in the form of God," before he took our nature on him (Phil. ii. 6). Accordingly, Wisdom is, by the author of the book that bears that name, styled ἔσοπτρον ἀκηλίδωτον τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐνεργείας, καὶ εἰκὼν τῆς ἀγαθότητος αὐτοῦ, "the unspotted mirror of the power or activity of God, and the image of his goodness," vii. 26. The Λόγος is, saith Philo,* ἀΐδιος εἰκὼν αὐτοῦ, "the eternal image of God. The image of God,† δι' οὗ σύμπας ὁ κόσμος ἐδημιουργεῖτο, by which the whole world was made." And of the angel, which God sent before Israel, in whom God's name was, Exod. xxiii. 21, the Jews say he was, מלאך פניו, i. e. "the angel of his face;" because, saith Rabbi Moses Cerundensis,‡ God's face, or glory, might be seen in him, or be exactly represented by him: yea, the goverment of the whole world was committed to him, and God had made him Lord over his whole house, and had made all things subject to him. Now these things so exactly agree with what the apostle here ascribes to Christ, that I could not think them unworthy to be noted here.

[7] Φέρων τε τὰ πάντα τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ, And holding all things by the word of his power.] The Hebrew word נשא is sometimes rendered φέρω, sustineo; as when it is said of Moses, Numb. xi. 14. 17, "I cannot φέρειν, sustain, or bear, all this people." And, Deut. i. 9. 12, "How can I alone, φέρειν τὸν κόπον, bear the labour of all this people?" And, of Christ, that φέρει, "he bears the burden of our sin," Isa. liii. 4. Sometimes it signifies to govern; whence נשיא is sometimes rendered βασιλεὺς, "a king;" Gen. xxiii. 6, sometimes ἄρχων, "a prince," as it is rendered above sixty times; sometimes ἀρχηγὸς, in the same sense, Numb. xiii. 3, xvi. 2, and sometimes ἡγούμενος, "a governor," Josh. xiii. 22, 2 Chron. v. 1; and the Greek φέρειν signifies not only to sustain, but also, suo arbitratû moderari, "to govern at his will:" now which of these two senses you put upon the words it is not much material, since it is equally the effect of a divine power to sustain and govern all things; whence this is, by the Jews, made the description of God himself, that he is a God, מכיל כלא,§ "sustaining all things," the heavens, the earth, and the abyss, and bearing all people, ברוח מימריה, "by the Spirit of his Word." Accordingly, of the Λόγος, Philo‖ often saith, that he is πηδαλιοῦχος καὶ κυβερνήτης πάντων, "he that sits at the helm, and governs all things:" that he is¶ ὁ συνέχων καὶ διοικῶν τὰ πάντα, "he that containeth and dispenseth all things:" that God, as a king and shepherd, rules according to law and right, and placing over us "his first begotten Son," ὃς τὴν ἐπιμέλειαν τῆς ἱερᾶς ταύτης ἀγέλης οἷά τε μεγάλου βασιλέως ὕπαρχος διαδέχεται, who, as the pro-rex of the great King, takes care of the sacred flock."

It remains yet to be inquired, whether these things are spoken of our Lord, as acting here on earth, or purely of the divine nature he had before the world was made. The Socinians, and some others, think all this relates to our Saviour, as acting here on earth, that he was the splendour of his Father's glory; because "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined into our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. iv. 6): on which account the apostle saith, "We have seen his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten Son of God" (John i. 14): that he was the character of his substance, or his attributes, as he was "the image of the invisible God" (Col. i. 15), in which his power, wisdom, holiness, love, and mercy, shined forth conspicuously: that he did φέρειν, præstare, perform all things by the word of his power; as he made the winds and seas calm, rebuked diseases, and cast out devils by his word. And Mr. Clerc is positive that it must be the human nature which this sacred writer spake of, that the Jews might understand what he said was true: "for that alone is visible; and nothing but what is such can be called the image or brightness of any thing among men." On the other hand, it is certain that all the fathers were of another mind; that when Philo and the ancient Jews spake thus of Wisdom, the Logos, the Angel of God's face, they understood all that they said of the Logos and Wisdom subsisting long before our Saviour's incarnation, and so thought this Logos the splendour and image of the Father, when he was not visible among men, as the apostle saith he was, when he was taken from them into heaven. It is certain also, that the preceding words, "By whom also he made the worlds," cannot be spoken of Christ incarnate; and the words, "Upholding all things by the Word of his power," seem to import the same with that expression of the apostle, Col. i. 17, "By him all things consist." Moreover, could these things be attributed to our Lord Christ as acting in the flesh, yet have I proved, note on Col. i. 15, that they must be ascribed to a divine nature residing in him, or to "God manifested in the flesh;" and so, what Mr. Clerc says "must be the human nature,"—must (say I) be the divine nature.

[8] Δι' ἑαυτοῦ καθαρισμὸν ποιησάμενος τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, When he had by himself purged our sins.] i. e. When he had made himself an expiatory sacrifice, to purge us from the guilt and punishment of our transgressions. To confirm this, let it be noted,

First, That this was the opinion of all nations, that their expiatory sacrifices were designed to take away the guilt of sin, and make atonement for it to an offended Majesty. For why are they still said, ἁγνίζειν, καθαρίζειν, purgare, lustrare, "to purge, and to make clean," but from their supposed virtue to purify them from the guilt of sin? and because sin is often represented in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, under the metaphors of uncleanness, filthiness, defilement, and pollution; therefore their sacrifices also are still represented as cleansing them from the guilt and the defilement of sin, and so making the pollution to pass from them. Hence the blood which made the atonement is styled, αἷμα καθαρισμοῦ, "the blood of cleansing," or purgation. So Exod. xxx. 10, "And Aaron shall make an atonement upon the horns of the incense-offering once a year, ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος καθαρισμοῦ καθαρισμοῦ ἁμαρτιῶν αὐτῶ, with the blood of the sin-offering shall he make atonement upon it." And the sacrifice offered for sin is said to be offered καθαρίσαι, "to purify" them from it by an atonement: so, Lev. ix. 15, "And he brought the people's offering, and took the goat which was the sin-offering and slew it, καὶ ἐκαθάρισεν αὐτὸν, and offered it for sin." And, Lev. xvi. 30, in the great day of atonement, "the priest shall make an atonement for you, καθαρίσαι ὑμᾶς, to cleanse you, that you may be clean from all your sins before the Lord, καὶ καθαρισθήσετε, and you shall be cleansed." So Job is said καθαρίζειν, "to cleanse" his sons from their supposed sins by a burnt-offering, i. 5; and so he inquires, vii. 21, "Why dost thou not make καθαρισμὸν τῆς ἁμαρτίας μου;" i. e. Why dost thou not forgive my sins? Since therefore it is very reasonable to conceive that the word καθαρίζειν, used in an epistle written to the Jews touching the expiatory sacrifice of Christ, is used in the sense in which they always took it, when applied in the Old Testament to sacrifices, which made atonement for their sins; it follows, that when the apostle here saith, Christ made καθαρισμὸν, "a purgation of our sins by himself;" and when he adds, that whereas the blood of the legal sacrifices did expiate εἰς τὴν τῆς σαρκὸς καθαρότητα, "to the purification of the flesh, the blood of Christ, καθαριεῖ, shall much more expiate to the purification of the conscience from the guilt of sin," ix. 13; when he proceeds to say, that whereas "under the law almost all things ἐν αἵματι καθαρίζεται, were purified by blood, and without shedding of blood there was no remission," ver. 22, 23; and thence argues, that "the heavenly things must be purged with better sacrifices;" he, in these cases, must

4 Being made (Gr. being) so much better than the angels (and superior to them by this exaltation to the right hand of Majesty), as he hath by inheritance obtained [9] a more excellent name (title and authority) than they.

5 For unto which of the angels said he at any time (as he did to Christ), [10] Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? And again (to Solomon the son of David, what did more eminently belong to this Son and Lord of David), [11] I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son? (2 Sam. vii. 14, 1 Chron. xxii. 10.)

6 And again, when he bringeth in (ὅταν δὲ πάλιν, and when he brings again) the first-begotten (from the dead, Col. i. 18) into the world, he saith, And [12] let all the angels of God worship him (establishing thus his dominion over them, and their subjection to him, and also the divine excellence of him who was thus to be worshipped by the highest of created beings).

7 And (moreover, speaking) [13] of the angels he (i. e.

speak of the blood of Christ as making atonement for our sins, by purging away the guilt of them, and averting the punishment due to us for them (see the reading vindicated, Examen Millii).

[9] Ver. 4. Διαφορώτερον ὄνομα, A more excellent name.] i. e. Not only title, but authority and superior excellency. So Phil. ii. 9, "God hath highly exalted them, and given him ὄνομα τὸ ὑπὲρ πᾶν ὄνομα, a name above every name," i. e. the highest dignity and power, "that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow;" i. e. that all creatures in heaven or earth, or under it, should own his power and dominion, ver. 10. Eph. i. 21, "He hath set him at his right hand, above all principality, power, might, and dominion, καὶ παντὸς ὀνόματος, and every name." In both these senses Christ hath a more excellent name, viz. the name of his "only Son" (ver. 5), the name of God (ver. 8), and a more excellent authority and dignity, viz. that of "sitting at the right hand of Majesty" (ver. 13), and "ruling all things by the word of his power;" and this excellency he hath upon a better foundation, as being the maker of the world," &c. (ver. 2, 3).

[10] Ver. 5. Υἱός μου εἶ σύ, Thou art my son.] R. Solomon* here saith, "Our masters have interpreted all that is written in this psalm of the king Messiah." And Saadias Gaon† doth, from these very words, prove the dominion and kingdom of the Messiah, because it is here said, "I have set thee my King, upon the holy hill of Sion; I will declare the command, Jehovah hath said unto me, Thou art my Son," &c.; which also is apparent from the following words, "I will give the heathen for thine inheritance," &c. (ver. 8), and from the exhortation to all kings to submit to him. And that this was the ancient and received exposition of these words, confirmed by the Holy Ghost, we learn from this apostle, who disputing with the Jews touching our Saviour's resurrection, when all power in heaven and earth was given to him, Matt. xxviii. 18, he proves it from these very words, Acts xiii. 33. And again, speaking of his priesthood, which he was to exercise in heaven after his resurrection and ascension, he proves it to the same Jews from the same words, Heb. v. 5.

[11] Ἔσομαι αὐτῷ εἰς πατέρα, I will be to him a Father, &c.] These words are cited from 2 Sam. vii. 14, and they do promise to Solomon, the type of Christ, a kingdom to be established for ever, ver. 13. 16, and so to Christ the antitype, and eminently "the Son of God," an everlasting kingdom and dominion (see the Judgment of the Jewish Church, p. 61).

Note also, That though the angels be sometimes in scripture, called "the sons of God," Job i. 6, ii. 1, xxxviii. 7, God never said to any of them, "I will be to him a Father," to protect him in his kingdom; much less, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," to a kingdom; and so these passages, in the true and full extent of them, cannot agree to any of the angels.

[12] Ver. 6. Προσκυνησάτωσαν αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ, Let all the angels of God worship him.] It is generally thought these words are cited from Ps. xcvii. 7, where in the Septuagint we have words very like them, viz. προσκυνήσατε αὐτῷ, πάντες ἄγγελοι αὐτοῦ, "Worship him, all his angels;" in the Hebrew it is indeed כל אלהים, "all ye elohim;" but Aben Ezra's note is, that some think כל אלהים הם המלאכים, "the word elohim always denotes the angels:" and Kimchi saith,‡ the Hebrews did expound this psalm "of what was to come to pass in the days of the Messiah." In the Septuagint it is styled a psalm of David, ὅτε ἡ γῆ αὐτῷ καθίσταται, "when the land was established to him," or when he was made master of all those countries which God designed to be the inheritance of Israel, and therefore may very probably be referred to the Son of David, at his resurrection, or his coming again into the world, that being the time when "all power in heaven and earth was given to him," when he was solemnly inaugurated, and installed in his spiritual and heavenly kingdom, and "the government was upon his shoulders," and "he sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high," ver. 3.

But it is observable, that these words are expressly to be found, Deut. xxxii. 43, as here they are cited: and it is certain from Paul, that God there speaks of the times when the Messiah was to be preached unto the gentiles; for "that the gentiles should glorify God for his mercy," he proves from these words of the same verse, "Rejoice, ye gentiles, with his people," Rom. xv. 9, 10. Accordingly, the Jews expound many of the words of Moses here recorded. Thus Jonathan on ver. 39, saith thus, "When the Word of the Lord shall reveal himself to redeem his people, he shall say to all people, See, I am he that am, and have been, and shall be (see Heb. xiii. 8); I by my Word kill and make alive; I smite the people Israel, and I will heal them in the end of the days." On ver. 40, the Targum of Jerusalem saith thus, "I live במימרי by my Word for ever;" that of Jonathan, "I have prepared in the heavens, בית שכנתי, the house of my Majesty;" that is, saith R. Solomon, מקם שכנתי, "the place of my Majesty;" expressions often used by Philo* to signify the Λόγος, as when he saith, οἶκον ἔχειν τὸν ἑαυτοῦ Λόγον, "God hath his house, viz. his own Word," and that† ὁ θεῖος Λόγος, "the divine Word in his place;" and upon ver. 43, Jonathan ben Uziel paraphraseth thus, "He with his Word will expiate for the land, and for his people," viz. as the high-priest did on the great day of expiation. The other words, "He will render vengeance to his enemies, and make his arrow drunk with the blood of the slain," are fit expressions of Christ's exercise of his kingly government over his enemies, by which he was to "break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces as a potter's vessel" (Ps. ii. 9). The import of these words therefore may be this, When God was to introduce his first-born again into the world by the resurrection, and give him power and dominion over all things in heaven and earth, he said, Let all the angels of God worship him, and own him as their Lord and Maker. Dr. Owen saith, this cannot be applied to the resurrection, because Christ did not leave the world, or go out of it at his death; but to this it may be answered, that "going hence" (Ps. xxix. 13), and "going out of the world" (1 Cor. v. 10), are common expressions to signify death. And, secondly, God being said to "beget" Christ, when he raised him from the dead (Ps. ii. 7, Acts xiii. 33, Heb. v. 5), and gave him power over all things in heaven and earth, i. e. over all the world, this may be fitly called a second introduction of him into the world. Thirdly, whereas he saith, that these words, προσκυνήσαι αὐτῷ, &c. cannot be taken from Deut. xxxii. 43, because there are no such words in the original, and it is absurd to think the apostle should cite that from the scripture as the word and testimony of God, which indeed is not in it, nor was ever spoken by God, for this and for two other reasons offered by the reverend Dr. Hammond, note on Ps. xcvii. 7, I think it more reasonable to conceive these words were taken from the psalms.

David, only) saith, (He is that God) who maketh his angels spirits (or winds), and his ministers a flame of fire; (giving them no higher titles than those of his messengers and ministers, and showing their efficacy and swiftness in doing his commandments, and hearkening to the voice of his words, by comparing them to the winds and fire, Ps. cxxiii. 20, 21.)

8 But (speaking) unto (of) the Son he (i. e. David, moved by the Holy Ghost,) saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom (Ps. xlv. 7).

9 Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore [14] God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness (i. e. advanced thee in eminence and dignity) above thy fellows (styling him, in these words, God, and an eternal king; ascribing to him a throne and kingdom, and a righteous government, to reward his righteous servants, whom he loves, and to punish his obdurate enemies, whose iniquities render them hateful to him. So that these words again prove both his divine nature, and his exaltation to the government of the whole world).

10 And (that also by him he made the heavens, is testified in these words spoken of him), [15] Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands:

11 They shall perish; but thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment;

12 And as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail (Ps. cii.).

civ. 4, not to, but of, the angels, it is necessary to translate these words as our version doth, "Of the angels he saith;" and as the Hebrew אֶל, so the Greek πρὸς, is oft of the same import with de and περὶ. He spake this parable πρὸς αὐτοὺς, "concerning them," Luke xix. 20, Mark xii. 12; πρὸς δὲ τὸν Ἰσραὴλ, "But of Israel he saith," Rom. x. 21; πρὸς ὃν, "Of whom we speak," Heb. iv. 13. So Neh. ii. 18, "He spake to you of the good hand of God upon him, καὶ πρὸς τοὺς λόγους τοῦ βασιλέως, and of the words of the king." Of the particle אֶל, see Noldius, p. 458.

[14] Ver. 9. Ὁ Θεὸς, ὁ Θεός σου, God, even thy God.] For Christ is God of God, according to the Nicene symbol. Hence do the primitive fathers thus distinguish betwixt him and the Father; that "God the Father is that God above whom there is no other God;" whereas "Christ is God of God;" and as to that, "inferior to God the Father:" so Justin Martyr* and Irenæus. That this psalm was spoken of the Messiah, is evident from the Targum on the place, which saith, "Because thou, O king Messiah, hast loved justice," &c. And on ver. 3, "Thy fairness, O king Messiah, exceeds the sons of men." To this purpose, see Rabbi Solomon and Aben Ezra on this psalm.

[15] Ver. 10.] That this psalm hath relation to the times of the Messiah, we learn from the Chaldee paraphrast, which saith on ver. 16, "Zion is builded by the Word of the Lord:" and from the creation of a new people to praise the Lord, ver. 18, which the Jews themselves expounded of "the world to come," or the state of the church under the Messiah; and, thirdly, from the calling of the gentiles, mentioned ver. 15, "So the heathens shall fear the name of the Lord; and all the kings of the earth thy glory:" and, ver. 22, "When the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms to serve the Lord" (see the Judgment of the Jewish Church, p. 38). That these things are here spoken of, and applied to Christ, is also evident, (1.) from the connective particle καὶ, which knits this to the former citation, and makes it to run thus: "Of the Son it is said, Thy throne, O God, is for ever, καὶ, and of him it is also said, Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundations of the earth." (2.) From the scope of the apostle, which, both before and after, is to bring testimonies to prove the excellency of the Messiah, and the truth of what he had asserted of him (ver. 2, 3), and therefore he must pursue the same design here. And, (3.) from the concession of the Socinians upon the place, that the latter words, which speak of the destruction of the heavens and the earth, belong to Christ. Now these words, "They shall perish, but thou remainest," are plainly spoken of the same person who "founded the earth in the beginning;" and therefore must equally belong to Christ. But here it is objected:

Obj. That if the author of this epistle had indeed believed that Christ was the creator of the world, to what purpose doth he spend so much time to prove him more excellent than the angels? For who can doubt that the Creator is more excellent than his creatures?

Ans. First, He doth not absolutely go about to prove him more excellent than the angels, but comparatively, so far more excellent as the titles given him in scripture showed that he exceeded them; and that was as much as the Creator doth exceed his creatures.

Secondly, I have shown, note on the second and third verses, that the apostle had asserted, not only Christ's dignity, as "heir of all things," and so succeeding in his Father's kingdom, but also that he was therefore "Lord of all things," because "he made the world," and therefore was obliged, in his testimonies, to prove both these things; as he doth in most of the testimonies produced.

Thirdly, As there were then divers heretics, who ascribed the creation of this visible world to angels, and not to Christ; so also were there divers Jews, who held that they were God's ministers, or συνεργοὶ, "coworkers, in the creation of the world;" and that God said to them, "Let us make man," Gen. i. 26. Now against these Jews and heretics, the apostle very appositely proves, that the creation of the world was not to be ascribed to those angels, who, they say, "gave the law," ii. 2; but to that Jesus from whom we have received the gospel. Of the sayings of the Jews, concerning the assistance of the angels in framing man, see note on ii. 5, and Maimonides, More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 6. Of Simon Magus, Irenæus doth inform us, lib. i. cap. 20, that he held, that his Ennoia produced angelos et potestates à quibus et mundum hunc factum esse dixit, "angels and powers by whom the world was made;" that Menander also held, mundum factum ab angelis, "that the world was made by angels," lib. i. cap. 21, lib. ii. cap. 9; that Cerinthus held that "the world was made by some separate virtues, inferior to God," lib. ii. cap. 22, 23; and that "the world was not made by Christ," but that "he rather came ad dissolvenda omnia opera ejus Dei qui mundum fecit, to dissolve all the works of that God who made the world:" and, lastly, Χριστῷ ὁμογενεῖς ἀγγέλους συνπροβεβλῆσθαι, "that the angels were of the same rank with Christ, and produced together with him." All which vain fancies gave just occasion to the apostle to assert, that Christ was thus superior to the angels, and the creator both of them and of the world. Accordingly, the Targum of Jerusalem gives this description of the Word of the Lord, that, "it is he who said to the world, Be, and it was; and who shall say unto it, Be, and it shall be." Which words the Targum of Ben Uziel (in Exod. iii. 14) applies to the Lord himself.

[16] Ver. 13. Κάθου ἐκ δεξιῶν μου, Sit thou on my right hand.] That these words were spoken of the Messiah, appears (1.) from the two Targums on this psalm, both declaring, that this was spoken במימרא "in or to his Word." That is, saith R. Saadias Gaon, on Dan. vii. 13, "the Messiah, our righteousness;" as it is written, Psal. cx. 1, "The Lord said to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand." R. Moses Haddarson says (Beresch. Rabba, in Gen. xviii. 1), "Hereafter God will cause the Messiah to sit on his right hand; as it is said (Psal. cx. 1), The Lord said unto my Lord, &c. Midrash Tehillim, on Ps. ii. 7, saith, "The affairs of the Messiah are set forth in the hagiographa in these words (Ps.

Chija, said, that "in the age of the Messiah, the blessed God will set the king Messiah on his right hand; as it is written, The Lord said to my Lord." And though on this psalm he expounds the words, first of Abraham, whom they introduce complaining that God has placed his Son on his right hand, and him only on his left; yet presently follow these words, "And so he saith to the Messiah." And R. Obadiah not only saith, "The Psalmist composed this psalm of the Messiah, "but adds what illustrates ver. 14, that "God farther said, Thou shalt sit on my right hand, and the ministering angels on my left" (see more in Cartw. Mellificium, p. 2969). And since our blessed Saviour confounded the scribes and pharisees with this inquiry, How the Messiah could be the Son of David, since David here "in spirit calls him Lord?" Matt. xxii. 42, it is evident this was then the received exposition of these words.

CHAPTER II.

1 Therefore we (knowing the excellency of the person speaking now to us in the gospel above all other prophets, and above those angels which were employed in delivering the law of Moses) ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard (from the Son of God), [1] lest at any time we should let them slip (out of our memory).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Μή ποτε παραῤῥυῶμεν.] Τουτέστι, μὴ ἐκπέσωμεν, "Lest we fall off from them." So Œcumenius, Theophylact, and Phavorinus, which sense agrees well with the scope of this epistle: but the sense given by our translation is also very good and proper; for in this sense παραῤῥυεῖν is used in those words of Solomon: "My son, μὴ παραῤῥυῇς, τήρησον δὲ ἐμὴν βουλὴν, be not forgetful of, but keep in mind, or lay up in thy heart, my counsel," Prov. iii. 21. So the wise man interprets himself, in the beginning of that chapter: "My son, forget not my precepts, but let thy heart keep my words," ver. 1. So Origen,* speaking of the festivals of the church, the Lord's-day, Easter, pentecost, saith, "The common people had need of those sensible admonitions, or memorials of the blessings then celebrated, ἵνα μὴ τέλεον παραῤῥυῇ, that they may not entirely slip out of their memories:" and this translation and interpretation is confirmed from the word ἀμελεῖν, ver. 3, which signifies "to be unmindful of" this great salvation.

[2] Ver. 2. Ὁ δι' ἀγγέλων λαληθεὶς λόγος, The word spoken by angels.] Maimonides saith expressly,† Non invenies Deum ullum opus fecisse, nisi per manum alicujus angeli; "God doth no work but by the hand of some angel." To confirm this he cites that passage of their wise men, that "God does nothing without consulting before the family above." And that in Bereschith Rabba,‡ "Wheresoever it is said in scripture, ויהוה, And Jehovah did this or that, ibi intelligitur ipse et domus judicii ejus, there we must understand, that all things are done by him, mediantibus angelis, by the mediation of angels." Josephus§ saith, "The law was given, τοῦ Θεοῦ διαλεγομένου πρὸς αὐτοὺς περὶ τῶν πρακτέων, by God declaring to them what they ought to do:" and yet he introduces Herod, proving that legates, or ambassadors, were sacred from this, that‖ "the Jews had received the choicest of their laws from God by angels," i. e. by messengers, or legates, as that name imports. Philo¶ is express, that God spake the law, δι' αὐτοῦ μόνου, οὐ προσχρησάμενος ἀλλῷ, "by himself, using no other;" but yet, saith the same Philo, he did this, κελεύσας ἠχὴν δόρατον ἐν ἀέρι δημιουργηθῆναι, "commanding an invisible sound to be formed in the air." And to whom could this command be directed, but to some of the angels then attending on him? He therefore seems only to mean, that the decalogue was administered by God himself speaking to the people, and not by Moses the mediator betwixt God and them, as the residue of his laws were. For in his book De Somniis, he observes that the holy scripture speaks of those dreams, as, θεόπεμπτοι, "sent from God, which proceed, διὰ τῶν ὑποφητῶν αὐτοῦ καὶ ὀπαδῶν ἀγγέλων, from his ministers and attendants the angels," p. 461. He adds, that these messengers are employed in bringing τὰς τοῦ πατρὸς ἐπικελεύσεις τοῖς ἐκγόνοις, "the commands of the Father to his sons:" and that this is done, because we cannot bear his immediate chastisements, nor yet his excellent benefits, p. 455, F.

As for the fathers, they seem universally to conspire in this doctrine, that the apostle speaks here, and Gal. iii. 19, περὶ τῶν διακονησαμένων τῷ λόγῳ ἀγγέλων, "of the angels ministering to the delivery of the law." So Origen;* so Chrysostom on this place; Theodoret on Gal. iii. 19, Œcumenius, and Theophylact. Origen,† speaking of Jerusalem, saith, "The angels have now deserted her, who before were always helpful to her; δι' ὧν διετάγη καὶ ὁ Μώσεως νόμος, by whom also the law of Moses was ordained;" it being, saith the apostle, "ordained by angels." The same is the opinion of Jerome on Gal. iii. 19.

And though Jehovah speaks to Moses in and from mount Sinai, and from him the Jews received the law; yet that he used the ministry of angels in the dispensing of it, is evident from many passages of the New Testament. For,

First, Stephen speaketh thus unto the Jews, "You have received the law, εἰς διαταγὰς (κατὰ διαταγὰς, Œcumenius) ἀγγέλων, by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it" (Acts vii. 53). Now when he was aggravating their guilt, in violating this law, from the consideration of the dignity of the persons who were by God employed in giving it to them, he would not have omitted the Son of God, or the Λόγος, the principal actor, and spoken of these inferior ministering spirits, could he both truly, and according to the then present notion of the Jews, have said it was the Λόγος, who by his Father was employed in giving the law. For though most of the fathers say, the Λόγος, or "the Son of God," appeared to Moses and the patriarchs, and others under the Old Testament, they‡ all agree in this, that he appeared then as ἄλλος, one that sustained another person; or, as the legate, the ambassador; or, as ὑπουργός, i. e. the minister of God the Father, as also Philo still saith.

Secondly, When the apostle Paul affirms, after Stephen, that the law was, διαταγεὶς δι' ἀγγέλων, "administered by angels" (Gal. iii. 19), he cannot reasonably be supposed to mean only, that it was delivered, inter angelos, between angels; or, by God attended with his angels. For, (1.) as by is the proper import of the word διὰ, so it is very rarely, if at all, that it is rendered, inter, between, or among: it is so rendered, indeed, by our translators, 2 Tim. ii. 2, but with the note in the margin, by, to show they thought it might there bear that sense, as it doth, thus; "The things which thou hast heard from me (and which have been confirmed), διὰ πολλῶν μαρτύρων, by many witnesses, commit to faithful men." (2.) Seeing here the word spoken, δι' ἀγγέλων, being put in opposition to the word spoken, διὰ Χριστοῦ, "by Christ," shows that διὰ retains its proper sense, and must be rendered, "by angels;" why should we put another sense on the same particle used, Gal. iii. 19, by the same apostle, with respect to the same subject?

Thirdly, That the word spoken "by angels" here, respects the law in general, and not only the threatenings made by the prophets, to whom the Λόγος sent his angels, to bring back the people of Israel from their wickedness, is also evident from these words: for (1.) "the word spoken by angels" here seems to be the same with the word "administered by angels," Acts vii. 53, Gal. iii. 19. Now that was the law, say both Stephen and Paul. (2.) It was ὁ λόγος βέβαιος, "the word made firm," by the miracles done by Moses to establish it, as was the gospel by more glorious miracles: the miracles done by Moses being only σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα, "signs and wonders:" whereas the gospel was confirmed also "by divers powers, and distributions of the Holy Ghost," ver. 4. (3.) As the apostle saith here, "Every transgression of this word received a just recompense of reward;" so he saith, x. 28, "He that despised Moses's law, died without mercy;" where the argument being in sense the same, demonstrates that "the word spoken" here must be the law of Moses. (4.) We are properly said to transgress, and disobey a law; but as for threatenings, though we may disregard, we are not properly said to transgress them. In fine, I can answer the argument of Schlictingius on the place, "That God, in person, could not give the law from mount Sinai; since, were it given by God himself, it must, on that account, be preferred before the gospel;" by saying, The comparison is here made only betwixt God speaking to the Jews by the ministry of angels, and the same God speaking to us "by his Son," which supposes God the Father to be the supreme author both of the law and the gospel; asserting only, that his ambassadors, or ministers, in the one, were much inferior to his ambassador, and his great Prophet, by whom the other was revealed: but I am not able to resist the evidence of his second argument, that "the opposition put between the word spoken by angels* to them, and the gospel delivered to us by the Son of God, will not permit us to own, that the law was given to the Jews by the same Son of God, seeing that supposition wholly destroys the force of the apostle's argument in this place." But then I do not think that any angel was so employed in the delivery of the law, as to take upon him the person of God; or, that any creature said, "I am the Lord thy God," &c. but only, that the divine Majesty, there present with his "thousands of angels" (Deut. xxxiii. 2, Ps. lxviii. 17), made some of them his ministers to form the voice, by which he said, "I am the Lord thy God," &c. And it may probably be conjectured, that wherever there is mention of an "angel" and "Jehovah" together, or any worship or excellency specified which is proper to God, there was an appearance of the Shechinah, or divine Majesty, conjunct with the angel. Dr. Lightfoot, in his note on Acts vii. 53, and in his sermon on the text, solves this objection, by saying, that by "angels" there, and here, and Gal. iii. 19, we are not to understand angels, properly so called, but God's messengers; i. e. the prophets and teachers who are styled "angels," Mal. ii. 7, iii. 1. But this seems a very forced exposition of these words: for (1.) after Stephen had said (Acts vii. 53), that the Jews had slain those prophets, which had told them of the coming of that Just One, he adds this farther aggravation of their guilt (ver. 53), that they had "received the law by the disposition of angels, and had not kept it," plainly distinguishing these angels from the prophets. Paul also saith, "The law was given by angels in (or through, or by) the hand of a mediator," that is, of their great prophet Moses, plainly again distinguishing those angels from that prophet; when therefore the same Paul saith, the law was spoken not by an angel, to wit, Moses, but by "angels," in the plural number, it is most reasonable to interpret his words to the same sense, especially considering his inference from these words (ver. 5), "For God hath not subjected to angels the world to come, of which we now speak."

[3] Ver. 3. Τηλικαύτης σωτηρίας, So great salvation.] That under the dispensation of the gospel, the deliverance of the faithful from persecutions, at or after the destruction of Jerusalem, should here be represented as that "great salvation which began to be spoken by the Lord," was testified to by the apostles, and even by God himself, by so great miracles, is incredible. No, sure, our Saviour "brought life and immortality to light by the gospel," 2 Tim. ii. 11; his apostles testified to us "eternal life," 1 John i. 2; and "this is the testimony of God" himself, "that he hath given us eternal life, and that life is in his Son," 1 John v. 11 (see note on iv. 3).

[4] Ἐβεβαιώθη εἰς ἡμᾶς, Was confirmed to us.] Jews; not to us apostles, by whom it was confirmed. Vain therefore is the argument taken from these words, to prove Paul was not the author of this epistle; because the gospel was not confirmed to him by them that heard Christ, he receiving it by immediate revelation from him (Gal. i. 12). And usual is it with Paul, in this and other epistles, to say "We;" when not he himself, but only they he speaks to, or of, must be understood. So vi. 1, "Let us go on to perfection" (see x. 25, xii. 1, Rom. iii. 5. 7, 1 Cor. x. 8, 9, 2 Cor. vii. 1, Eph. ii. 3, 1 Thess. iv. 15, Tit. iii. 3).

[5] Ver. 4. Ποικίλαις δυνάμεσι, With divers miracles.] "Because," saith Theodoret, "the law was confirmed by miracles, the apostle thought it necessary to show the gospel was in this superior to it," as it was in these two respects:

1. That the apostles and disciples of our Lord abounded in these miraculous dispensations which confirmed the gospel, as well as Christ himself.

2. That Moses chiefly wrought σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα, "signs and wonders; whereas the δυνάμεις, "powers and distributions of the Holy Ghost," here mentioned, were the proper confirmations of the gospel dispensation. For here are four things mentioned, which will admit of a distinct consideration; the first and second are, σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα, "signs and wonders," which refer to portentous actions done in the heavens, as when the sun stood still; in the earth, as when it opened to swallow up Dathan and Abiram; in the air, as when it was turned into darkness; in the waters, as when they were turned into blood: and these were often wrought by Moses and others under the Old Testament, and still are styled σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα. So Exod. vii. 2, πληθυνῶ τὰ σημεῖά μου καὶ τέρατα, "I will multiply my signs and wonders in the land of Egypt." And again, ver. 9, Deut. iv. 32, "He took his people out of that nation, ἐν σημείοις καὶ τέρασι, by signs and wonders:" showing, σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα μεγάλα, tributions) of the Holy Ghost, (performed) according to his own will?

5 [6] For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection [7] the world to come, whereof we speak (but unto

"signs and great wonders upon Pharaoh, and all his house," vi. 22, vii. 19, xi. 3, xxvi. 8, xxix. 3: "And there arose not a prophet like unto Moses, ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς σημείοις καὶ τέρασιν, in all the signs and wonders which God sent him to do in the land of Egypt," Deut. xxxiv. 11 (see Neh. ix. 10, Ps. cxxxiv. 9, Jer. xxxii. 42). Thus Nabuchodonosor declares, σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα, "the signs and wonders which the most high God had shown him," Dan. iv. 2. And Darius saith of him, vi. 27, ποιεῖ σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, "He doth signs and wonders in the heavens, and on the earth."

Moreover, σημεῖα and δυνάμεις are used in the New Testament, with relation to the miracles wrought by the apostles upon others, in casting out devils, making the blind to see, and the lame to walk, and healing all manner of diseases; now none of these things were done by Moses, and very rarely by any of the prophets. And, lastly, as for the distributions of the Holy Ghost, consisting in the internal gifts of wisdom, knowledge, faith, the gift of tongues, and the interpretation of them; these were peculiar to the latter days, that is, the times of the Messiah.

[6] Ver. 5.] For explication of these words, let it be observed,

1. That both the scriptures, the Jewish records, and the primitive fathers, do represent the state preceding our Lord's advent, and his advancement to the right hand of Majesty in the heavens, as a state subject to angels, or in which God dealt with them by the ministry of his angels; this of the Jews hath partly been confirmed already, by showing, that their law was "the word spoken by angels." That they were brought out of Egypt by the ministry of an angel, Moses himself declares, in his message to the king of Edom, "When we cried to the Lord, he heard our voice, and sent an angel, and has brought us forth out of the land of Egypt," Numb. xx. 16. This angel, saith the Targum of Jonathan, was "a ministering angel." Nor is it to be thought the king of Edom, who had no notion of the Logos, could understand him otherwise. And hence the note of Paulus Fagius runs thus: Omnis Israelitici populi salus et ductio per angelos administrata est, "The whole conduct and preservation of the people of Israel was administered by angels." That they were led through the wilderness by an angel, and that an angel drove out the inhabitants of the land of Canaan before them, we learn from these words of God himself, "Behold, I send an angel before thee, to keep thee in the way, and bring thee into the land I have prepared for thee," Exod. xxiii. 20. "He shall go," saith the Greek, ἡγούμενός σου, "as thy guide and captain." And, ver. 23, "My angel shall go before thee, and bring thee to the Amorites and Hittites, &c. and I will cut them off." Now that here he speaks of "a ministering angel," may be argued from these words, "My name is in him," that is, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan well expound the phrase, "His word is in my name;" by him I do declare my will and pleasure. So Maimon. in More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 64, "Some think this angel was the eternal Son of God; but this I am afraid to assert," saith the Bishop of Ely, "because it seems dangerous to me to call him simply an angel, i. e. a minister or messenger, without any such addition as that in Mal. iii. 3, The angel of the covenant; for so he was at his incarnation, of which he there speaks, before which I dare not ascribe to him such ministerial works as these, of bringing the children of Israel out of Egypt, and going before them to lead them in the way to Canaan: this was properly the work of an angel, to whom Moses ascribes it." But though we thus understand it, this excludes not the presence of God himself, but rather proves it; for this angel was sent from the Shechinah, or majestic presence of God which was in the cloud, and is therefore styled "the angel of his presence," Isa. lxiii. 9; because, saith the Targum, he was an angel sent מן קדמוהי, "from before him," or, "from before his face:" and thus it was true, which the Lord said to Moses, "My presence shall go with thee (Exod. xxxiii. 14) in the cloud, and my angel shall go before thee" (Exod. xxiii. 23), as being sent from before me, to conduct thee. And again, Exod. xxxiii. 2, "I will send an angel before thee, and will drive out the Canaanite, the Amorite, &c. for I will not go up in the midst of thee, for thou art a stiffnecked people, lest I consume thee in the way." He therefore who was to be sent could not be God himself, or the divine Logos equal to him, for then he would have had the same reason to consume them for their disobedience. Accordingly we find Masius on Josh. v. 13, confessing that the Jews generally thought this was the angel Michael. And partly from them, and partly from Daniel, who styles him "Michael their prince," x. 21; "And Michael the prince which standeth for the children of thy people," xii. 1, it seems to be, that many Christian fathers* and ancient commentators have so expressly said, that "God over all placed over them the angel Michael, as Daniel hath taught us; and God also promised Moses, he would send an angel with his people." And both Theodoret and Jerome, in their comments on Dan. xi. 21, say, that Michael, est archangelus cui creditus est populus Judæorum, "is that archangel to whom was committed the care of the people of the Jews." And the author of the Recognitions, speaking of God's dividing the nations to angels, adds,† that "the government of the Jews themselves, and the disposal of their affairs, were by God committed to an archangel." Certain it is from the scripture, that the law, which was the foundation of the Judaical church-state, was given by the disposition of angels, Acts vii. 53, Gal. iii. 19; whence the apostle here styles it "the law spoken by angels," ver. 2. They being therefore so far interested in the promulgation of the law, as that it was given to the Jews by their ministry (though they did this in the name and by the authority of God), the Mosaical church-state was so far put in subjection to them.

Now if this supposition be admitted, and "the world to come," according to the Jewish import of that phrase, be taken for the gospel-state, then the apostle's argument runs thus: You have greater reason to take heed to the things taught by Christ under the gospel dispensation, than had the Jews to take heed to the things taught by the Mosaical dispensation: for "unto the angels God hath not subjected the gospel-state," but unto Christ; i. e. to him who is more able to reward his obedient servants, and bring them into the celestial Canaan, and more able to consume and punish them, who do neglect the great salvation tendered in this dispensation.

As to the gentile world, the doctrine of the Jews, in relation to them, is evident from these words of the Septuagint, "When the Almighty divided the nations, he set the borders of them, κατ' ἀριθμὸν ἀγγέλων Θεοῦ, according to the number of the angels of God," Deut. xxxii. 8: "That is," saith R. Menachem, "he placed seventy angels over the seventy nations." For, saith the son of Sirach, ἑκάστῳ ἔθνει κατέστησεν ἡγούμενον, "In the division of the nations of the whole earth, he set a ruler over every people," Ecclus. xvii. 17. Accordingly in Daniel we find mention of the prince of Persia, and of Greece, i. e. of the angels which presided over those places. Eusebius‡ doth frequently inform us, that "all the nations of the earth were formerly, by lot, divided to many angels:" and this was the doctrine of Justin Martyr,§

* Καὶ γὰρ τὸν Μιχαὴλ αὐτοῖς ἐπίστησεν ὁ τῶν ὅλων Θεός, καὶ τοῦτο ἡμᾶς ὁ μακάριος ἐδίδαξε Δανιὴλ, καὶ τῷ μεγάλῳ δὲ Μωσῇ ὑπέσχετο συμπέμψειν τὸν ἄγγελον τῷ λαῷ. Theod. in Gal. iii. 19.

Christ, now crowned with honour and glory, ver. 9, to whom all power both in heaven and earth is given).

6 [8] But one in a certain place (viz. David, Ps. viii. 4) testified, saying, What is man, that thou art (so) mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou (so) visitest him?

7 Thou madest him (but) a little lower than the angels; [9] thou crownedst him with glory and honour, of Irenæus,* Athenagoras,† and the two Clements.‡ So that, in the judgment of the Jews, and of the primitive fathers, all the whole heathen world were subject to the government of angels.

And then the argument of the apostle is to this effect: That now the world of believers, gathered from the heathens, is put under Christ's immediate power, and subject not to angels, but to him who will come in flaming fire to execute vengeance upon all that obey not his gospel; and that therefore it concerns them to give more diligent heed to the words spoken by him, and not to neglect that great salvation which he tenders.

7 Οἰκουμένην τὴν μέλλουσαν, The world to come.] This I conceive imports primarily the Christian state; and in order to the government of that, the whole world subjected to Christ, from the time of his resurrection and ascension ("when he sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high," and had "all power in heaven and earth committed to him:" for when God brought him, by his resurrection, εἰς οἰκουμένην, "into the earth," he said, "Let all the angels of God worship him;" i. e. let them all bow, and be subject to his authority, i. 6), to the time when he shall abolish death, the last enemy of his subjects, and put the crown upon their heads, and condemn all his enemies to endless punishments, and so give up his mediatory kingdom to the Father (1 Cor. xv. 28). And this I gather from the following proof of this subjection of the world to Christ, taken from Ps. viii.; for the apostle plainly doth insinuate, that it is begun already, in that Jesus is already "crowned with glory and honour," ver. 9, and he as plainly testifies, that it must continue till the day of judgment, and only will be then completed, by saying that "he must reign till all his enemies be put under his feet," 1 Cor. xv. 25; and proving this, from those words of the psalmist, "For he hath put all things under his feet," ver. 27. So then the argument runs thus: How shall they escape, who neglect that great salvation, tendered by him who hath all the world, and all things in it, so subject to him, as to continue so, till he hath put all his enemies under his feet.

It may be also noted, that when this world to come doth respect only the Christian state, from the resurrection of Christ to the final judgment, then it is styled עולם הבא the age to come; which is the frequent import of the world to come, in the Jewish writers; and in this sense is Christ styled, ὁ πατὴρ μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, "the Father of the world to come," Isa. ix. 6; and the gifts vouchsafed to believers, and exercised by them in the first ages of the church, are styled, in this epistle, δυνάμεις μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, "the powers of the world to come:" but when it also doth include that earth in which they dwell, and in which they are to continue to the day of judgment, then is it styled οἰκουμένη μέλλουσα, "the world to come," after the other four kingdoms, which are styled οἰκουμένη, "the earth," and are said to "have dominion over all the earth." Thus, of the kingdom of Assyria and Babylon, Daniel saith to Nebuchadnezzar that "God had made him lord of all things," and settled his kingdom "wherever the sons of men dwell," Dan. ii. 37, 38. And this kingdom is, by Isaiah, often styled οἰκουμένη, and the fall of it is represented as "the desolation of the whole earth." Thus, in his vision against Babylon, he saith, "The Lord cometh, καταφθεῖραι πᾶσαν τὴν οἰκουμένην, to lay waste the whole earth," ver. 6; "Behold, the day of the Lord comes cruel, and with fierce anger, θεῖναι τὴν οἰκουμένην ἔρημον, to lay the land (of Babylon) desolate," xiii. 9; and, ver. 11, ἐντελοῦμαι τῇ οἰκουμένῃ ὅλῃ κακὰ, "I will pronounce evil to the whole earth" (see also xiv. 26); Cyrus the king of Persia speaks thus: "The Lord hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth," Ezra i. 2; and he is styled, τῆς οἰκουμένης ὁ Κύριος, "The Lord of the earth," Esd. ii. 3. And Artaxerxes, in his epistle for the destruction of the Jews, writes thus; "Being lord over many nations, καὶ πάσης ἐπικρατήσας οἰκουμένης, and having dominion over all the world," &c. Esth. xiii. 2. 4.

As for the third, that is, the Grecian monarchy, the prophet Daniel saith expressly of it, "It shall bear rule over all the earth," Dan. ii. 39. Accordingly, Alexander is celebrated, in all historians and poets which speak of him, as the conqueror of the world; when he came to Babylon, ambassadors were sent to him, ἐξ ἁπάσης σχεδὸν τῆς οἰκουμένης, "from almost the whole world," saith Diodorus Siculus, Hist. lib. xvii. p. 579, and when he died, this inscription was writ upon his tomb, γᾶν ὑπ' ἐμοὶ τέθειμαι, "I have put the earth under me." And, lastly, as for the Roman monarchy, as it was styled by the poets, παμβασιλεία, "the universal kingdom;" and by the historians, orbis terrarum, "the world;" so is it in the scripture represented as the government, πάσης τῆς οἰκουμένης, "of the whole earth," Luke ii. 1; for, saith Dionysius Halicarnasseus,* ἡ Ῥωμαίων πόλις ἁπάσης μὲν ἄρχει τῆς γῆς, ὅση μὴ ἀνέμβατός ἐστιν, ἀλλ' ὑπ' ἀνθρώπων κατοικεῖται, "Rome presides over the whole habitable earth." Now this kingdom of Christ being prophesied of by Daniel, as that which was to be set up "after these kingdoms" which bore that name, and to break in pieces all other kingdoms, is therefore styled ἡ οἰκουμένη μέλλουσα, "the kingdom of the world to come:" and if (as we may probably conjecture from "the angel of the prince of Persia," and "the angel of the prince of Greece," Dan. x. 13. 20) angels were by God appointed to preside over those monarchies, then hence ariseth another reason why the apostle might say, "Unto the angels hath he not subjected the world to come, of which we speak."

[8] Ver. 6, &c.] Here note, first, that though these words of the psalmist may be allowed, in their first and obvious sense, to relate to the first Adam, created after God in his similitude and likeness, with respect to his dominion; yet doth not this hinder that they be expounded in the mystical sense, of Christ the second Adam; for the Jews acknowledge that the first Adam was a type of the second Adam, that is, of Christ, who is by them styled, האדם האחרון, "the last," or "second Adam." Moreover, "the mystery of Adam is, say they, "the mystery of the Messiah;" and the man created the sixth day signifies the Messiah. For thus they speak;† "Our redemption is signified by the six days of the creation, especially by the sixth, in which man was created;" by whom we are not to understand the nations of the world, but סוד מיסיח סוד אדם הוא, "the mystery of man is the mystery of the Messiah;" as it is said, Dan. vii. 13, "He came like to the Son of man." And this lays a foundation for the inference of the apostle, that what was spoken of man in general, and more particularly related to the first Adam, was only punctually fulfilled in the second Adam taking the nature of man on him: for, saith he, we see it not in any measure fulfilled in any other man; but as for Christ, we do already see it actually fulfilled, as to the first cause of it, he being now "crowned with glory and honour;" and so, as all things are already subject to his feet, as far as the present necessities of the church require (Eph. i. 22), so will they completely and actually be so, when "death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed" (1 Cor. xv. 25—27).

and didst set him over the works of thy hands (Ps. viii.):

8 Thou hast put all things (and so the world to come) in subjection under his feet. For in (saying) that he (hath) put all (things) in subjection under him, (it is manifest that) he left nothing (besides himself, 1 Cor. xv. 27) that is not put under him. But now (as for Adam and his posterity, of whom these things were primarily spoken) we see not yet all things put under him.

9 But we see Jesus (the second Adam), who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, (already) [10] crowned with glory and honour; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man; (and therefore know that all things are, and shall be subjected to him.

10 To this Jesus, I say, who by the grace of God tasted [11] death for every man:) For it became him, for whom are (were) all things, and by whom are (were) all things (ordered), in (his design of) bringing many sons unto glory, to (effect this, by) make (ing) the captain of their salvation [12] perfect through sufferings (τελειῶσαι, to consecrate him to that work, by sufferings).

These words are wanting in Œcumenius, Theophylact, and some MSS., but they are in Chrysostom, Theodoret, and all the ancient versions.

[10] Ver. 9. Δόξῃ καὶ τιμῇ ἐστεφανωμένον, Crowned with glory and honour.] That these words are, in construction, to follow the ensuing words, that "he by the grace of God might taste death for every man," see note on vii. 20; but the apostle puts these words last, as being to discourse of our Lord's sufferings for us.

[11] Ver. 10. He, χάριτι Θεοῦ, by the grace of God tasted death.] Origen,* in his commentary upon the Gospel of St. John, twice saith, that some copies read χωρὶς Θεοῦ, "without God," so read the Syriac, and Ambrose, lib. ii. de Fide ad Gratian. cap. 4, and Vigilius Tapsensis, lib. ii. p. 17, 20. And this reading either confutes the Patropassians, or confirms the doctrine of Irenæus, that Christ suffered ἡσυχάζοντος τοῦ Λόγου, "the divine nature being quiescent," and not exerting its energy to strengthen him against, or deliver him from, these sufferings; it making its impressions upon the human nature, saith Grotius, not always, but pro temporum ratione. Note also, that to "taste death" is a Jewish phrase, signifying to die, as when they say "The first Adam was worthy not to taste of death."

Ἔπρεπε γάρ.] Conveniens hoc fuit Dei sapientiæ, saith Grotius: He thought fit to do this, saith Dr. Hammond; first, because thus the same nature suffered which had sinned, and therefore purged us from the guilt we in that nature had contracted, and so dissolved that death to which we became subject by the sin of Adam. This is the reason of Christ's sufferings, which all the primitive fathers do suggest, and on which they especially insist, assigning this reason of our Lord's death, ἵνα τὸ ὀφειλὸν ἡμῶν καθαρισθῇ, "that our obnoxiousness to death might be expiated:" so Ignatius.† He died, saith Justin Martyr,‡ for mankind, δι᾽ ἀτὸ τοῦ Ἀδὰμ ὑπὸ θάνατον, καὶ πλάνην τὴν τοῦ ὄφεως ἐπεπτώκει, "which, from Adam, became subject to death, and the deceit of the serpent." Irenæus saith,§ that "as mankind, by man overcome, was obnoxious to death, sic enim per hominem victorem ascendamus in vitam, so by a man conquering death we may rise to life:" and as death prevailed against us by man, sic iterùm nos adversùs mortem per hominem accipiamus palmam, "so we may prevail against it by man;" that as in the animal Adam we all died, so in the spiritual we might all be made alive. And Athanasius,‖ in his Oration of the Incarnation, is very copious on this subject; declaring, that Christ "took our nature on him, πάλιν τὸ φθαρτὸν εἰς ἀφθαρσίαν ἐνεγκεῖν, to reduce again our corruptible to incorruption:" that our Lord seeing mankind lost by death exercising the dominion of corruption over them, and seeing the punishment threatened to our transgression, διακρατοῦσαν τὴν καθ᾽ ἡμῶν φθορὰν,¶ "prevailing over us to corruption; and seeing the whole race of men subject to death, he, in compassion to them, καὶ τὴν θανάτου κράτησιν οὐκ ἐνέγκας, and not enduring this dominion of death, that what he created might not perish, took a body to himself, not alien from ours; and because we were all subject to corruption,†† ἀντὶ πάντων αὐτὸ θανάτῳ παραδιδοὺς, delivering it to the death for us all, he offered it to the Father, that, as it were, all men dying in him, the law of the corruption of mankind might be dissolved, and he might translate them again to incorruption: and this," saith he,* "is the first cause of his incarnation." Hence many of them say,† that "the handwriting which was blotted out by the death of Christ, was the threat made to Adam, In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt die." Here then is one reason why the death or "blood of bulls or goats could not take away sin;" viz. they did not partake of the same nature that had sinned, and therefore could not in that nature dissolve the debt we had contracted, and so translate us to incorruption. Secondly, it became him thus to suffer, because these sufferings fitted him to be a merciful high-priest to them that suffer as he did, and also to be a faithful high-priest, "to make atonement for our sins" (ver. 17). Observe here, that the apostle does not say, Christ's sufferings were absolutely necessary to satisfy divine justice; that infinite mercy could not pardon sin, without a satisfaction made to justice; and that infinite wisdom could contrive no other way for the atonement of our sins: but, that divine wisdom saw it fit that Christ should suffer for the ends forementioned. And why then may not others be permitted to think and speak with the apostle, without adding that which the apostle, in all this long and excellent discourse, concerning the ends, the reason, and necessity of our Saviour's sufferings, thought not once fit to mention?

[12] Τελειῶσαι διὰ παθημάτων, To sanctify, to consecrate and dedicate him to that work, by his sufferings.] That this is the true import of these words will appear, first, from the like words used by this apostle, v. 8—10, "Though he were a son, yet learned he obedience by the things that he suffered; and being made perfect (τελειωθεὶς), (i. e. being consecrated to his priestly office,) he became the author of eternal salvation to all that obey him, being called of him a high-priest after the order of Melchisedec." And again, vii. 27, 28, "The law maketh them high-priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which is after the law, maketh the Son so, εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τετελειωμένον, who is consecrated a high-priest for evermore." Secondly, from the collation made betwixt the call of Aaron to his priesthood, and of Christ to his: for as Aaron took not this honour to himself, but was "called of God" to it; so Christ "glorified not himself to be a high-priest," but was constituted so by him who said, "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec." Now the consecration of Aaron and the legal priests is continually expressed by this word: for what is in the Hebrew, "Thou shalt fill the hands of Aaron and his sons," and is by us translated, "Thou shalt consecrate them," is by the Septuagint thus rendered, τελειώσεις Ἀαρὼν τὰς χεῖρας αὐτοῦ ἁγιάσαι αὐτούς. So Numb. iii. 3, ἐτελείωσαν τὰς χεῖρας αὐτῶν ἱερατεύειν, "They consecrated them to the priesthood." Accordingly, the priest consecrated is, in the Greek, ὁ τετελειωμένος, Lev. xxi. 10; the day of his consecration is ἡμέρα τῆς τελειώσεως, Lev. viii. 33; the sacrifice then offered for sin is θυσία τελειώσεως· the burnt offering, ὁλοκαύτωμα τελειώσεως, ver. 28; the ram offered is κριὸς τελειώσεως, ver. 22; the flesh of consecration, τὰ κρέας τῆς τελειώσεως, Exod. xxix. 34. By these sufferings he became "a high-priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec," and "the author of salvation to all that obey him:" because appearing with this sacrifice before God in heaven for ever, "he is able to save for ever them that come unto God by him."

[13] Ver. 11. Ὁ ἁγιάζων, He that sanctifies, &c.] I have shown, note on ix. 13, that the word ἁγιάζειν, in this epistle, is used in the sacrificial sense, or with relation to the expiation of sin: in the Old Testament, when it respecteth sacrifices, it sometimes signifies to devote, consecrate, and offer them to God. So Lev. xxii. 3, "The holy things which the children of Israel hallow to the Lord," ὅσα ἂν ἁγιάσωσιν, "which they shall offer to the Lord:" for, Numb. xviii. 9, these holy things are thus enumerated; "Every heave-offering (ver. 8), every meat-offering, every sin-offering, every trespass-offering;" Deut. xv. 19, "All the firstlings of thy flock, thou shalt sanctify to the Lord thy God," ἁγιάσεις τῷ Κυρίῳ. For if they were clean, they were to be offered to God, and their blood was to be sprinkled on the altar, and their fat burnt for an offering made by fire (Numb. xviii. 19): but if they were unclean, οὐ θύσεις αὐτὸ τῷ Κυρίῳ, "Thou shalt not sacrifice them to the Lord," saith the text, Deut. xv. 21, and 1 Chron. xxiii. 13. Aaron was separated, "that he might sanctify the most holy things," τοῦ ἁγιασθῆναι, i. e. that he might offer them in sacrifice, "and to burn incense," for he was separated to execute the priesthood (Exod. xxviii. 1); and that was to be performed by offering gifts and sacrifices for sin (Heb. v. 1): and in this sense our Saviour saith, ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν ἁγιάζω ἐμαυτόν, ἵνα ὦσιν ἡγιασμένοι ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, "For their sakes I sanctify myself," i. e. I offer myself a piacular victim, that they may be sanctified in the truth (John xvii. 19); i. e. that they may be consecrated to their office, or set apart for my service: for as Aaron and his sons were hallowed, and set apart for God's service by a sacrifice, to expiate them from their sins; and this was done, ἁγιάζειν αὐτοὺς ὥστε ἱερατεύειν, "to sanctify them to the priesthood" (Exod. xxix. 1. 14. 21), as well as by the holy anointing (Exod. xxx. 30, 31, xl. 10): so Christ's apostles were sanctified, and set apart to their office, not only by the unction of the Holy Ghost, but also by that piacular victim Christ offered for their sins: and accordingly, in these words, "he that sanctifies" is Christ that offers himself, that he might sanctify, ἁγιάζειν, i. e. purge them from their sins by his own blood (Heb. xiii. 12); and "they that are sanctified," are they that by this blood are purged from their sins, and so are fitted to draw nigh to God, and made "a royal priesthood to show forth his praises, and offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God, through Jesus Christ."

Secondly, The word doth also signify, to purge, purify, and make clean, by sacrifice, both in the scripture and profane authors. Thus of the altar it is said, "He shall sprinkle the blood upon it with his fingers seven times, and he shall cleanse it, and hallow it, καθαριεῖ αὐτὸ καὶ ἁγιάσει αὐτό, from the uncleanness of the children of Israel," Lev. xvi. 19. So Exod. xxix. 33, "And they shall eat those things אשר כפר בהם, ἐν οἷς ἡγιάσθησαν ἐν αὐτοῖς, by which," or "for whom, the atonement was made, to consecrate, καὶ ἁγιάσαι αὐτούς, and to sanctify them;" and, ver. 36, "Thou shalt cleanse the altar, בכפרך עליו, ἐν τῷ ἁγιάζειν σε ἐπ' αὐτῷ, when thou hast made an atonement for it." In profane authors, to purge by sacrifices, from guilt or uncleanness, is sometimes ἁγιάζειν, sometimes καθίζειν; and the sacrifices that did this are styled, ἁγιστικά, "sacrifices of purgation." According to this sense of the word, "he that sanctifieth," is he that purgeth; and "they that are sanctified" are they who are purged from the guilt of sin.

[14] Ver. 12.] Ps. xxii. 22. This psalm being interpreted by the Jews themselves, concerning the Messiah, the apostle might well apply this passage of it to him.

[15] Ver. 13. I will put my trust in him; and again, I and the children which God hath given me.] These two citations being from the same place, Isa. viii. 17, make but one proof, that "he who sanctifies, and they who were sanctified," have the same nature; showing, that he who said, "I will put my trust in him," called them whom God had given him, his "children," or "offspring," and so declared them to be of the same nature or original with him. Now that these words were anciently adapted to Christ, we learn from the words of Simeon, who applies the words following to him, Luke ii. 4, and from the Jews, who expound the words, "He shall be a stumbling-stone, and a rock of offence," of our Saviour, Pug. Fid. par. ii. cap. 5, §. 2; to whom they are applied by Paul, Rom. ix. 33, and by Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 7. Dr. Owen here contends, that the words ἐγὼ ἔσομαι πεποιθὼς ἐν αὐτῷ, are not taken from Isa. viii. 17, where they are almost expressly fouud, but from Ps. xviii. 3, אחסה בו, ἐλπιῶ ἐπ' αὐτὸν, where they are not found; because, saith he, were both these citations taken from the same place, the apostle would not have said, καὶ πάλιν, "and again," this being an evidence that he cites another place. To which the answer is, that he doth so, citing the first words from ver. 17, and the second from ver. 18.

[16] Ver. 14. Καταργήσῃ τὸ κράτος ἔχοντα τοῦ θανάτου, That had the power of death.] That by seducing Adam to eat of the forbidden fruit, the devil, whom the Jews called Sammael, had power to accuse men, and to demand that they might die according to the threat pronounced against them, is the constant opinion of the Jews. "Our wise men say,* it is a tradition, that Satan, the adversary, the angel of death, descendeth and seduceth, ascendeth and accuseth, receives power, and takes away the soul or life." Hence they say of him, that† "he causeth death to the whole world."

Καταργεῖν τὸν διάβολον, is to frustrate and bring to nought his design of subjecting all men to the power of death, and keeping them under the dominion of it, and render it of no effect (Rom. iii. 3. 21, iv. 14, 1 Cor. i. 28, ii. 6, vi. 13, xiii. 8. 10, 11, xv. 24. 26, 2 Cor. iii. 7. 11. 13, 14, Gal. iii. 17, v. 11, 2 Thess. ii. 8). And thus Christ is said, καταργεῖν θανατόν, "to abolish death," 2 Tim. i. 10. That therefore we are still subject to death, is, say the fathers, not that we are now punished with it; but out of mercy, that sin might not be immortal in us, the time of our resurrection being that in which death shall be totally abolished (1 Cor. xv. 26).

[17] Ver. 15. Φόβῳ θανάτου, Through fear of death.] That the whole heathen world was subject to this fear, and that it was the king of terrors to them, see note on Rom. viii. 2. From this fear we are delivered at present, by our deliverance from that guilt of sin, which alone makes it truly terrible (1 Cor. xv. 55, 56), and by the promise of a glorious resurrection, when "death shall be swallowed up in victory" (ver. 54).

[18] Ver. 16. Οὐκ ἐπιλαμβάνεται.] This word, say the glossaries, signifies, manum injicere, "to lay hold upon," manû prehendere, "to hold with the hand;" so Ecclus. iv. 11, "Wisdom, ἐπιλαμβάνεται, layeth hold of them that seek her;" Susan. ver. 36. 40, "The man we could not hold, being too strong for us; ταύτης δὲ ἐπιλαμβανόμενοι, but laying hold on her, we asked her," &c. And so, in the Septuagint, it signifies almost continually; ἐπιλάβου, "Take hold of his tail," Exod. iv. 4 (see Kircher, in the words, אחז, חוק, חפש). But then, that he thus laid hold of fallen man, and of the seed of Abraham, by taking of the human nature from one derived from the stock of Abraham, that in that nature he might suffer death for the propitiation of those (οὐ ἐπιλαμβάνεται, he laid not hold of, he helped not the fallen) angels; but he took on him (Gr. he laid hold of) [19] the seed of Abraham.

17 Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto (these) his brethren, that he might be a merciful (high-priest to them, under all their sufferings,) and (a) faithful high priest (exactly performing his priestly office) in things pertaining to God, (so as) to make reconciliation [20] for the sins of the people.

sins which rendered them so obnoxious to death, is extremely evident, both from the words preceding, and from the words following: for, ver. 14, we read thus, "Because therefore the children were partakers of flesh and blood, he also did partake of the same flesh and blood, or mortal nature, that through (his) death he might destroy him that had the power of death, for (saith he) he took hold of the seed of Abraham," i. e. by partaking of the same nature with them (ver. 14). And again, he took hold on the seed of Abraham, to rescue them from that death they feared, by his own death (ver. 17), ὅθεν ὤφειλε, "wherefore he ought in all things (belonging to their nature) to be made like to his brethren," that, as their high-priest, he might make an atonement for the sins of the people, by his sacrifice made on the cross; ἐν ᾧ γὰρ πέπονθεν, "for in that he suffered," &c. (ver. 18).

[19] The seed of Abraham.] The note of the best commentators here is this, that the apostle, writing to the Jews, thought it sufficient to mention only the mercies designed by the Messiah for the Jews. And true it is, that they confined the seed of Abraham to themselves; but the apostle reckons all believers as the seed of Abraham, Rom. iv. 12. 16, 17, Gal. iii. 14. 29, though Christ is here said to have taken upon him the seed of Abraham, because he derived his flesh from his posterity.

[20] Ver. 17. Εἰς τὸ ἱλάσκεσθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας τοῦ λαοῦ, To make atonement for the sins of the people.] i. e. Ἱλάσκεσθαι τὸν Θεὸν περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, "to make atonement to God for their sins." So in Porphyry,* ἀπομειλίσσειν τὰς τῶν πολλῶν ἁμαρτίας, "to propitiate for the sins of many," is, in the same place ἀπομειλίσσειν τὸ Θεῖον, "to propitiate the Deity" for them. This sense the words require: for Christ is here said to "be a faithful high-priest, τὰ πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν εἰς τὸ ἱλάσκεσθαι, in things pertaining to God, that he might make atonement," surely, to him. This reconciliation, therefore, must respect God. Again, this phrase, when it respects the Jewish sacrifices, hath still relation to the guilt of sin to be expiated and taken away by them; and every sin-offering offered by the priest, is said to be offered by him, ἱλάσκεσθαι περὶ ἁμαρτίας αὐτῶν, "to make atonement for their sins" (Lev. iv. 35, v. 6. 10, xiii. 44, Ezek. xliv. 27). And of the piacular victim it is still said, καὶ ἐξιλάσεται περὶ αὐτῶν ὁ ἱερεύς, καὶ ἀφεθήσεται αὐτοῖς ἡ ἁμαρτία, "The priest shall make atonement for them, and the sin shall be forgiven" (Lev. iv. 20. 31, v. 6. 10, 13. 18, xii. 7, 8, xiv. 18, 19. 29. 31, xv. 30, xix. 22, Numb. vi. 11. 15. 28). The apostle, therefore, here speaking to the Jews, in the phrase always used by them, of such sacrifices as suffered in their stead, to expiate the guilt of their sin, must be supposed to teach them that the like was done for them by our Saviour's sacrifice.

* De Abstinentiâ, &c. lib. iv. §. 5, p. 148.

[21] Ver. 18. Πειρασθείς, Being tempted:] i. e. Exposed to agonies and sufferings; for πειρασθῆναι, in the epistles, signifies to be exposed to such afflictions, as subject us to great temptations to desist from our duty and obedience; as when the apostle saith, "No temptation hath befallen you, but what is ἀνθρώπινος, supportable by man; for the Lord is faithful, who will not suffer you, πειρασθῆναι, to be tempted above what you are able (or, exposed to sufferings beyond your strength), but will, with the temptation, make a way (so far) to escape, that you may be able to bear it" (1 Cor. x. 13). So the apostle, finding his Thessalonians, ἐν ταῖς θλίψεσι, in great afflictions from their persecutors, sends to know their faith, μήπως ἐπείρασεν ὑμᾶς ὁ πειράζων, "lest the tempter might have prevailed on them," by reason of these tribulations, to desert it (1 Thess. iii. 5); Rev. ii. 10, "Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: Behold, Satan shall cast some of you into prison, ἵνα πειρασθῆτε, that you may be tempted," i. e. be tried by temptations (see James i. 2. 12, 1 Pet. i. 6, 2 Pet. ii. 9, Rev. iii. 10). So here, our Saviour, tried by these agonies, which he suffered in the hour of darkness, when the tempter fell upon him with all his fury, is become experimentally able to succour us under those sufferings which render obedience so hard to flesh and blood.

[22] Δύναται, He is able.] He hath δύναμιν συμπαθητικήν, a power joined with a sympathy towards us, and a propensity to succour us. So Rom. xi. 23, "They shall be grafted in, δυνατὸς γάρ ἐστιν ὁ Θεός, for God is able:" and, xiv. 4, "The weak shall stand, δυνατὸς γάρ, for God is able to make him stand." Thus to encourage us to charity, the apostle saith, δυνατὸς ὁ Θεός, "God is able to make all grace abound towards us" (2 Cor. ix. 8); "I know whom I have believed, and I am persuaded ὅτι δυνατός ἐστι, that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him to that day" (2 Tim. i. 12).

CHAPTER III.

1 Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling (i. e. the calling to celestial blessings), consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus (who, as our apostle, taught these things; and, as our high-priest, suffered, to obtain these blessings for us, and confirm them to us);

2 [1] Who was faithful to [2] him that appointed him (to be an apostle and high-priest), as also (it is said of) Moses (that he) was faithful in all his house (i. e. in all the house of God, Numb. xii. 7).

3 For this man (this Jesus) was counted worthy of (or, dignified with) more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he [3] who hath builded (Gr. ὁ κατασκευάσας, who orders, or governs) the house hath more honour than the house (of which Moses only was a part).

4 For every house is builded (κατασκευάζεται, or-

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 2. Πιστὸν ὄντα, Who was faithful, &c.] i. e. As Moses faithfully discharged all that the Lord commanded him to say or do for the church of Israel; so Christ was faithful in the discharge of his prophetic office, doing and speaking as the Father had given commandment, John xii. 49, 50, xiv. 10, and in his priestly office, in laying down his life for the sheep, according to the commandment he had received from the Father, John x. 18, and doing all things requisite to make atonement for the sins of the people, ii. 17. I know, indeed, the critics say, נאמן and πιστὸς signify one established in his office; as in those words, πιστὸς Σαμουὴλ εἰς προφήτην τῷ Κυρίῳ, "Samuel was established a prophet to the Lord:" but this criticism is here needless; and the word πιστὸς, ii. 17, bearing not this sense, I choose rather to follow the ordinary import of the word.

[2] Τῷ ποιήσαντι αὐτὸν, To him that appointed him.] So the word signifies, 1 Sam. xii. 6, "God is witness, ὁ ποιήσας, who appointed," or chose Moses and Aaron (see ver. 8).

[3] Ver. 3. Ὁ κατασκευάσας] Is he that orders, and governs, and provides, or prepares all things. So Phavorinus, κατασκευάζω, καταρτύομαι, ἐξαρτύομαι, ordino, guberno, moderor. And thus, τὴν πολιτείαν καὶ πόλεις κατασκευασθῆναι, in Plato, dered and governed) by some man; but [4] he that built (ὁ κατασκευάσας, that orders and governs) all things is God.

5 And Moses verily was faithful in (the administration of) all (things in) his house, (but this he was only) [5] as a servant, for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after (by God to them);

6 But Christ as a son (is placed) over his own house (i. e. he enters upon the government of it, as an heir and successor to the rights of his Father; the Father now judging no man, but having committed all judgment to his Son, John v. 22); whose house are we (Christians, and shall continue to be), if we hold fast the [6] confidence and [7] the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.

7 Wherefore (as the [8] Holy Ghost saith (by David, Ps. xcv. 8), [9] To day if ye will hear his voice,

8 Harden not your hearts, as (your forefathers did) in the (time of) provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness: (hence learn, that it was in their power to prevent the hardness of their hearts:)

9 [10] When (where) your fathers [11] tempted me (i. e. doubted of my presence with them, saying, Is the Lord among us, or not? Exod. xvii. 7, Numb. xiv. 11. 21), [12] proved me, and saw my works [13] forty years.

epist. 11, is to "have cities and polities well ordered." So Wisd. ix. 2, "Thou in thy wisdom, κατασκευάσας ἄνθρωπον, hast ordered man to have dominion over thy creatures." Thus Philo, de Cherub. p. 100, saith, "God is the cause of the world, δι' οὗ γέγονεν, by which it was made, and the Λόγος δι' οὗ κατεσκευάσθη, Logos, the cause by which it was ordered," or put into that frame and order in which it is. The words preceding, ἠξίωται, "he was dignified with more honour," seem plainly to refer to Christ's regal office, by which all power in heaven and earth was given to him, and he was made "head over all things for his church," which is his body, and in which he dwells, as in his house (Eph. ii. 21, 22). And this to me seems to establish this sense of the word.

[4] Ver. 4. Ὁ δὲ κατασκευάσας τὰ πάντα ὁ Θεός, He that built all things is God.] The apostle, say the Socinians on the place, proves Christum tanto præstantiorem esse Mose, quanto Deus præstantior est suo populo, qui Dei domus est; idque meritò; "that Christ is as much more excellent than Moses, as God is more excellent than his own people; and this he had just cause to say." And if so, Christ must be properly and truly God; for nothing else can so far excel Moses, the chiefest of that people, as God himself excels them. By this interpretation therefore they do not avoid, but confirm the argument for our Saviour's Deity, from this text. The argument seems plainly to run thus,—He that governs all things is God; but Christ, as pater-familias, father of his family, governs all things in his house, that is, the church dispersed throughout all the world; and hath, in order thereunto, all judgment, and all power in heaven and earth, committed to him: he therefore must be God; that is, the exercise of his kingly office shows, that he must be God as well as man. Thus Philo (de Victim. Offer. p. 661, C), often saith of that power, καθ' ἣν ἀνῆπται τῶν ὅλων τὸ κράτος, "to which the government of all things is committed," that οὐκ ἀνθρώπων μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ θεῶν ἐστι Θεός, μέγας τέ ἐστιν, ὄντως καὶ ἰσχυρός, καὶ κραταιός, "he is a God not only of men, but angels, a great being, who truly doth exist, both strong and mighty."

[5] Ver. 5. Ὡς θεράπων, As a servant.] The government of Israel was a theocracy, where God gave all the laws and precepts; and Moses, only as his servant and minister, told them what things God thought fit to command them: but the government of the Christian church is entirely committed to our Lord Jesus, and he, as supreme head, and Lord of all things, governs both it, and all things in earth and heaven for the good of it; and therefore, if he be not truly God, God doth not now govern the world as formerly, but hath given up the administration of it to a creature.

Whose house we are;] Christ living in our hearts by faith, Gal. ii. 20, Eph. iii. 17; abiding in us by his Spirit, John xiv. 23, Rom. viii. 9—11; and dwelling in our bodies, and in the body of the church, as in his temple, 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17, vi. 17, 2 Cor. vi. 15, 16, Eph. ii. 20—22, iv. 16.

[6] Ver. 6. Παῤῥησίαν, The confidence.] Or, the free profession of the faith: for παῤῥησία is a liberty of freedom of speaking; as when it is said of Christ, that he spake, ἐν παῤῥησίᾳ, "freely," Mark viii. 32, John vii. 13. 18. 20, and of his apostles, that they spake, μετὰ παῤῥησίας, "with all freedom and courage," Acts ii. 29, iv. 13. 29. 31, xxviii. 31, 2 Cor. iii. 12, vii. 14, Eph. vi. 19, Phil. i. 20, 1 Tim. iii. 13, Heb. iv. 6. So Phavorinus, παῤῥησιάζομαι, ἐλευθεροστομῶ.

[7] Καύχημα τῆς ἐλπίδος, The rejoicing of hope.] i. e. The hope which causes us to rejoice, in expectation of the glory of God, Rom. v. 2, 2 Cor. i. 14, Gal. vi. 4, "If we hold this firm unto the end;" which supposes that they who were partakers of this heavenly calling, and had at present this cause of rejoicing, might not "hold it firm unto the end," but might fall off from it, ver. 14, might "depart from the living God," ver. 11, iv. 11. Yea, the apostle, in this epistle, plainly doth suppose, that they who had "tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, &c. might fall away," vi. 4—6; that "the just who live by faith," might "draw back into perdition," x. 38, 39; that they might "fall from the grace of God," xii. 15. See the reading of the text justified, Examen Millii hic.

[8] Ver. 7. Τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, The Holy Ghost saith.] Hence it appears, that David writ his psalms by the afflatus or inspiration of the Holy Ghost (see note on Matt. xxiii. 43).

[9] Σήμερον, To-day.] At present; for "now is the day of salvation," 2 Cor. vi. 2; the present time being only ours. "We must do God's commandments to-day," say the Jews, from Deut. vii. 11, "and receive the reward to-morrow. We must repent to-day, lest we die to-morrow, before we have repented" (see Cartw. in locum). And again, "If Israel would repent but one day, the Messiah would come;" and this they prove from these words of the psalmist, אם תשמעו בקלו, "When you hear his voice," speaking in the prophets; or, as the Targum, אם במימרי, "When you hear him speaking by the Word," proceeding from the Father, "harden not your hearts." That this is the frequent sense of the particle אם, see Noldius, p. 89, §. 31; and it is also the sense of the Greek ἐὰν. So ἐὰν εἴπῃ, "When he said thus," Gen. xiii. 8; ἐὰν ἐξελθῶσιν, "When the daughters of Shiloh come forth," Jud. xxi. 21; ἐὰν κοιμηθῶ, "When I lie down," 1 Sam. xi. 12; ἐὰν πληρωθῶσι, "When thy days be fulfilled," 1 Kings xiii. 31; ἐὰν ἀποθάνω, "When I die," Job vii. 4; ἐὰν κάθῃ, "When thou sittest;" ἐὰν καθεύδῃς, "When thou liest down," Prov. iii. 24, 25; ἐὰν πορεύῃ, "When thou goest;" ἐὰν τρέχῃς, "When thou runnest," Prov. iv. 12. See also in the New Testament, ἐὰν ὑψωθῶ, "When I shall be lifted up," John xii. 32; ἐὰν πορευθῶ, "When I shall go," John xiv. 3, xvi. 7; ἐὰν φανερωθῇ, "When he shall appear," 1 John iii. 2. These words are therefore to be extended to the whole time of their hearing God speaking to them by his prophets, and especially to the time of God's speaking to them by his Son, who was to bring them into a better rest than that of Canaan, into which Joshua led them.

[10] Ver. 9. When,] Οὗ, "where." So the Hebrew אשר is rendered, Numb. xxii. 26, Deut. viii. 15, Ps. lxxxiv. 3, Eccles. viii. 10. So Numb. xx. 13, "These are the waters of contention, מריבה אשר, where the children of Israel contended."

[11] Ἐπείρασάν με, Tempted me.] That to tempt God, in the scripture phrase, is always to distrust his power or goodness, after sufficient demonstrations given of it, see note on Matt. iv. 7. And note here, that the apostle saith, they tempted Christ (1 Cor. x. 9), which shows, that these words may truly be applied to him.

[12] Ἐδοκίμασαν, Proved me.] The Hebrew word, which is here rendered "proved me," is, Mal. iii. 16, rendered by the Greek ἀντέστησαν, "they resisted" God; and by the Chaldee, the Syriac, and by our version, they who "tempted" God; that is, saith Dr. Pocock, who went about to try and prove him, whether he could or would punish sinners, and to provoke and dare him to do his worst to execute his judgments, if he were a God of judgment: and then to "see his works forty years," must be, to see his judgments executed upon them forty years.

[13] Τεσσεράκοντα ἔτη, Forty years.] If this be the right

10 Wherefore I was grieved with that generation, and said, They do alway err in their heart (not with the heart believing, ver. 11); and they have not known my ways (i. e. not hearkened to me, to walk in them, ver. 22).

11 So I sware in my wrath (ver. 21), [14] They shall not enter (Gr. If they shall enter) into my rest) (i. e. into the land where they were to rest from their wars).

12 Take heed (therefore), brethren, lest there be in any of you (as there was in them) an evil heart of unbelief, [15] in departing from the [16] living God.

13 But exhort one another (to steadfastness in the faith) daily, while it is called To day (before the night cometh upon you, John xii. 35); [17] lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin.

14 For we are made partakers of (the blessings purchased by) Christ, if we hold the [18] beginning of our confidence stedfast unto the end;

15 While it is said, (Gr. Ἐν τῷ λέγεσθαι, In that it is said,) To day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation. (You may discern the mischief of unbelief, and hardness of heart, and the necessity of the exhortation tendered, ver. 12, 13.)

16 For [19] some, when they had heard, did provoke: howbeit not all that came out of Egypt (not Caleb and Joshua) by Moses.

17 But (and) with whom was he grieved forty years? was it not with them that had sinned (by unbelief), whose carcases fell in the wilderness?

18 And to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not?

19 [20] So we see (Καὶ βλέπομεν, We see therefore) that they could not enter in because of unbelief.

connexion of the words, then, to see God's works forty years, must be, to see his punishments so long upon them, as he plainly threatened they should, saying, "You shall bear your iniquities forty years," Numb. xiv. 33, and that so visibly, that all the nations should discern his judgments on them: for, "Surely as I live," saith he, "all the earth shall be filled with the glory of God," ver. 21. But if, according to the reading of the Hebrew and the Septuagint, the forty years should be added to the following verse, thus, "Wherefore I was angry with that generation forty years," as the apostle doth intimate by that inquiry, ver. 17, "With whom was he angry forty years?" then the ראו גם, and, καὶ εἶδον, will be best rendered, "though they saw my work," as גם signifies, Noldius, p. 220, and καὶ, Luke xviii. 7, John xvi. 32, Acts vii. 5. According as God speaks to them, Numb. xiv. 22, "For all these men which have seen my glory, and my signs which I did in Egypt and the wilderness, and yet have tempted me these ten times, and have not hearkened to my voice, surely they shall not see the land." And ver. 11, "How long will it be ere they believe me, after all the signs," &c.

[14] Ver. 11. אם יבאון, Εἰ εἰσελεύσονται, If they shall enter.] i. e. Let me not be God, or, Let me not be true, if they enter. This is a form of swearing very frequent in the Old Testament. So Deut. i. 35, "The Lord was wroth, and swore, saying, εἰ ὄψεται, אם יראה, If any of these men shall see that good land of promise" (Ps. xcv. 11): so 1 Sam. iii. 14, אם יתכפר, εἰ ἐξιλασθήσεται, "If the iniquity of the house of Eli shall be purged with sacrifices;" Ps. lxxxix. 35, "Once have I sworn by my holiness, אם אכזב, εἰ ψεύσομαι, if I fail David;" Ps. cxxxii. 1—4, "Lord, remember David, how he sware; אם אבא, εἰ εἰσελεύσομαι, If I go into my tabernacle; אם אעלה, εἰ ἀναβήσομαι, If I climb up into my bed; אם אתן, εἰ δώσω, if I give sleep to my eyes." So Mark viii. 12, "Verily, I say unto you, εἰ δοθήσεται τῇ γενεᾷ ταύτῃ σημεῖον (Let me not be true), if a sign be given to this generation;" where Christ himself swears, and therefore cannot be supposed absolutely to forbid all swearing, Matt. v. 34.

[15] Ver. 12. Ἐν τῷ ἀποστῆναι, In departing.] The Jews that tempted God, Numb. xiv., are said, ἀποστῆναι, "to depart" from the land of Canaan, ver. 31, "They said one to another, Come, let us make a captain, καὶ ἀποστρέψωμεν, and let us turn back into Egypt," ver. 4; and are said, οὐ πιστεύειν, "not to believe" God, ver. 11.

[16] The living God:] So styled, to show that he is always able to punish unbelievers. Note also, that as he who believeth in Christ, believeth in God the Father also (John xii. 44); so he that deserts him, doth also desert the Father, who sent him, and makes him a liar (1 John v. 9, 10): "for he that denies the Son hath not the Father" (1 John iii. 23).

[17] Ver. 13. Ἵνα μὴ σκληρυνθῇ τις, Lest any man be hardened.] To be hardened, in the New Testament, imports infidelity, and want of faith. Thus Christ upbraids to his disciples their unbelief, καὶ σκληροκαρδίαν, "and hardness of heart," that they believed not, Mark xvi. 14. And the Jews that believed not are said to be "hardened," Acts xix. 9, and so it will be evident that here it signifies, to him that compares ver. 15 with ver. 19.

[18] Ver. 14. Τὴν ἀρχὴν ὑποστάσεως, The beginning of their hope.] That hope to which we have "fled for refuge," vi. 18; that hope which causeth us to rejoice, ver. 6; faith being, ἐλπιζομένων ὑπόστασις, "the firm expectation of things hoped for," ch. xi. (see the note there).

[19] Ver. 16. Τινὲς γὰρ ἀκούσαντες παρεπίκραναν; ἀλλ' οὐ πάντες, &c.] I would render these words thus; "For who are they, that, hearing, did provoke? Were they not all that came forth out of Egypt?" For τινὲς signifies as well who as some. So Acts xix. 15, τίνες ἐστέ; "Who are ye?" Rev. vii. 13, τίνες εἰσί; "Who are they that are clothed with white robes?" Isa. lx. 8, τίνες οἵδε; "Who are these?" So Heb. i. 5, τίνι γάρ; "For to whom of the angels said he?" And here ver. 18, τίνι δέ; "To whom did he swear?" So Josephus, ch. xvii. of his Maccabees, τίνες οὐκ ἐθαύμασαν τοὺς τῆς θείας νομοθεσίας ἀθλητάς; τίνες οὐκ ἐξεπλάγησαν; "Who did not admire? Who were not astonished at the champions of the divine law?" And the answer to this inquiry must be this, "Were they a few? Yea, were they not all?" &c. as if it had been οὐχὶ πάντες; It is also evident, that οὐ and οὐκ are often interrogatives, as 1 Cor. xii. 15, John vii. 42, see Noldius, p. 487. And if the Greek will bear this construction it answers best, (1.) to the story, as it is represented, Numb. xiv.: for, notwithstanding the exception made, ver. 38, of Joshua and Caleb, it is said, ver. 19, that πᾶσα ἡ συναγωγὴ, "all the congregation, καὶ πάντες, and all the children of Israel murmured against Moses and Aaron;" that πᾶσα ἡ συναγωγὴ, "all the congregation spake of stoning Joshua and Caleb," ver. 10; and πάντες οἱ ἄνδρες, "all men," ver. 22, are the οἱ παροξύναντες, "provokers," ver. 23, the συναγωγὴ πονηρὰ, "evil congregation," and "the murmurers," ver. 27. 35. Josh. v. 6. And (2.) it agrees best with the following verses, which are plainly interrogatives and answers, "With whom was he grieved? was it not with them? To whom sware he? was it not to them that believed not?" And, lastly, with the close of the argument, which saith generally, "They could not enter in."

[20] Ver. 19.] Καὶ here signifies idcirco, therefore; as the Hebrew ו often does (see Noldius, p. 279): so Josh xxiii. 11, καὶ φυλάξεσθε, "Take good heed therefore;" Ps. ii. 10, καὶ νῦν σύνετε, "Be wise now therefore" (see Ps. vii. 7. xviii. 42).

CHAPTER IV.

1 Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest (in the celestial Canaan, as to them in the terrestrial), any of you should [1] seem to come short of it (i. e. should fail of it).

2 For unto us was (Gr. is) the gospel preached, [2] as well as (Gr. as it was also) unto them, (they being οἱ πρότερον εὐαγγελισθέντες, the first to whom it was preached, or formerly evangelized, ver. 6:) but the word preached (Gr. heard) did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it. (That is, we have now the glad tidings, and gospel-promise of a future rest; as they also had in types: their rest in Canaan being a type of their future rest with God in the heavenly Canaan.)

3 For we which have believed do enter into rest, as (may be gathered from what) he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter [3] into my rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world. (Gr. καίτοι τῶν ἔργων ἀπὸ καταβολῆς τοῦ κόσμου γενηθέντων, and indeed, or for, see Budæus and Stephanus: this phrase, my rest, relates to the works done by God from the foundation of the world. This sense seems certain from the reasons following.)

4 For he (Moses) spake in a certain place (Gen. ii. 1) of the seventh day (from the beginning of God's work of creation, saying) on this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all his works.

5 And in this place (he, i. e. God saith) again (long after), If they shall enter into my rest (i. e. If they shall have a rest from their labours and travels, resembling that of mine from the creation of the world, see ver. 10).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. Δοκῇ τις ὑστερηκέναι, Should seem to come short.] That the word ὑστερηκέναι, signifies to fail of, or fall from, any thing, see note on xii. 13; and that δοκέω is oft an expletive, all critics do acknowledge: so, μὴ δόξητε λέγειν, "Say not," Matt. iii. 9; οἱ δοκοῦντες ἄρχειν, "They who rule," Mark x. 42; ὃ δοκεῖ ἔχειν, "That which he hath," Luke viii. 18, Matt. xxv. 29; ὁ δοκῶν ἑστάναι, "He that standeth," 1 Cor. x. 12 (see the note on 1 Cor. vii. 40).

[2] Ver. 2. Καθάπερ κἀκεῖνοι, As well as they.] This, by some is referred to their hearing of the law, as in the paraphrase; by others, as probably, to the gospel blessings then typified to them: for the apostle informs us, that "they all did eat the same spiritual meat, and drank the same spiritual drink; for they drank of the rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ" (1 Cor. x. 3, 4). This sounds flat to them only who are averse to this doctrine, that the blessings of the gospel were typified to the Jews; but is confirmed from ver. 6.

[3] Ver. 3. Εἰς τὴν κατάπαυσίν μου, Into my rest.] Upon the true interpretation of these words here, and ver. 1, καπάπαυσιν αὐτοῦ, depends the true sense of this chapter. Now some refer this to that deliverance from their persecutors, and the peaceable days of professing the gospel, the Christians in Judea and elsewhere should enjoy after the destruction of Jerusalem: but to this I can by no means assent; for (1.) the bearing of the cross, the suffering persecution, being so often hinted as the portion of "all that will live godly," I cannot believe that a promise of deliverance from them should be so often represented by the Holy Ghost, as the great gospel blessing promised to believers, the εὐαγγελία, the evangelical promise made to Christians by God, that they should enter into his rest, ver. 1, the "sabbatism remaining for the people of God," ver. 9, the rest which they should "strive to enter into," ver. 11, and "be afraid lest they should fail of," ver. 1. (2.) I know of no such happy change of the affairs of Christians in all other parts of the world, that the apostle should here, and almost in all his other epistles, speak of it, as this interpretation maketh him to do, as one of the greatest blessings of Christianity; nor were there any such halcyon days enjoyed by Christians after the desolation of Jerusalem. This will be evident from Christ's message to the Asiatic churches, after the times of Domitian; for there he speaks to the angel of the church of Smyrna, "Fear none of those things which thou art about to suffer: behold, Satan is about to cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried ten days. Be thou faithful to the death, and I will give thee a crown of life," Rev. ii. 10. To the church of Pergamos thus: "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, where is the throne of Satan; and thou holdest my name, and hast not denied the faith in the days in which Antipas my faithful martyr suffered, who was slain among you where Satan dwells," ver. 13. To the church of Philadelphia thus: "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I will also keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth," iii. 10. This argument a reverend person endeavours to evade, by saying, that John writ his Revelation in the ninth year of Claudius. But, first, this is contrary to the testimony of all antiquity, excepting only the single testimony of Epiphanius; which also is fully answered by Dr. More; for it is generally agreed, that he writ his Revelation in, or after he came from the isle of Patmos, as may be proved from i. 9—11. Now all the ancients say, that John was banished thither by Domitian; and writ his Revelation about that time. So Irenæus* speaks expressly, saying, "If the name of antichrist had been to be divulged, it would have been mentioned by him who saw the revelation; for it was not seen long ago, but almost in our age, at the end of the reign of Domitian:" which passage cannot be understood of the name only of the beast, but of the whole revelation; as is evident, (1.) because Eusebius, who cites this passage, must understand him so: for he saith, that "he returned from his exile in this island, μετὰ τὴν Δομιτιανοῦ τελευτήν (ch. xxiii.), after the death of Domitian;" and so he must have writ his Revelation while he lived. And (2.) because "the name of the beast" is not said to be revealed to the evangelist, but only "the number of his name." And (3.) the words καὶ τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν ἑωρακότος even force this sense; for they are properly rendered "who saw also the revelation," distinguishing the revelation from the name. And, lastly, a name cannot properly be said to be seen, nor doth John ever use any such expression about it; but a revelation may be properly said to be seen, and John often saith he saw them. Again, in this persecution of Domitian, saith Eusebius,† κατέχει λόγος, "the tradition runs, that John the evangelist was banished to the isle of Patmos, for the testimony he gave to the divine Word." And in his Chronicon‡ he adds, that under him the apostle John, "being banished into the isle of Patmos, ἔνθα τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν ἑώρακεν, ὡς δηλοῖ Εἰρηναῖος, there saw his revelation, as Irenæus testifies;" which both confirms the tradition, and gives the true sense of the words of Irenæus, cited by him. So also Jerome§ saith, that "John being banished into the isle of Patmos, in the fourteenth year of Domitian, scripsit Apocalypsin, composed the book of the Revelation." So almost all the Greek and Latin writers, saith Huet. in Orig. Com. p. 72. Vid. Oros. lib. vii. cap. 10, 11. Martyr. Timoth. apud Phot. Cod. 254, p. 1403. lib. i. Aret. in Apoc. i. 9. Secondly, it is certain, from the second text here cited, that Antipas had suffered martyrdom before the writing of these epistles to the churches. Now that Antipas suffered martyrdom under Domitian, the old

6 Seeing therefore it remaineth that some must enter therein (to the rest of God spoken of in these words), and they to whom it was first preached (οἱ πρότερον εὐαγγελισθέντες, they who had the gospel first preached to them, concerning the rest of God,) entered not in (to it) because of unbelief:

7 [4] Again, he (God) limiteth a certain day, saying in (these words of) David, To day, after so long a time (of their continuance in the rest of Canaan); as it is (there) said, To day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, (speaking not of the rest of Canaan, of which they were possessed in the days of Joshua, as he saith to the Reubenites and Gadites: And now the Lord hath given rest unto your brethren, as he promised them, Josh. xxii. 4.)

8 [5] For if Jesus (i. e. Joshua) had given them (a)

Roman martyrology assures us, and Dr. Hammond on the place confesses; it is therefore evident, that John, speaking of this martyrdom, which happened in the days of Domitian, as a thing past, must write the Revelation in or after the reign of Domitian. This the doctor saw, and therefore interprets these words, "Thou hast not denied my faith, καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις, even in those days (of fiery trial) in which Antipas, ἀπεκτάνθη, was or hath been slain:" thus, "The time is approaching wherein Antipas I foresee will be cruelly martyred;" that is, if this was written in the ninth of Claudius, and Antipas slain the tenth of Domitian, I foresee he will be slain forty years hence; which descant, to speak in his own words, "is too vain to be seriously considered." Lastly, the Christians had no such halcyon days for any considerable time after the destruction of Jerusalem; for Jerusalem was destroyed anno Christi 70; and the second persecution began under Domitian, anno Domini 96. They had therefore only rest for twenty years, and then comes the second persecution, in which many Christians* were exiled, and some suffered martyrdom; for "even heathen writers," saith Eusebius,† "mention τὸν διωγμὸν καὶ τὰ ἐν αὐτῷ μαρτύρια, the persecutions and the martyrdoms of our men." And in his Chronicon he saith, that "Brutus, in his history, affirms, that πολλοὶ Χριστιανῶν ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ Δομετιανόν, many Christians suffered martyrdom under Domitian." Ten years after the end of this persecution, comes on a third persecution under Trajan, in which, saith Eusebius,‡ "so great and heavy was the persecution, in most places, that Pliny, one of the celebrated presidents of the provinces, being moved with the multitude of the martyrs, writ to the emperor concerning the multitude of the martyrs that had suffered; and received this answer from him, That they should not be inquired after, but only punished as they fell into their hands." And that§ though hereupon the open persecutions ceased, yet in divers provinces they continued, and exercised many of the Christians with divers kinds of martyrdom."

In the seventeenth year of Trajan, the Jews in Mesopotamia rebel, and many myriads of them perish. In the second of Hadrian they rebel again, and overcome. In the seventeenth of Hadrian, Barchochebas set himself up for their Messiah, "and drew an infinite multitude of Jews after him." Now all these, and especially the last, were severe persecutors of the Christians of those places. For Justin Martyr‖ oft informs us, that "even after the destruction of Jerusalem, they retained still the same hatred to the Christians, and cut them off wherever they had power and opportunity;" and in the days of Barchochebas "put those Christians to exquisite torments, who would not deny Christ." And could these be the times of quiet and safety to the Christians, from their persecutors? and of prosperous and peaceable days for the public worship and service of God?

Is this the ἐπαγγελία, "gospel-promise of a rest and sabbatism to the people of God?" the reward, which it is just with God to render them for all their sufferings for his sake? (2 Thess. i. 7; see Dr Hammond on that place.)

To come then to the true import of this phrase, let it be noted, that there is a double rest mentioned in this and the former chapters; viz.

1. The rest promised to the Jews in the land of Canaan, iii. 11. And this, saith the apostle, could not be the rest of God; for "if Joshua had given them (such) rest, David could not have spoken of another day," ver. 8. Why not? saith Mr. Clerc. Answer, Because then, by entering into that, they would have already entered into the rest of God.

2. A rest, after the example of God, "ceasing from his labours," when he had finished the creation, which is the rest of the blessed that die in the Lord, ἵνα ἀναπαύσωνται ἐκ τῶν κόπων αὐτῶν, "that they may rest from their labours," Rev. xiv. 13. And that this is the rest which the apostle now begins to speak of, is evident from these words, ver. 10, "He that is entered into rest, he hath also ceased from his own works, as God did from his;" for what can we understand by resting from his own works, but as the fathers* do interpret it, τῶν διωγμῶν, τῶν πειρασμῶν, τῶν θλιψέων, "from his persecutions, temptations, and afflictions," to which he is obnoxious in this present world? The phrase seems plainly to be taken from Isa. lvii. 1; where it is said of the "righteous taken away from the evil to come, They shall enter into peace, they shall rest in their beds." Of this rest, that of Canaan, and the sabbatism there observed, were a type, as the Jews themselves inform us; and therefore it seems reasonable to interpret these words agreeably to that sense.

[4] Ver. 7.] Here Mr. Clerc speaks thus; "I say again, There is no mention in the psalmist of any future rest:" which, if true, there is no sense in the apostle's words, nor any strength in his argument, for it doth evidently run thus, There must be a rest to the people of God, besides, i. e. succeeding, that which Joshua procured them in the land of Canaan; because the psalmist, so long after their rest in Canaan, makes mention of a future rest: so the apostle. "There is no mention in the psalmist of a future rest," saith Mr. Le Clerc. He had spoken in one place of "the rest of God," saith the apostle, ver. 4. And he speaks again, ἐν τούτῳ, "in this place" of the psalmist, of this rest, ver. 5, into which unbelievers not entering, in this passage of David, he again, τίνα ὁρίζει ἡμέραν, "sets or defines a certain day," by saying to them, who lived so long after these unbelievers miscarried, "To-day if you will hear his voice" (and so enjoy this rest), iii. 18, 19, "harden not your hearts;" speaking there of a rest not already enjoyed, but hereafter to be enjoyed by them, and so not of the rest procured to them by Joshua: εἰ γὰρ, "For if Joshua had given then the rest called the rest of God," David would not have here "spoken of another day of rest;" but having done so, ἄρα, certò, utique, "we conclude, there remains yet a rest to be enjoyed by the people of God."

[5] Ver. 8. Εἰ γὰρ Ἰησοῦς, For if Joshua.] For explication of the apostle's argument here let it be noted, that all the Greek commentators on this place concur in this, that the apostle speaketh of a threefold rest.

First, Of the rest of God, mentioned Gen. ii. 2, in these words, "And God rested on the seventh day from all his works that he had done." Which rest, say the ancients, was "the symbol of the rest of the just from all their labours." So Irenæus† saith, "The seventh day, which was sanctified, rest (like to that of God), then would he not (i. e. God, by David) afterward have spoken of another day (of rest, after their rest in Canaan).

9 There remaineth therefore (yet) a (more glorious and complete) [6] rest to the people of God.

10 For he that is (thus) entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works (i. e. from the labours and travails of this life, Rev. xiv. 13), as God (after he had finished the creation) did from his.

11 Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest (which yet remaineth for the people of God), lest any man fall (Gr. that we may not fall from it) after the same example of unbelief (by our infidelity, as they did).

12 [7] For the word of God (mentioned ver. 1, 2) is quick and powerful, and sharper than any twoedged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner (or censurer) of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

13 Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight (whose word this is): but all things and in which God rested from all his works, is the true sabbath of the just, in which they shall do no earthly labour:" and Origen* saith, that "Celsus understood not the mystery of the seventh day, and the rest of God, in which all that had done their work in six, and had left nothing undone which belonged to them, should feast with God, ascending to the vision of him, and in that to the general festivity of the just and blessed." And again,† "If we farther inquire which are the true sabbaths, we shall find that the observation of the true sabbath reaches beyond the world; the true sabbath, in which God will rest from all his works, being the world to come then when all grief, sorrow, and sighing, shall fly away, and God shall be all in all."

Secondly, Of the rest of the Jews in Canaan: which is the rest God sware the murmuring and unbelieving Jews should not enjoy, perhaps as well in the spiritual sense as in the natural. For the Jews themselves represent their sin, as that in which they made bold,‡ ψευδολογίαν κατακρίνειν τῷ Θεῷ, "to charge God with a lie." And the Jerusalem Targum saith,§ God threatened to remember it in the day of judgment. In Midrash Tillim an evil tongue is said to be worse than idolatry; and this is proved from what these rebels spake against God, נזר דין, "the sentence of judgment being passed upon them for their evil words," Numb. xiv. 28. Now idolatry is still reckoned by them a sin exclusive from the heavenly Canaan; "They shall not enter into the rest of the house of my sanctuary," saith the Chaldee, on Ps. xcv. 11. However, those Jews who entered into Canaan, when they were to have rest from all their enemies round about, so as to dwell safely (Deut. xii. 9, 10), did so far disobey the voice of the Lord, that he said he would not drive their enemies out from before them, but would leave them to be "as thorns in their sides, and pricks in their eyes, to vex them in the land where they dwelt," Judg. ii. 2, 3, Josh. xxiii. 13, Numb. xxxiii. 55: so that the Jews themselves expected a farther completion of that promise, in the times of the Messiah, as we learn from those words of Zecharias the father of the Baptist, "Blessed be the God of Israel; who hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up a mighty salvation for us in the house of his servant David; as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began: that we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hands of all that hate us: that we being delivered out of the hands of our enemies, might serve him without fear," Luke i. 68—71. 74. And hence the apostle here concludes, that Joshua gave them not the rest emphatically styled "the rest of God," as resembling his rest from all his works, when he had finished the world; and so there must be yet another rest remaining to the people of God, as it follows, ver. 9.

[6] Ver. 9. A rest, σαββατισμὸς.] The apostle, by thus changing the word ἀνάπαυσις, "rest," into "sabbatism," and by comparing of this "sabbatism" with "the rest of God" on the sabbath, or seventh day, clearly leads us to the interpretation of all the ancient Christians, that our glorious and complete rest hereafter with God, is that of which God's resting on the seventh day was a symbol; and to the spiritual sabbath, of which the Jewish doctors speak so generally, as the great thing signified by their sabbath; as when they say,* "The sabbath was given to be דוגמא של העולם הבא, δεῖγμα, a sign, or exemplar, of the world to come." "The sabbath-day, what is it?† A figure of the land of the living, to wit, of the world or age to come, the age of souls, the age of consolations." Thus in their descants upon Ps. xcii., which bears this title both in the Hebrew and the Greek, "A song, ליום השבת, εἰς τὴν ἡμέραν τοῦ σαββάτου, upon the sabbath-day," they say,‡ "This is the age to come, שבול שבת, which is all sabbath." The psalmist, saith R. Solomon Jarchi, in locum, "speaks of the business of the world to come, which is all sabbath." "A psalm upon the sabbath-day," saith R. Eliezer, cap. 19, p. 42, "that is, upon the day which is all sabbath, and rest, in the life of the world to come." And again, cap. 18, p. 41, "The blessed Lord created seven worlds (i. e. ages), but one of them is all sabbath, and rest in life eternal:" where he refers to their common opinion, that the world should continue six thousand years, and then a perpetual sabbath should begin, typified by God's resting the seventh day, and blessing it. So Bereschith Rabba; "If we expound the seventh day of the seventh thousand years, which is the world to come, the exposition is, And he blessed; because that in the seventh thousand all souls shall be bound in the bundle of life; for there shall be there the augmentation of the Holy Ghost, wherein we shall delight ourselves. And so our rabbins, of blessed memory, have said in their commentaries, God blessed the seventh day, the Holy Ghost blessed the world to come, which beginneth in the seventh thousand of years." Philo§ is very copious in this allegory, who, disputing against those who, having learned that the written laws were σύμβολα νοητῶν πραγμάτων, "symbols of intellectual things," did upon that account neglect them, saith, that "though the seventh day was a document of the power of God, and of the rest of the creature, yet was not the outward rest to be cast off." And again, "It is fitly said, δι' ὑπονοιῶν, by allegories, or figurative expressions, The sabbaths of the land shall be meat for you," Lev. xxv. 6. "For rest‖ in God producing the greatest good, peace, secure from war, is only that which nourisheth, and is to be enjoyed with pleasure." And a third time, "This is¶ the reason of the seventh day, or the septenary; i. e. of the soul resting in God, and performing no more mortal works."

are naked and opened unto the eyes of him [8] with whom we have to do (Gr. to whom we must give an account, and so there is no hope these unbelievers should escape his judgments).

14 Seeing then that we have a great high priest (merciful and faithful to make reconciliation for our sins, ii. 17), that is passed into the heavens, (to appear for ever there to make intercession, and to prepare this resting-place for us, John xiv. 2, even) Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession (without wavering).

15 For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but (one who) was in all points tempted (i. e. exposed to sufferings) like as we are, yet (and this) without sin (to deserve the least of them: see note on ii. 18).

16 Let us therefore (depending on his power, his intercession for, and sympathy with us) come boldly [9] unto the throne of grace, (this ἱλαστήριον, or mercy-seat, Rom. iii. 25,) that we may obtain mercy (in the pardon of our sins), and find grace (or favour) to (a suitable) help in time of need (Gr. εἰς εὔκαιρον βοήθειαν, for seasonable help in all our sufferings for his sake).

his writings, never applies this phrase to our Lord Christ, it being peculiar to John. (2.) The apostle must have very abruptly spoken here of him, under this metaphor, of whom nothing went before, but very appositely of the gospel, to which these attributes do well agree: for, (1.) the word is quick and vital, not only promising life to the obedient, but threatening death to the disobedient, from the living God, who can quickly execute it, iii. 12. (2.) It is powerful, being "the power of God for the destruction of strong holds, and every thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of God," 2 Cor. x. 4. 7. (3.) It is "sharper than a two-edged sword, and piercing even to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, the joints and the marrow:" slaying Ananias and Sapphira, and delivering up others to Satan, "for the destruction of the flesh," 1 Cor. v. 5, 1 Tim. i. 20. It is, (4.) "A discerner of the thoughts and intentions of the heart," there being then "a gift of discerning spirits," attending the preachers of it, by which they judged and discerned of them; and so "the secrets of their hearts were made manifest," 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25. And, which makes this extremely pertinent to the present exhortation, all this was very visible in the instance of the unbelievers here mentioned, to terrify the Jews from falling by the same example of unbelief. For, (1.) the word of threatening was so quick upon those spies, who "brought up the evil report upon the land," that they died immediately by the hand of God, or "by the plague before the Lord," Numb. xiv. 37. And as for the rest of the unbelievers, "they were consumed," saith Moses, "by God's anger, and by his wrath were troubled: they were carried away as with a flood; they vanished as a dream, or as the morning grass, which in the evening is cut down, and withereth" (Ps. xc. 5, 6). And thus they found the weight of that threat, γνώσετε τὸν θυμόν τῆς ὀργῆς μου, "Ye shall know the vehemency of my wrath," Numb. xiv. 34. They were also thus punished for the evil intentions of their hearts; for, saith Stephen, "In their hearts they turned back into Egypt," Acts vii. 30: so that, by "the word of God," I am inclined to understand his threats denounced against unbelievers, Numb. xiv., Ps. xcv. 11. It also may deserve to be noted, that Philo, lib. de Cherub. p. 86, G, ascribes most of these epithets to the Λόγος, saying, "The flaming sword was a symbol of the Word, especially of the First Cause, δεξικινδύνατον γὰρ καὶ θερμὸν ὁ Λόγος, for his Word is quick and fervent." And again, "God," saith he,* "whetting his sword, the dissector of all things, divides the inform essence of all things, and cuts them in the middle."

[8] Ver. 13. Πρὸς ὃν ἡμῖν ὁ λόγος, To whom we must render an account.] So Matt. xii. 36, "Of every idle word that men shall speak, ἀποδώσουσι λόγον, they shall give an account in the day of judgment;" Matt. xviii. 23, "The kingdom of heaven is like to a certain king, who would, συναραι λόγον, make up an account with his servants;" Luke xvi. 2, ἀπόδος λόγον, "Give up an account of thy stewardship;" Rom. xiv. 12, "Every one, λόγον δώσει τῷ Θεῷ, shall give an account of himself to God;" Phil. iv. 17, "I desire fruit that may abound, εἰς λόγον ὑμῶν, to your account;" Heb. xiii. 17, ὡς λόγον ἀποδώσοντες, "As they that must give an account;" 1 Pet. iii. 15, "Being always ready to give to every one that asks you, λόγον, an account of the hope that is in you;" and, iv. 5, οἱ ἀποδώσουσι λόγον, "Who shall give an account to him that is ready to judge the quick and dead."

[9] Ver. 16. To the throne of God.] The Jews say, God hath a double throne, one of judgment, and the other of mercy: and when he beholds the world obnoxious to condemnation he rises from his throne of judgment, and places himself on that of mercy. This throne of mercy is our blessed Jesus, styled by this apostle, ἱλαστήριον, the true "propitiatory," or "mercy-seat:" by this high-priest and intercessor we must come unto God, "he being able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him," vii. 25.

Note also, That some great men think the rest and sabbatism, discoursed of, ch. iii. iv., refers to the millennium, or the time of the conversion of the Jewish nation, and the new heavens and new earth, then promised; but I am not able to assent to that opinion, for this reason, that the apostle writes to the believing Jews of the present age, warning them, that "there be not in them an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God," and exhorting them to continue unto the end in faith, iii. 13, 14, that so they might "not fail of this rest" of God; and to "fear lest, a promise being made of entering into this rest, any of them should fall short of it," iv. 1, 2. And again, ver. 11, "Let us give diligence to enter into this rest, that we fall not by the same example of unbelief." Now these exhortations could not properly be directed to the believing Jews of that age, concerning the millennium, or the glorious times which were to happen at the conversion of the Jewish nation, they being to die one thousand seven hundred years before that conversion, which is not yet accomplished, and before those glorious days, which are not yet come; for what advantage, in reference to that, could they receive by this diligence, who were to die so long before it happened, and being once in heaven or paradise, could neither expect nor desire to come down thence to be partakers of any enjoyments, or better company here on earth? But these exhortations are very properly directed to them, to take care they fail not of their rest in the celestial Canaan, typified by their rest in the earthly Canaan, the time when they should rest with God, saith Origen, "ascending to the vision of him, the rest of souls in the land of the living, the rest in the life and the world to come, and in life eternal" (see note on ver. 8. 10); seeing these blessings only can belong to, and at the time of retribution will only be conferred upon, them who use this diligence. And hitherto the apostle seems plainly to refer it, when he speaks of "so great salvation," ii. 3, of "bringing many sons to glory," ver. 10, of their being partakers κλήσεως ἐπουρανίου, "of a heavenly calling," iii. 1, the hope and confidence of which he exhorts them to "hold fast unto the end," ver. 6, and then immediately begins his discourse of this rest.

CHAPTER V.

[Let us come forth, saith he, to God's throne of grace with freedom, as having there such a high-priest in whom are all things by way of excellency to be found, for which the Levitical priesthood was ordained, and repaired to; as having,

1 A better priesthood, viz. after the order of Melchisedec, ch. vii.

2 A better consecration to it, viz. by an oath.

3 A better tabernacle in which he ministers.

4 A better sacrifice offered there.

5 A better covenant established in his blood.]

1 For every high priest taken from among men is ordained for (the service of) men in things [1] pertaining to (the worship and propitiation of) God, that he may offer both [2] gifts and sacrifices for sins:

2 (And he is one) Who can have compassion [3] on the ignorant, and on them that are out of (Gr. err from) the way (offering willingly and interceding affectionately on their behalf); for that he himself also is compassed with (the like) infirmity.

3 And by reason hereof (of which infirmities) he ought (by God's command, and from the nature of the thing), as for the people, so also [4] for himself, to offer (sacrifices) for sins.

4 And [5] no man taketh this honour unto himself, but he (only enjoys it) that is called of God, as was Aaron (and his posterity.

5 And) So also (was it with our Lord) Christ (for he) glorified not himself to be made an high priest; but he (appointed him to be so) that said unto him, Thou art my Son, [6] to day have I begotten thee.

6 As he saith also (of him) in another place, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec (as being raised up to appear for ever in the heavens, and there officiate as a priest for us).

7 Who in the days of his (continuance in the) flesh, when he had offered up (Gr. offering up) prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death, and was (Gr. being) [7] heard [8] in that he feared; (and being heard so far as to obtain deliverance from his fears, which he

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1. Τὰ πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν, In things pertaining to God.] "To procure and perform those things which relate to the worship and the propitiation of the Deity." So Crellius.

[2] Δῶρά τε καὶ θυσίας, Gifts and sacrifices.] Both these may relate to sacrifices for sin; for not only peace-offerings, but gifts of any kind are called הקרבנות, δῶρα, Matt. v. 23, and מנחה is by the seventy interpreters often rendered θυσία, Gen. iv. 3. 5, Exod. xxix. 41, xxx. 9, xl. 26. Levit. and Numbers, centies.

[3] Ver. 2. Τοῖς ἐγνοοῦσι καὶ πλανωμένοις.] He refers to the sins which go under the names of חטאת and אשם: for the word חטאת belongs properly to the thing, in doing which we err from the way; and an expiatory sacrifice was therefore required from him that did so, because he knew שוגג ושגג בדרך, "that he had erred and gone from the way:" but אשם was a sin committed out of ignorance of the command of God: so Abarbanel. For sins committed ἑκουσίως, "wittingly," and "with a high hand," or from a will set in opposition to the law of God, there was no sacrifice appointed by the law: and to this the apostle alludes, x. 26, saying, "To them that sin wilfully there remains no more sacrifice for sin."

[4] Ver. 3. Περὶ ἑαυτοῦ, For himself.] Here Grotius notes, that this being spoken generally of every priest taken from among men, Christ also must have offered for himself a sacrifice for sin; i. e. that he might be delivered from those sorrows, which were the punishment of sin, and were inflicted on him upon occasion of our sins. But in this he seems guilty of great and manifold mistakes; for, (1.) the apostle plainly speaks of the sinful infirmities of these priests, who therefore were to offer for their own sin, vii. 27, whereas of Christ he declares, that though he was "in all other things made like to us, yet χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας, without sin," iv. 15, that "he offered himself to God a lamb without spot," ix. 14, that being thus "holy, free from evil, undefiled, and separate from sinners, he needed not (upon a day), as those high-priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's," vii. 26, xxvii. 2. He was not nor could he, after he became our surety, be delivered from those sorrows, which were the punishment of our sins, he being, as our expiatory sacrifice, not only on occasion of our sins, but in our stead, to bear the punishment of our iniquity.

[5] Ver. 4. Καὶ οὐχ ἑαυτῷ τις, No man.] i. e. According to the law, say most interpreters; but I see no necessity of this limitation, it being true that no man can promise to himself God will accept his offerings, who hath no commission from God to make such offerings; whence doth arise a good argument, to show that sacrifices are of divine, and not of human institution only.

[6] Ver. 5. This day.] I have shown, note on ii. 10, that Christ was by his death consecrated to his priesthood; whence it must follow, that he could not exercise his sacerdotal function till after death: and this the apostle showeth here, by saying, he was made a high-priest by the Father, saying, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee:" for that this relates unto the resurrection of our Lord, is evident, because we find the same apostle proving his resurrection from these words, Acts xiii. 33, which he could not have done, had they not been intended as a prediction of his resurrection.

[7] Ver. 7. Εἰσακουσθεὶς, He was heard.] i. e. Delivered from his fear. So the word doth and must signify, when it relates to prayer for deliverance from evils. So Ps. xxii. 21, σῶσόν με, "Save me from the mouth of the lion, καὶ ἀπὸ κεράτων μονοκερώτων, and hear me from the horns of the unicorns;" Ps. xxxiv. 6, "This poor man cried, καὶ εἰσήκουσε αὐτοῦ, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles;" and, ver. 4, "I sought the Lord, καὶ εἰσήκουσε, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears;" Ps. lv. 2, 3, "Attend unto me, καὶ εἰσάκουσόν με, and hear me, ἀπὸ φωνῆς ἐχθροῦ, καὶ ἀπὸ θλίψεως ἁμαρτωλοῦ, from the voice of the enemy, and from the vexation of the wicked;" and, ver. 16, "I cried to the Lord, and the Lord εἰσήκουσέ μου, heard me;" ver. 18, "He delivered my life, ἀπὸ τῶν ἐγγιζόντων μοι, from those that drew nigh to me;" Ecclus. li. 10, 11, εἰσηκούσθη ἡ δέησίς μου, "My prayer was heard, for thou savedst me from destruction" (see Ps. xxxi. 7).

[8] Ἀπὸ τῆς εὐλαβείας, From his fear.] Some would have this rendered so, "He was heard by reason of his reverence of God;" but it is truly rendered, "from his fear:" and so the word continually signifies, both in the Old and the New Testament, and when it is used, as it very often is, by Philo. So Josh. xxii. 24, ἕνεκεν εὐλαβείας ἐποιήσαμεν τοῦτο, "We did this out of fear;" and, Wisd. xvii. 8, καταγέλαστον εὐλάβειαν ἐνόσουν, "They were affected with a ridiculous fear;" Heb. xii. 28, "Let us serve God acceptably, μετ' αἰδοῦς καὶ εὐλαβείας, with reverence and godly fear;" Acts xxiii. 10, εὐλαβηθεὶς ὁ χιλίαρχος, "The captain fearing;" Heb. xi. 7, "Noah, εὐλαβηθεὶς, fearing, prepared an ark:" so Josephus saith of the king, Esther's husband, that he "held forth his sceptre, εὐλαβείας αὐτὴν ἀπολύων, delivering her from her fear:" and in the Septuagint, εὐλαβεῖσθαι ἀπὸ προσώπου Κυρίου, is to "fear before God," Exod. iii. 6, Jer. v. 22, Hab. ii. 20, Zeph. i. 7, iii. 13, Zech. ii. 13; and εὐλαβεῖσθαι ἀπὸ προσώπου αὐτοῦ, is to "fear before man," or be afraid of men, 1 Sam. xviii. 15, Job xix. 29, Isa. lvii. 11, Jer. xxii. 25, Ecclus. vii. 7. This sense also the particle ἀπὸ doth require, which rarely doth import the meritorious cause. His prayers and tears also do express the greatness of his fears; and, lastly, the scope of the apostle requires this sense, he being here representing our Lord as one of like passions with us, that he might show he was "a merciful high-priest." This fear he became subject to, say Grotius and the fathers, because the divinity for a season as it were withdrew its influences from the human nature, καὶ γὰρ τὴν ἀνθρωπότητα τοῦτο παθεῖν ἡ Θεότης συνεχώρησε, "for the Deity permitted the humanity thus to suffer," saith Theodoret. And this doubtless all those fathers intended, who followed that reading, ii. 9, that "he tasted death for every man," χωρὶς Θεοῦ· for that this was no depravation of the Nestorians, as Œcumenius and Theophylact fancied, is evident from this, that his words are thus cited by Origen,* and by Ambrose,† who lived before Nestorius.

* Χωρὶς καὶ Θεοῦ ὑπὲρ παντὸς ἐγεύσατο θανάτου, ὅπερ ἐν τισὶ κεῖται τῆς πρὸς Ἑβραίους ἀντιγράφοις χάριτι Θεοῦ. Orig. Com. in Joh. ed. Huet. tom. ii. p. 38, D.

did by an angel sent to strengthen him, Luke xxii. 43;)

8 Though he were a Son, yet [9] learned he (the difficulty of) obedience (to death) by the things which he suffered (i. e. by the agonies and terrors which he suffered at the apprehension and approach of the death he was to suffer, and so was the more fitted to be to us a compassionate high-priest under our sufferings for his sake);

9 And being (by these sufferings) [10] made perfect (τελειωθεὶς, consecrated to his priesthood), he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him;

10 (Being) called (or, constituted) of God an high priest after the order of Melchisedec (i. e. for ever).

11 Of whom (i. e. whose priesthood) we have many things to say, and (those) [11] hard to be uttered, (or explained, not from the nature of the things themselves, but) seeing (ἐπεὶ, because) ye are dull of hearing.

12 For when for the time (ye have professed the faith) ye ought to (have been able to) be teachers (of it to others), ye have need that one teach you again which be the [12] first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk (the food of babes), and not of strong meat (the food of men).

13 For every one that useth milk is (as yet) unskilful in the word of righteousness: for he is (but) a babe (in Christ, 1 Cor. iii. 2, xiv. 20, Gal. iv. 19, Eph. iv. 14).

14 But strong meat belongeth to them (only) [13] that are of full age (i. e. perfect men), even (to) those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil.

[9] Ver. 8. Ἔμαθεν ἀφ' ὧν ἔπαθε τὴν ὑπακοὴν, He learned obedience, from or by the things that he suffered.] These words I have expounded thus: "He learned (the difficulty of) obedience (to the death) by the things that he suffered." But I conceive they may be also rendered and expounded thus: ver. 7, "He was heard and delivered from his fears," to wit, from those fears which threw him into an agony in the garden, and against which an angel was sent from heaven to comfort him; ver. 8, καίπερ ὢν υἱὸς, "Though being a Son (even the proper Son of God), he taught us obedience by the things that he suffered," or by the death he suffered in obedience to the will and commandment of his Father (John x. 18): for as the Hebrew לִמַּד signifies both to learn and to teach, and is by the Septuagint above twenty times rendered διδάσκειν, "to teach;" and as the word learn in our language signifies also to teach, as in these words of the old translation, Ps. cxix. 66, "O learn me understanding and knowledge:" so also, saith Eustathius,* the word μανθάνω is μέση λέξις, a word that signifies both to teach and to be taught, and is so used by the authors that lived after Homer's time, and by the sophisters.

[10] Ver. 9. Τελειωθεὶς, Made perfect.] That this word is here taken in the notion of consecration, may appear, saith the reverend Dr. Hammond, by the words following; as the application of it, "being pronounced or declared a high-priest," which belongs to Christ after his resurrection, and not before, that being the time when he entered into his heavenly tabernacle, living there for ever to appear before God, and exercise that function in his presence for us; and so he became a high-priest for ever.

[11] Ver. 11. Δυσερμήνευτος, Hard to be uttered.] See here what are Paul's δυσνόητα, "things hard to be understood" (2 Pet. iii. 16); viz. those things which were not so in themselves, or through the difficulty of the matter revealed, but through the imbecility and weakness of them to whom they were spoken.

[12] Ver. 12. Στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχῆς τῶν λογίων τοῦ Θεοῦ, The first principles of the oracles of God.] It is the descant of all the ancient commentators on this place,† that by these "first principles" the apostle understands "the humanity of Christ, because the preachers of the gospel spake of that only to them who were not yet perfect in the faith:" and yet this seemeth neither to be true nor safe; not true, because the apostle had in the first and second chapters of this epistle, as all these commentators teach, spoken to those rude Jews of the deity of Christ, and because he mentions not Christ's human nature among the principles of the doctrine of Christ, reckoned up vi. 1, 2; not safe, because it seems to intimate that Christians might be taught the faith before they had the knowledge of the divinity of Christ, and consequently that this was no necessary part of the Christian faith.

Note, Secondly, That hence we may fairly guess who were, in the Epistles to Timothy, the teachers of the law who "neither understood what they said, nor whereof they affirmed," 1 Tim. i. 7; and the ἑτεροδιδάσκαλοι, "the false teachers, who were proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth," vi. 3—5, and who were always learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth," 2 Tim. iii. 7; viz. not the Gnostics, but in all likelihood the Jewish false teachers, and such as were perverted by them.

Note, Thirdly, That this seems not to be spoken of all the Jews, but only of the greatest part of them; that therefore which is spoken of the deity of Christ, the Melchisedecian priesthood, the virtue of Christ's priesthood, belonged to the more perfect, who were not to be debarred of the knowledge of these things by reason of the imbecility of their brethren.

[13] Ver. 14. Τελείων δὲ.] See the sense of the word "perfect," note on 1 Cor. ii. 6. This metaphor seems to be taken from the digestion of the stomach: that which is light of digestion, and needs not much concoction, as solid food and strong meat do, being here represented by the name of milk; and so in reference to the judgment, that which can easily be learned, and apprehended aright, and in which we are in no great danger of mistaking, as are the first principles of religion, mentioned ch. vi., is compared to "milk;" but that we cannot easily discern, and about which we are subject to mistakes and wrong conceptions, as the things mentioned in the former note were to the Jews, is called "strong meat."

[2] Ver. 2. Βαπτισμῶν διδαχῆς, The doctrine of baptisms.] He speaks not of the baptism of John and of Christ, for the baptism of John was preparatory to repentance and faith in Christ; nor of the baptism of martyrdom, that being not ordinarily known to the Jews by that name; but of the double baptism, of which the Baptist spake in these words, "I baptize you with water, but there is one who cometh after me, he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire" (Matt. iii. 11); and of which our Saviour speaks to Nicodemus, saying, "Except a man be born again of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (John iii. 5); for this in order follows the doctrine of repentance, and faith in God and our Lord Jesus Christ.

[3] Ἐπιθέσεώς τε χειρῶν, Imposition of hands.] Imposition of hands was used in ordination, healing of the sick, and absolution of penitents; but this imposition of hands was not common to all Christians, nor joined with baptism; nor was it to be reckoned among the principles or initiatory doctrines of the Christian faith. It remains therefore that we understand this of the imposition of the apostles' hands, used after baptism, for the receiving of the Holy Ghost, mentioned Acts viii. 17, "Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost" (see xix. 6).

[4] Καὶ κρίματος αἰωνίου, Of eternal judgment.] Hence interpreters observe that the doctrine of Origen, touching the period of the torments of the damned, is here condemned: and indeed the primitive fathers, not Origen himself excepted, taught the contrary. "If we do not the will of Christ," saith Clemens Romanus,* οὐδὲν ἡμᾶς ῥύσεται τῆς αἰωνίου κολάσεως, "nothing will deliver us from eternal punishment." "The black way" in Barnabas† is ὁδὸς τοῦ θανάτου αἰωνίου μετὰ τιμωρίας, "the way of eternal death with punishment." "The punishment of the damned," saith Justin Martyr,‡ "is κόλασις καὶ τιμωρία ἐν αἰωνίῳ πυρὶ (κόλασις ἀπέραντος, κόλασις αἰωνιος, πυρὸς αἰωνίου δίκη), endless punishment and torment in eternal fire:" in Theophylact§ it is κόλασις αἰώνιος, αἰώνιος τιμωρία, "eternal punishment." Irenæus,‖ in his symbol of faith, makes this one article, that τοὺς ἀσεβεῖς καὶ ἀδίκους εἰς τὸ αἰώνιον πῦρ πέμψῃ, "Christ would send the ungodly and unjust into everlasting fire."

Tertullian¶ declares, omnes homines aut cruciatui destinari aut refrigerio, utroque sempiterno, "that all men are appointed to eternal torments or refreshments. And if any man," saith he, "thinks the wicked are to be consumed, and not punished, let him remember, ignem gehennæ æternum prædicari in pœnam æternam, that hell-fire is styled eternal, because designed for eternal punishment;" and thence concludes "their substance will remain for ever, whose punishment doth so." Cyprian saith, Servantur cum corporibus suis animæ infinitis cruciatibus ad dolorem; that "the souls of the wicked are kept with their bodies, to be grieved with endless torments." Tormentis nec modus ullus aut terminus, "There is no measure nor end of their torments," saith Minutius.†† Lastly, Origen‡‡ reckons this among the doctrines defined by the church, that "every soul, when it goes out of this world, shall either enjoy the inheritance of eternal life and bliss, if its deeds have rendered it fit for life, sive igni æterno ac suppliciis mancipanda est, or is to be delivered up to eternal fire and punishment, if its sins have deserved that state."

[5] Ver. 3. Καὶ τοῦτο ποιήσομεν, And this will we do, &c.] This verse by Grotius and Dr. Hammond is thus interpreted; We purpose some other time to instruct you farther in these rudiments of Christianity, if you do not in the meantime fall from the Christian faith (ii. I. 3); "If there be not in you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God" (iii. 12); "If you fall not after the same example of unbelief which your forefathers gave" (iv. 11).

Others put this verse in a parenthesis, and make it relate to these words, ver. 1, "Let us go on unto perfection," or to the higher doctrines of Christianity, as God willing we now intend to do. So Acts xviii. 21, "God willing I will return unto you. I will come to you speedily if God will," 1 Cor. iv. 19. And this interpretation I like best.

[6] Ver. 4. Φωτισθέντας, Enlightened.] That baptism from the beginning was called φωτισμός, "illumination," we learn from the concurrent testimonies of Justin Martyr,* Irenæus, and Clemens Alexandrinus,† which makes it very probable that this phrase obtained from the beginning of Christianity, and so this answers to the doctrine of baptisms, ver. 2.

[7] Γευσαμένους τε τῆς δωρεᾶς τῆς ἐπουρανίου, And have tasted of the heavenly gift.] i. e. The Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, styled by our Saviour, τὴν δωρεὰν τοῦ Θεοῦ, "the gift of God," John iv. 10. Thus our Saviour, discoursing of baptism by water and the Holy Ghost, and of regeneration, ἄνωθεν, "from above," by virtue of this Spirit, saith, he discoursed περὶ τῶν ἐπουρανίων, "of heavenly things," John iii. 12, and they, who were sealed with the Spirit of promise, Eph. i. 13, are said to be blessed with spiritual blessings, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, "in heavenly things;" and this gift was imparted by imposition of hands, Acts viii. 17, xix. 6.

[8] Ver. 5. Καὶ καλὸν γευσαμένους Θεοῦ ῥῆμα, And have tasted the good word of God.] i. e. And have been acquainted with the gospel, which affords the promise of remission of sins, and of justification here, and of a resurrection to eternal life hereafter (ver. 2). So the promise of bringing the children of Israel into the land of Canaan is styled הדבר הטוב, ῥῆμα καλὸν, "a good word," Josh. xxi. 45, xxiii. 15; the word of God for bringing his people out of captivity is styled דברי הטוב, "my good word," Jer. xxix. 10; the words of consolation, which the angel spake to Jerusalem, are דברים טובים, ῥήματα καλὰ, "good words," Zech. i. 13; the promise made to God's people of remission of sins, and peace and truth in the days of the Messiah, is הדבר הטוב, "a good word;" and the prophet speaking of the Messiah saith, "My heart meditateth a good word," דבר טוב, λόγον ἀγαθὸν, Ps. xlv. 1. This word they saw confirmed by the gift of tongues and prophecy, vouchsafed to the first preachers of it, and daily experimented in their assemblies (1 Cor. xiv.), and so they could not but be convinced of the truth of it.

[9] Δυνάμεις τε μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, The powers of the world to come.] The world to come doth, in the language of the prophets and of the Jewish doctors, signify the times of the Messiah, who, in the prophet Isaiah, is called, ὁ παῖδ

[10] to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they (by so doing) crucify to themselves (or by themselves) the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame.

7 For (as) the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft (from heaven) upon it, and (so) bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth (farther) blessing from God, (so is it with them who become fruitful under the dew and showers of divine grace:)

8 But that (earth) which (being thus dressed and watered) beareth (only) thorns and briers is [11] rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned.

9 But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak (to warn you of the danger of falling off from the Christian faith).

10 For (if ye be not wanting to yourselves) God is not unrighteous to forget [12] your work (of faith) and (your) labour of love, which ye have shewed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the (necessities of the) saints, and (yet) do minister (to them).

11 And we desire (ἐπιθυμοῦμεν δε, we desire therefore) that every one of you do shew the same diligence (which hitherto ye have done,) to the (intent that ye may retain a) full assurance of hope unto the end:

12 [13] That ye be not slothful (Gr. may not be slothful), but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit (ed) the promises.

13 For when God (upon his faith in offering his son Isaac) made promise to Abraham, [14] because he could swear by no (one) greater, he sware by himself,

14 Saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee.

15 And so (accordingly), after he had patiently endured, he obtained the [15] promise (of a seed multiplied greatly to him, Gen. xxii. 17.

16 God confirming his faith in the promises made to him after the manner of men:) For men verily swear by the greater: and an oath for confirmation is to them an [16] end of all strife (or contradiction).

μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, "the Father of the world to come" (see note on ii. 5). "The powers," therefore, "of the world to come," according to the scripture idiotism, must be the external operations of the Holy Ghost, viz. the gifts of faith, of healing, of casting out devils, ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων, 1 Cor. xii. 8, 9, "the working of miracles," or "the operations of powers." Or, secondly, this fourth particular may answer to the day of judgment, which is the fourth thing mentioned, ver. 2, as the three former seem to do to the three other things there mentioned, and then "the powers of the world to come" may signify the powerful persuasions the doctrine of a future judgment administers to repentance and a new life (Acts xvii. 30, 31, 2 Cor. v. 10, 11); though of this import of the phrase I find no example.

[10] Ver. 6. Ἀδύνατον τούτους πάλιν ἀνακαινίζειν εἰς μετάνοιαν, It is impossible to renew these to repentance.] For these being all the means, internal and external, by which God gave testimony to the truth of Christian faith, and the prophetic office and glorious resurrection of our Lord; they, saith the apostle, who, after a full experience of them, do of their own accord renounce that faith, cannot be renewed to repentance, because they have already resisted all that evidence which God saw fit to give men of the truth of that faith and of this Messiah; and so they become guilty of that sin against the Holy Ghost, which, saith our Saviour, shall never be forgiven (Matt. xii. 32).

But then the παραπεσόντες, "men that thus fall away," are not those who lapse in the times of persecution, and much less those who, through the temptations of the flesh, may sometimes fall into great sins, for to such the apostle grants place for repentance, 2 Cor. xii. 21; and one of these he delivers to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, "that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus," 1 Cor. v. 5; exhorting his Corinthians, upon his repentance, to receive him into their communion, 2 Cor. ii. 7, 8; but such as after these experiences of the truth of the Christian faith, have voluntarily renounced it, relapsing either to heathenism or Judaism; for they are such as "apostatize from the living God," iii. 12, such as "fall through unbelief," iv. 11, such as "hold not the profession of the faith," x. 23, such as "draw back from the faith," ver. 38.

Secondly, This will be farther evident from the description of these persons, they being here said ἀνασταυροῦν ἑαυτοῖς, "by themselves to crucify Christ afresh," and παραδειγματίζειν, "to put him to an open shame," as one that deserved the punishment which the Jews inflicted on him, and being apostate Jews, to crucify Christ again.

[11] Ver. 8. Ἀδόκιμος, Rejected.] It is rejected of the husbandman, who will spend no more labour upon it, but leave it to be scorched by the heat, and so to be like the heath, which is the emblem of the cursed man, Jer. xvii. 5, 6; or like the barren fig-tree which the Lord cursed, saying, "Never fruit grow on thee more," Matt. xxi. 19. Accordingly, they on whom the showers of divine grace fall down from heaven, if they bring forth no good fruit, shall be ἀδόκιμοι, "rejected" by God, continue under the curse of the law, and their end shall be destruction.

[12] Ver. 10. Τοῦ ἔργου ὑμῶν, Your work.] This seems to be the ἔργον πίστεως, "work of faith," mentioned 1 Thess. i. 3, 2 Thess. i. 11, and joined with ὁ κόπος τῆς ἀγάπης, "the labour of love," as here; and which is styled ἔργον ἀγαθόν, "the good work," Phil. i. 6, Rom. ii. 7 (see note on that verse), the following exhortation being this, That they would continue in the faith to the end, and be imitators of them "who through faith and patience did inherit the promises."

[13] Ver. 12. Ἵνα μὴ νωθροὶ, That ye be not slothful.] i. e. God being so engaged on his part to let nothing be wanting which is requisite to enable you to persevere, and so to enjoy the fruits of your faith in the salvation of your souls, see that ye be not slothful, nor faint-hearted, but still continuing the same Christian diligence to the end, that so ye may at last enjoy the blessings promised by this gospel, and live in an assured hope of them, as your father Abraham did.

[14] Ver. 13. Ἐπεὶ κατ' οὐδενὸς εἶχε μείζονος ὀμόσαι, Because he could swear by no greater.] So Philo, ὁρᾷς γὰρ ὅτι οὐ καθ' ἑτέρου ὀμνύει ὁ Θεὸς, οὐδὲν γὰρ αὐτοῦ κρεῖττον, ἀλλὰ καθ' ἑαυτοῦ, "Thou seest that God sweareth not by another, for there is nothing better than he, but by himself" (Leg. Alleg. lib. ii. p. 75, D.)

He swears, ἐπ' ἑαυτοῦ, by himself.] It may perhaps not be unworthy of our observation, that where God saith in the Old Testament, "I swear by myself;" the Jerusalem Targum renders this frequently בְּמֵימְרִי, "by my Word," as Exod. xxii. 16, Deut. i. 1, xxxii. 22. 26.

[15] Ver. 15. Τῆς ἐπαγγελίας, The promise.] This cannot be understood of Isaac the promised seed, he being not only born, but offered, when God made this promise to Abraham; nor can it be said that he inherited the promise because he saw it afar off, that being a sign he did not yet inherit it; or that he did this in his posterity, for the apostle saith, he himself inherited the promises: which is exactly true of the words cited here by the apostle, "Surely, blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee;" for the book of Genesis assures us, this promise was exactly fulfilled in his life: for the Lord blessed him in all things (Gen. xxiv. 1). He had a numerous seed by his wife Keturah (Gen. xxv.), to whom he gave gifts (ver. 6). From Ishmael arose twelve sons, which were princes of their tribes (ver. 13. 16). He lived fifteen years after the birth of Jacob and Esau by Rebekah, of whom the oracle declared, that "there were two nations in her womb:" for Isaac was sixty years old when they were born to him (ver. 23. 26); he himself was born when Abraham was a hundred years old (Gen. xxi. 5); Abraham was a hundred and seventy-five years old when he died (Gen. xxv. 7): he therefore lived fifteen years after the birth of Jacob and Esau, and ninety years after the birth of Ishmael; and so lived to see this promise verified to him.

[16] Ver. 16. Ἀντιλογίας πέρας, An end of contradiction.]

17 Wherein (ἐν ᾧ, in which thing accordingly) God, (being) willing more abundantly to shew (not only to Abraham, but also) unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath:

18 That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie (viz. his promise and his oath), we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us: (who, to escape the wrath impendent on the unbelieving Jews here and hereafter, have fled to the hope of glory set before us in Christ Jesus, the lively hope of an inheritance incorruptible, to which we are begotten by Christ Jesus, 1 Pet. i. 3:)

19 Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast (in all the storms and billows of the world), and which [17] entereth into that within (Gr. the inward part of) the veil;

20 Whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, (who is) made an high priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec (and so one that can never die, or miscarry in his office, but lives for ever, there to appear in the presence of God for us, vii. 24, 25).

Diodorus Siculus* informs us, that the Egyptians styled an oath, μεγίστην πίστιν, "the greatest confirmation." It is, saith Dionysius Halicarnassensis, τελευταία πίστις, "the last or utmost assurance." It is, in the language of Procopius, ὕστατον, καὶ ἐχυρώτατον πίστεώς τε καὶ ἀληθείας ἐνέχυρον, "the last and firmest pledge of faith and truth." That the apostle here speaks of prómissory oaths, is evident from the occasion of this discourse, viz. his promise made to Abraham. Now these oaths being equally conducing to this good end in all ages, we have just reason to believe that Christianity allows of them for these ends.

[17] Ver. 19. Εἰς τὸ ἐσώτερον τοῦ καταπετάσματος, Which entereth into the veil.] Which, being the hope of the heavenly mansions typified by the sanctum sanctorum, within the veil, carries our expectation thither: the Jews had the highest expectations from the service of the high-priest entering into the holy of holies; if on the day of expiation he came out alive, "there was great joy, for then they thought they were accepted."* How then may we rejoice in contemplation of that heavenly sanctuary!

CHAPTER VII.

1 (Which order, sure, was very excellent, and therefore fit to represent the priesthood of the holy Jesus, the King of saints, and Prince of peace:)For this Melchisedec, [1] king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the (four) kings (mentioned Gen. xiv. 9), and blessed him (ver. 18);

2 To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all (the spoils taken by him); first being by interpretation (of the word Melchisedec,) King of righteousness,

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VII.

[1] Ver. 1. Βασιλεὺς Σαλήμ, King of Salem.] They seem mistaken who think this Salem was the same with Jerusalem; for it is plain from this very place, Gen. xiv. 15—17, that Salem was in the way which led from the valley of Damascus unto Sodom. Jerome* saith that he learned, ab eruditissimis gentis illius, "from the most learned of the Jews, that Salem was not Jerusalem, but a town near Scythopolis," which till then was called Salem: and it retained its name in our Saviour's days, as appears by the evangelist saying that "John baptized near Salem," John iii. 23. Now of this Melchisedec, king of Salem, let it be noted,

First, That he must be a man, not an angel, not the Holy Spirit: for (1.) "every high-priest," saith the apostle, "is taken from among men," v. 1. (2.) The scripture still speaks of him as a man, describing him by his proper name, his kingly dignity, and the city where he dwelt, and by his personal actions, proper to a man, his bringing forth bread and wine, and his receiving the tithes of the spoils. And, (3.) from these words, "Consider, πηλίκος οὗτος, what an eminent person this Melchisedec was, to whom Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils;" things, surely, which neither angels nor the Holy Spirit would receive, nor was it necessary to prove their dignity. Accordingly, Josephus† saith expressly that "he was a king of the city of Salem;" and Philo,‡ that "he was a king, and not a tyrant."

Secondly, He could not be Sem, as the Jews vainly imagine, for the apostle saith here expressly, that Melchisedec was not γενεαλογούμενος ἐξ αὐτῶν, i. e. "one who had his pedigree or descent from them," which is not true of Sem: nor could he be said to be "without father or mother," whose genealogy is evident from Adam, Gen. v. 32, x. 1, and who was the son of Noah. Nor was Sem's priesthood, if he had any, of a different order from Levi's, who was "in his loins," as well as Levi was "in the loins of Abraham;" and therefore it could not be said that "Levi paid him tithes in the loins of Abraham," but it would be as true that he received tithes in the loins of Sem: for, according to this interpretation, he was in the loins both of him that received tithes, and of him that paid them; which destroys the whole argument of the apostle here. Moreover, there is no visible cause why Moses should call Sem, whom he so often mentions, by any other name than his own, by which he doth so oft make mention of him; nor is it likely that Sem reigned in the land of Canaan, which now was in the possession of his brother's son; nor could Abraham be said to "sojourn there as in a strange country," if his noble ancestor Sem had been king there.

Thirdly, Much less could he be the eternal Λόγος, or the Son of God himself; for as he only was a priest according to his human nature, i. e. that nature in which he was inferior to God, and which he had not yet assumed, and was then constituted a high-priest, when God said to him at his resurrection, "This day have I begotten thee," v. 5; so could he not be a high-priest after his own order, or made like unto himself. But Melchisedec was in this like unto him, that he was both "a priest of the most high God," and a "king" also in that country, those two offices being anciently in the same person; whence the Hebrew כהן, "a priest," is by the Targum often rendered רבא, "a prince;" see Gen. xli. 45, Exod. ii. 16, iii. 1, 2 Sam. viii. 18, xx. 26, 1 Kings iv. 6, Job xii. 19; and on those words, Ps. cx. 4, "Thou art a priest for ever;" "Thou shalt be a great prince for ever," is the descant of the Jewish Targum:

Note also, that here again Mr. Le Clerc is insufferable, when he says, "Because the allegorical writers of the Jews at that time accommodated innumerable places to the Messiah, not relying upon any grammatical interpretation, but a certain old custom of explaining the scripture after this manner; and because they interpreted Ps. cx. of the Messiah, the sacred writer makes use of that interpretation to his purpose; and because they acknowledged the Messiah ought to be like Melchisedec, he reasons against them from their own concessions, not against other men, who might have denied what he affirmed: otherwise, if the thing be considered in itself, no strong or grammatical argument can be drawn against others from that history; and therefore such things are not too much to be urged now, because that way of explaining and after that also (styled) King of Salem, which (by interpretation) is, King of peace; (and being)

3 [2] Without father, (or) without mother (of any priestly order), without descent (from any of the pedigree of Abraham, ver. 7), [3] having neither beginning of days (from which his priestly office was to commence), nor end of life (in which it terminated); but (being) [4] made like unto the Son (a son) of God; abideth a priest continually.

4 Now consider how great this man (Gr. he) was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave [5] the tenth of the spoils (which anciently were given to kings and priests, as belonging to God, whom they served or represented).

5 And verily they that are of the sons of Levi, who receive (i. e. they indeed of the sons of Levi receiving) the office of the priesthood, have a commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they come out of the loins of Abraham (i. e. they receive tithes only by virtue of the law, and that from them only who come out of the loins of Abraham, as well as they, Numb. xviii. 21. 26):

6 But he [6] whose descent is not counted from them

scripture is grown out of use:" that is, the apostle proceeds all along upon weak grounds, and urges arguments that in themselves depend on falsehoods, only because some silly Jews had said the same thing before him. I read, indeed, in profane Celsus,* this vile reflection on the sacred penmen, that "they produce things unknown, fanatical, uncertain, and which no wise man thinks to be of any strength;" but I am sorry to find a Christian writer thus exposing them to the contempt and scorn of anti-scripturists. "Christ is a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec," saith the apostle, vi. 20. So indeed you tell us, out of the idle tales and "allegorical interpretations of some brain-sick Jews," saith Mr. Le Clerc; but without all ground. "It is περισσότερον κατάδηλον, exceeding manifest," saith the apostle, "that another priest should arise after the order of Melchisedec," vii. 15. It is no such thing, saith Mr. Le Clerc; this follows only from the vain concessions of the Jews: "another man may deny what you thus confidently affirm." "It is exceeding manifest," saith the apostle, "for the scripture testifies this, by saying, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec," ver. 17. And God hath confirmed this by an oath, in these words, "The Lord sware and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever." You make use of a rabbinical interpretation, saith Mr. Le Clerc, and call that falsely a scripture testimony; "but another may deny what you thus assume, for no strong or grammatical argument can be drawn from these words."

[2] Ver. 3. Ἀπάτωρ, &c. Without father, without mother, &c.] It being certain that these things cannot be properly spoken of a man, it is necessary to interpret them as I have done in the paraphrase; and to this interpretation the apostle leads, by styling him, ἀγενεαλόγητον, "without pedigree," as being μὴ γενεαλογούμενος ἐξ αὐτῶν, "not of the genealogy of the people of Abraham."

[3] Μήτε ἀρχὴν ἡμερῶν, μήτε ζωῆς τέλος ἔχων, Having neither beginning of days nor end of life.] Though I have placed another exposition of these words in the paraphrase, I condemn not the ordinary sense which interpreters put upon these words, viz. That in scripture there is nothing said of the beginning or end of his life; for so Philo saith of Cain, "Perhaps the sign that Cain should not be killed was this, τὸ μηδέποτε ἀναιρεθῆναι, that he should never be taken away by death, οὐδὲ γὰρ θάνατον αὐτοῦ διὰ πάσης τῆς νομοθεσίας δεδήλωκεν, for Moses had said nothing of his death" (L. Quod deter. p. 145, C.).

[4] Ἀφωμοιωμένος δὲ τῷ υἱῷ τοῦ Θεοῦ, But made like to the (a) son of God.] All the interpreters I have met with refer this to Christ, of whom Melchisedec was a type, he being the antitype, as being emphatically "a King of righteousness," and "a Prince of peace," without earthly father, as to his divinity; without mother, as being not of the genealogy of the Aaronical priesthood; "without beginning of days" as to his divine nature, "and without end of life" as to his priesthood. But the apostle is not here speaking of Melchisedec's likeness to Christ, but of Christ's likeness to him, as being "a priest after the order of Melchisedec:" nor do these things well suit with our Lord Christ, who, as to his human nature, was not "without mother," nor, as to his priesthood, "without beginning of days," Luke iii. 23. I therefore rather think, that as in all the former characters, so here the apostle speaks of Melchisedec, and saith, he was, in this, "like to a son of God," or to one of the angels, who are immortal, and never cease to be: for it is certain, that the angels are often styled "the sons of God:" so Job i. 6, בני אלהים, "the sons of God," are, in the Septuagint, ἄγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ. So also ii. 1, xxxviii. 7, Ps. xxix. 1, Chal. So Dan. iii. 25, "The vision of the fourth is like υἱῷ τοῦ Θεοῦ, a son of God," i. e. an angel of God: for so it follows, ver. 28, "He sent his angel, and delivered them." It is the observation of the book of Wisdom, ii. 3, that "man was made immortal, and to be an image of God's eternity;" and at their resurrection, saith Luke, "they shall die no more, but shall be like unto the angels, καὶ υἱοί εἰσι τοῦ Θεοῦ, and are the sons of God, being sons of the resurrection;" and our υἱοθεσία, or "sonship," is by this apostle made to consist in "the redemption of the body from corruption" (see note on Rom. viii. 23). Melchisedec therefore being here represented as one who had no end of his life; and upon that account, one who "abides a priest for ever," is in this said to be like to "a son of God;" whence, ver. 8, the apostle opposes him to priests that die, saying, "There he received tithes, of whom it is testified that he liveth," viz. Ps. cx. 4.

[5] Ver. 4. Δεκάτην τῶν ἀκροθινίων, The tenth of the spoils.] Τὰ ἀκροθίνια, saith Phavorinus, are, τὰ τῶν πολέμων, "the spoils of war;" they are, saith Hesychius and Suidas, αἱ λαφύρων ἀπαρχαί, "the first-fruits of the prey;" or, as Josephus* saith, δεκάτη τῆς λείας, "the tenths of what was gotten by war;" it being a very ancient custom to give partly to the gods, and partly to kings, the tenths or first-fruits of these spoils: and so Melchisedec might here receive them both as a king and as a priest. That they were given to the gods, we learn from those words of Arrian,† "We ought, in hunting, to begin from the gods, and to present to them the first-fruits of what we have taken, οὐ μεῖον ἢ ἐν τῇ νίκῃ πολέμου ἀκροθίνια, no less than in a victory in war, the chief of the spoils." Thus did the Athenians, saith Herodotus,‡ who, τῶν λύτρων τὴν δεκάτην ἀνέθηκαν, "consecrated the tenth of their prize to the gods." Diodorus Siculus saith, all the Greeks did it; and Josephus saith, that Joshua preserved the gold and silver of the inhabitants of Jericho to be ἀπαρχὴν ἐξαίρετον τῷ Θεῷ, "excellent first-fruits to God of their spoils" (Antiq. lib. v. cap. 1, p. 136). See this as to both parts largely proved by Dr. Spencer.§ And evident it is, that Abraham here paid not the tithes of all he had, but only the tenths of the spoils: (1.) Because he had nothing else there, the remainder of his estate being at Mamre. (2.) The manner of paying tithes being not this, that a man shall pay the tenth of all he hath, but only that he pay "the tenth of his increase;" and that not whenever he meets the priest, but at the time of harvest only, or when he receives from God's hands the increase of it: it cannot then be thought reasonable, that Abraham should give to Melchisedec the tithes of any other spoils than those he had now reaped by way of harvest.

[6] Ver. 6. Ὁ δὲ μὴ γενεαλογούμενος ἐξ αὐτῶν, Whose descent, &c.] Thus Philo‖ saith, that ἱερέα ἑαυτοῦ πεποίηκεν ὁ Θεός οὐδὲν ἔργον αὐτοῦ προδιατυπώσας, "God made him his priest, having not mentioned any work that he did before:" and elsewhere he saith that "he received αὐτομαθῆ καὶ αὐτοδίδακτον ἱεροσύνην, a priesthood taught and learned by himself."

§ Lib. iii. 10, sect. 1, 2.
‖ Lib. ii. Alleg. p. 57, E.

(being no kin to Abraham) received tithes of Abraham (himself), and blessed him that had the promises (that in him should all the families of the earth be blessed).

7 And without all contradiction (in all solemn benedictions, ex officio,) the less is blessed of the better (and so he that blessed Abraham must be greater than he was).

8 And here (under the Levitical priesthood) men that die receive tithes; but there (in the instance of Melchisedec) [7] he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed (Ps. cx. 4) that he liveth.

9 And [8] as I may so say, (the family of) Levi also, who receiveth tithes, payed tithes in Abraham.

10 For he was yet in the loins of his father (Abraham), when Melchisedec met him.

11 If therefore [9] perfection (i. e. full expiation of sins) were (to be obtained) by the Levitical priesthood, (as it must have been, had it come by the law, ver. 18, 19,) (for [10] under (Gr. about) it the people received the law,) what further need was there that another priest should rise (as the psalmist saith) after the order of Melchisedec, and not be (rather) called (a priest) after the order of Aaron?

12 (And yet you see this need there was;) For the priesthood being changed (i. e. translated from the order of Aaron to that of Melchisedec), there is made of necessity a change also of the law (concerning priesthood, ver. 14, or touching priests to be repaired to for expiation.

13 And this change is signified by these words, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec;) For he (i. e. Christ) of whom these things (words) are spoken pertaineth to another tribe (than that of Levi), of which (tribe) no man gave attendance at the altar.

14 For it is evident that our Lord (to whom these words belong) sprang out of (the tribe of) Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.

15 And it is yet far more evident: (by saying,) [11] for that (Gr. ει, that) after the similitude of Melchisedec (not of Aaron, ver. 11) there ariseth another priest, 16 Who is made (a priest), not after the law of a carnal commandment (relating to men that are flesh and blood, and so infirm, and subject to mortality; for all flesh is grass, Isa. xl. 6, and therefore must be succeeded by others), but after the power of an endless (or indissoluble) life.

17 For (thus) he testifieth, (by saying,) Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

18 (I say, not after the law of a carnal commandment,) For there is verily (in these words) a disannulling of the commandment going before (the preceding commandment concerning the Levitical priesthood and sacrifices,) [12] for the weakness (of it as to justifica-

[7] Ver. 8. He.] They seem to be mistaken who think this only belongs to Christ, and not at all to Melchisedec: the contrary is manifest, (1.) from the particle καὶ, which shows that the apostle is still speaking of the same person, i. e. Melchisedec; and from the three following verses, which all speak of him: nor is here more said of him than ver. 3, where it is affirmed, he had "neither beginning of days nor end of life." And by the opposition betwixt the Aaronical priests as dying, and him as living, and by the word μαρτυρούμενος, which respects a testimony of this thing, it is evident that the apostle infers this from the words of the psalmist, "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec."

[8] Ver. 9. Ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν] Is not here to speak briefly, and, as in a word; but ὡς ἂν εἴπῃ τις, "as a man may say," or, ἵνα οὕτως εἴπω, "that I may so say;" because, saith Theophylact, it was τόλμημα, "a harsh figure;" "for in such a manner," saith Quintilian,* "we use to mollify harsh expressions:" which is enough to guard us against the inference which some make from these words, that "in like manner" we may be said to have sinned in Adam, as being in the loins of Adam when he sinned. Which may be granted τρόπον τινα, "in a manner," because we derived from him that death which was the punishment of his sin, as coming from the loins of one mortal, and deriving from him a nature subject to that sin which deserveth death: and more cannot be inferred from these words, because the apostle here says no more of Levi, but that he, "in a manner," paid tithes in Abraham. (2.) Because by the like argument it may be proved, that Jesus Christ himself, as man, paid tithes to Melchisedec, for he also was in the loins of Abraham when Melchisedec met him, and consequently that he was also inferior to Melchisedec; which perhaps was the very reason why the apostle thus mollifies his words, and is so careful to let us know he useth here a form of speech which is not proper and exact, and such as ought not to be pressed too far. And therefore (3.) the subject-matter fairly shows the difference: for tithes are paid out of such things as are the fathers' goods, and so would have descended, by the laws of nature and nations, to their posterity, had they not been thus given to another; but good and evil actions are merely personal, and therefore, though the effects of both may, and often do, descend unto posterity, the good actions of the parents bringing temporal blessings on their offspring, and their evil actions subjecting them to temporal calamities and diseases; yet their merit or demerit cannot be properly derived or propagated to their posterity: for as no man is a good man, in the account of God, purely because his father, or some of his progenitors, were so; so neither is any man properly a sinner, or evil in the sight of God, merely because his parents were so before he was born.

[9] Ver. 11. Τελείωσις, Perfection.] That this word, relating to priests and oblations, signifies expiation and purification, see note on x. 1.

[10] Ἐπ' αὐτῇ γὰρ ὁ λαὸς νενομοθέτητο, For about that the people received the law.] i. e. The law appointed that the people, under all their defilements which needed any expiation and purgation, should repair to the Levitical priests: or, Under the priesthood, the people received the law concerning sacrifices; the priesthood being first instituted, and then the laws concerning sacrifices and expiation.

Καὶ οὐ κατὰ τάξιν Ἀαρὼν λέγεσθαι.] The words are in all the Greek scholia, Vulgate, Syriac, Arabic, and yet are by Dr. Mills rejected as a marginal note, upon the sole authority of the Ethiopic (see Examen Millii): so viii. 4, τῶν ἱερέων is rejected upon the authority of the Vulgar and three MSS. though it be in all the Greek scholiasts, the Syriac, and Arabic: so ix. 22, σχέδον is wanting only in the Syriac and Ethiopic, and yet rejected by the doctor: so ὁ Θεός, x. 9, is rejected upon the sole authority of the Ethiopic, against the authority of the Greek commentators and all the other versions: and, xiii. 21, he rejects ἔγνω upon the sole authority of the Vulgar (see Exam. Millii).

[11] Ver. 15. Εἰ, For that.] The particle εἰ often signifies quòd, that, in scripture, as doth the Hebrew כִּי. So Acts xxvi. 8, "Why should it be thought impossible, εἰ Θεὸς νεκροὺς ἐγείρει, that God should raise the dead?" And ver. 23, εἰ παθητὸς ὁ Χριστός, εἰ πρῶτος, &c., "That Christ hath suffered, and that he is the first that rose from the dead." So Jer. ii. 28, "Where are thy gods, εἰ ἀναστήσονταί, that they may arise and save thee?" (see 1 Tim. v. 10, 2 Chron. vi. 18.)

[12] Ver. 18. Διὰ τὸ αὐτῆς ἀσθενὲς, For the weakness of it.] "For what the law could not do," i. e. that deliverance from death, that justification to life, it could not give, ἐν ᾧ ἠσθένει διὰ σαρκὸς, "in that it was weak through the flesh," rendering us subject to the transgression of it, and so to death by the sentence of it, Christ, by his sacrifice for sin, did (Rom. viii. 3).

19 For (thus) [14] the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in [15] of a better hope did; by the [16] which we draw nigh unto God.

20 [17] And (by so much is Jesus made the mediator of a better covenant,) inasmuch as (his priesthood, by virtue of which he became this mediator, was) not without an oath he was made priest (as was that of the tribe of Levi):

21 (For those priests were made (such) without an oath; but this with an oath by him that said unto him (Ps. cx. 4), The Lord sware and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec:) (Now where no oath intervenes, God may change his institution, but not after his oath.

22 I say,) By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament (established upon better promises, viii. 6).

23 And (to proceed in the comparison) they truly were many priests (successively), because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death:

24 But this man (Gr. but he, i. e. Jesus, ver. 22), because he continueth (for) ever, hath an unchangeable (high) priesthood (which passeth not away, and so admits of no succession to it).

25 Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost (Gr. for ever) that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them (and by that intercession to become the propitiation for their sins for ever, 1 John ii. 2.

26 And thus was he a high-priest suited to our condition:) For such an high priest became us (sinners), who is holy (i. e. consecrated to his office, and so holiness to the Lord, Exod. xxviii. 36), [18] harmless (ἄκακος, free from evil in himself), undefiled (by the impurities of others), separate from sinners (and so not liable to any defilement by dwelling among them), and (therefore) made higher than the heavens; (he being ascended far above the heavens, Eph. iv. 10, and passed through the heavens, Heb. iv. 14, into the presence of God, there to appear for ever for us;

27 And so one) Who needeth not daily, as those high priests (under the law did), to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins (which he, being free from evil, ver. 26, could not do), and then for (the sins of) the [13] Τὸ ἀνωφελὲς, The unprofitableness] Of the law, here mentioned, must not be taken absolutely, for that the apostle denies, declaring in his answer to that question, "What advantage then hath the Jew" above the gentile? or, τίς ἡ ὠφέλεια; "What is the profit of the circumcision?" that it is "much every way" (Rom. iii. 1, 2): and reckoning among their advantages, the giving of the law (Rom. ix. 4), and showing the uses of it, and the reason which moved God to give it (Rom. vii. 8, Gal. iii. 19. 24). But the precepts of the ceremonial law were ἀσθενῆ καὶ πτωχὰ στοιχεῖα, "weak and beggarly elements," compared to those of the gospel (Gal. iv. 9), and wholly unprofitable as to justification, or the absolution of the sinner, or transgressor of it, from the guilt of sin, as the apostle testifies in these words, Rom. iii. 9, "What then are we (Jews) better than they (the gentiles)? οὐ πάντως, not altogether; for we have before proved (touching) both Jews (ch. ii.) and gentiles (ch. i.), that they are all under sin (and so both equally stand in need of justification by faith)."

[14] Ver. 19. Οὐδὲν γὰρ ἐτελείωσεν ὁ νόμος, For the law made nothing perfect.] Nor is it to be wondered, that the law, of which the Levitical priesthood was the chiefest part, and that only which concerned the expiation of sin, should be thus disannulled, since it was thus weak and unprofitable as to the absolution of the sinner from the guilt of sin, and could not, by its sacrifices, τελειῶσαι, procure an absolution as to conscience, to those that came unto God by them, from the guilt of sin (x. 1, 2). They could not make "the worshippers" of God by them "perfect, as appertaining to conscience" (ix. 9); i. e. so as to have no more conscience of the guilt of sin. This made it necessary that they should give place to the introduction of a better hope.

[15] Ἐπεισαγωγὴ κρείττονος ἐλπίδος, The introduction of a better hope:] i. e. The introduction of that sacrifice, which gives a better hope; a hope of entering, not into an earthly tabernacle, which was all the Jewish sacrifices could procure, "the way of entering into the holy of holies being not yet made manifest," ix. 8, but of "entering within the veil," vi. 19; the "hope of good things to come, by a better and more perfect tabernacle," ix. 11; the hope, not of an annual, but of an eternal redemption (ver. 12); not of an inheritance to be continued for a little time in the land of Canaan, but of an "eternal inheritance" (ver. 15); "Christ being entered," not into an earthly tabernacle, as the Aaronical priests did, which was the figure of the true, "but into heaven itself, there to appear in the presence of God for us" (ix. 24), and so procuring to us "freedom to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus."

[16] Δι' ἧς ἐγγίζομεν τῷ Θεῷ, By which we draw nigh to God:] Having our consciences purged from dead works, by the blood of Christ, to serve the living God (ix. 14), and having through him "freedom to come unto him with full assurance of faith" (x. 22), and by which "we are made, ἐγγὺς, nigh to God through the blood of Jesus" (Eph. ii. 13), and have "access unto the Father" (ver. 18).

[17] Ver. 20. Καὶ καθ' ὅσον.—κατὰ τοσοῦτον.] Here is plainly the figure called σύγκυσις, or συμπλοκὴ, verborum, that which is put last being to be construed first, as is manifest from the ὁ δὲ, "but he," relating to the "Mediator of the better covenant," in the following verse. So Mark xiv. 23, 24, "And taking the cup, he gave thanks, and gave it to them, and they all drank of it; and he said unto them, This is the blood of the new testament," &c. For it is manifest from Matt. xxvi. 27, 28, that Christ first said, "This is my blood of the new testament," before they drank of it. And so those words, ver. 23, "And they all drank of it," must in construction follow those of ver. 24, "This is the blood of the new testament:" so Rev. xx. 12, "And I saw the dead, small and great, standing before the throne of God, and they were judged," &c.; and ver. 13, "And the sea gave up her dead, and death and hades gave up their dead, and they were judged according to their works:" and yet it is certain, that the sea and hades must give up their dead, before they could stand before the throne of God, or be judged. So Heb. ii. 1, "We see Jesus made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour, that he, by the grace of God, might taste death for every man;" i. e. for the suffering of death, that so by the grace of God he might taste death for every man, crowned with glory and honour.

[18] Ver. 26. Ἄκακος, Harmless.] Ἄκακος, ἀπόνηρος· the word imports "one free from sin:" so Chrysostom and Theophylact; and this place, saith Philo,* must be the property of a true high-priest, for ὁ πρὸς ἀλήθειαν ἀρχιερεὺς, καὶ μὴ ψευδώνυμος, ἀμέτοχος ἁμαρτημάτων ἐστι, "he that truly, and not improperly, bears that name, is free from sin;" and of him that was to enter once a year into the holy of holies,† he saith, "He must be, ὁλόκληρος καὶ παντελὴς, περὶ μηδέν, μὴ μέγα, μὴ μικρὸν, ἁπλῶς κεραίων πάθος, ἀλλ' ἀρτίῳ καὶ πλήρει καὶ πάντα τελειοτάτῃ κεχρημένος φύσει, entire, perfect in all things, not tainted at all with any passion, great or small, but of a nature sound, whole, and every way perfect." Κεχωρισμένος ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν, "separate from sinners." This must signify something different from ἄκακος, "free from evil," and undefiled by sin. And what can that be, besides what I have hinted in the paraphrase? Now to clear up this, let it be noted, that though the holy of holies was the place into which none entered but the high-priest, and he only "once a year," after a sin-offering had been first offered for him, yet God commands that an atonement should be made "for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins" (Lev. xvi. 16); i. e. because it was seated among an unclean people's: [19] for this (last) he did once, when he offered up himself.

28 For the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity, (subjecting them to sin, and by that to mortality, whence they have need to offer, as well for themselves as for the people, ver. 27;) but the word of the oath, which was since the law (as being in the psalms written, after it), maketh the Son (our high-priest), who is consecrated (to this office) for evermore (he being not subject to those infirmities which brought mortality upon others).

people, it needed an atonement. That therefore our high-priest might be every way clean and undefiled, he was to be not only free from sin, but also "separate from sinners," as the high-priest* was seven days before the expiation, and when he made the expiation (Lev. xvi. 17).

[19] Ver. 27. Τοῦτο γὰρ ἐποίησεν ἐφάπαξ, For this he did once for all.] Grotius and the Socinians contend, That Christ is here said to have offered up himself "for his own sins;" but then by sins, they say, is improperly signified his natural infirmities and sufferings. But where hath the word sin any such import? It is indeed sometimes applied to impurities, not moral, but only legal; as in the case of menstruous women, Lev. xii. 8, xv. 13, and to leprosies sent by the hand of God, for the punishment of sin, Lev. xiv. 30, but never to any thing which by the law of Moses was accounted no defilement. And how improper is it to make the same words, used but once, signify properly sin, when respecting the people, and only sufferings, with respect to Christ? Moreover, how did he offer up himself for his own sufferings? Did he suffer, that he might not suffer? or, that he might not be obnoxious to them? The interpretation therefore of all the ancient commentators, which I have given in the paraphrase, ought to stand, in opposition to this vain invention.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Now (for) of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: (i. e. To give you a summary of the things spoken in the former chapters, touching our high-priest, Christ Jesus; or, But the chief of the things spoken is this, That) we have (in him) such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, (there to officiate for us;

2 And who is therefore) A minister of the (heavenly) sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, [1] which the Lord pitched, and not man, (for by the Word of the Lord were the heavens made, Ps. xxxii.

3 A high-priest, I say, of the heavenly sanctuary, and therefore one who must have something to offer in that sanctuary:) For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices (in that sanctuary in which he executes that office): wherefore it is of necessity that this man (the high-priest in heaven) have somewhat also to offer (there.

4 I say there, and not on earth:) For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, (or, had he been (still) on earth, he had not been a priest at all,) seeing that there are (other) priests that (are appointed to) offer gifts according to the law:

5 [2] Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things (or, in that holy place and tabernacle which is an example and shadow of the heavenly), as (we learn from what) Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he (Exod. xxv. 40), that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VIII.

[1] Ver. 2. Ἣν ἔπηξεν ὁ Κύριος, The sanctuary which the Lord pitched and not man.] That is, of heaven itself. For, first, τὸ ἅγιον, in this epistle, being put absolutely, oft signifies "the heavenly sanctuary," the holy mansion in which the divine Majesty resides gloriously, in opposition to the ἅγιον κοσμικὸν "earthly holy," mentioned ix. 1. And "the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man," is the heavenly tabernacle, set in opposition to the χειροποίητον, or that of Moses, "which was made with hands," and styled by the Chaldee paraphrast, "the sanctuary above," in which the angels sing God's praises, Ps. xxix. 9. So, ix. 11, "Christ being come a high-priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, οὐ χειροποιήτου, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building, but by his own blood he entered once into the holy place" (ἐφάπαξ εἰς τὰ ἅγια, "once for all into the holy places"); x. 19, "Having freedom of access into the holy place, and having a high-priest over the house of God;" and, ix. 23, 24, "It was necessary that the examples of the things in the heavens should be purified with these, but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. For Christ entered not into the holy places made with hands, εἰς χειροποίητα ἅγια, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself, to appear now in the presence of God for us." And this is suitable to the old notions of the Jews, who oft declare, that the chief intention of making the tabernacle, and other things, was, That they might be a book of wisdom to instruct them in the things above, which they respected; and that when Moses made one tabernacle on earth, another was made by the angels in heaven (Buxt. Hist. Arcæ, p. 83, 84). It was also their opinion, that the second part of the tabernacle was made to be an image of the visible world; and "the holy of holies to be a resemblance, mundi supercœlestis, of the celestial world." So Philo* often calls the tabernacle of the Jews, τὸ χειροποίητον, and says, it was "a shadow or resemblance, τοῦ ἀρχετύπου, of the archetypal or original in heaven." Moses, says he, "framed τὰ ἀρχέτυπα, the archetypal plan of the tabernacle; Bezaleel only, τὰ αὐτῶν μιμήματα, the resemblance of things:" and this he proves by the apostle's argument, used ver. 5. For Moses, saith he, "used God for his guide, who said to him, See thou make all things according to the pattern shown thee in the mount. Bezaleel," saith he,† "signifies one, ἐν σκιαῖς ποιῶν, employed in making shadows; whereas Moses was employed, not to frame the shadows, but, ἀρχετύπους φύσεις αὐτὰς τῶν πραγμάτων, the archetypal natures of the things themselves."‡ Elsewhere he distinguisheth betwixt the τὰ ὁρώμενα ἐκ τῆς ἀψύχου καὶ φθαρτῆς δημιουργηθέντα ὕλης, "visible things of the tabernacle, made of inanimate and corruptible matter, and τὰ ἀόρατα καὶ τὰ νοητὰ θεωρήματα, the invisible and intellectual ideas, of which the other were the images."§ The first he calls, ἱερὸν χειροποίητον, "the sanctuary made with hands, of which Moses had the incorporeal ideas." And Josephus saith,‖ that "the second part of the tabernacle signified that earth in which men conversed, but the third part was appropriated to God, heaven being inaccessible to men;" which seems to be the very thing the apostle intendeth by those words, "The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet manifested, whilst the first tabernacle was yet standing," Heb. ix. 8.

6 But now hath he (Christ) obtained a more excellent ministry (viz. that of officiating in the heavenly sanctuary), by how much also (Gr. ὅσῳ καὶ, inasmuch as also) he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon [3] better promises.

7 (A better covenant, I say:) For if that first covenant (made by Moses with the Jews) had been [4] faultless (so that God should have found no cause of blaming them who lived under it), then should no place have been sought for (the introduction of) the second.

8 (But so it was not;) For finding fault with them (for the breach of it), he (i. e. the prophet) saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah:

9 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in (the observance of) my covenant, and dow.] These words, saith Mr. Le Clerc, "can by no means signify a prefiguration of something future," for heaven was a great while before the tabernacle and temple. But this argument is of no force; for though heaven be older than the tabernacle, yet that considered as a place in which the Jews then worshipped, and enjoyed communion with God, might be a type of that place in which they were hereafter to worship and enjoy him.

The argument of the apostle is to this effect: Christ could not be a priest on earth, because he could have there no tabernacle in which to offer sacrifice; the only place God had appointed upon earth to offer sacrifice in, being the Mosaical tabernacle, and the temple, in which no other sacrifices could be offered but those appointed by the law; no oblation made, or to be made, but by the Levitical priesthood. Moreover, this tabernacle being the shadow of the heavenly one, that must succeed it as the substance; therefore the oblation to be made by this high-priest after the order of Melchisedec, must be made in that tabernacle which was to succeed and follow this, as being the substance of that shadow. So Œcumenius here, "Had he not died, and been received up into heaven, οὐκ ἂν ἦν ἱερεύς, he had not been a priest."

[3] Ver. 6. Better promises.] Those of the law being only temporal promises, relating to blessings to be conferred upon them in the land of Canaan; this covenant had the promise of an eternal inheritance, to be conferred upon them in the celestial Canaan, ix. 15. These spiritual promises were indeed made to the fathers also of old, before the law, whence they are said by faith to look for a better country, that is, a heavenly, and to have expected "a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God," Heb. xi. 10. 16. But then these promises of a Saviour, and of such salvation by him, were not made in and by the law, but long before it (Rom. iv. 13, Gal. iii. 15. 17), as they must be, if made to them who lived and died long before it. Under the law also they had spiritual promises, and types of the Messiah in it, who was the promised seed, in whom all these promises were made, and by whom they were purchased; but then they had not these promises by the law, nor these blessings by the Levitical priesthood, but by the virtue of the Lamb slain from the beginning.

[4] Ver. 7. Ἄμεμπτος, If the first covenant had been faultless:] That is, say the fathers, εἰ ἀμέμπτους ἐποίει, "if it could have made them blameless that were under it." So Theodoret, Chrysostom, Œcumenius, Theophylact; and so the words following do force us to interpret this clause: for the apostle and the prophet plainly charge the breach of the old covenant upon the Jews themselves, blaming them for it, ver. 9. I know some interpreters render the words μεμφόμενος αὐτοῖς λέγει, "Blaming it, he saith to them;" but the observation of the ancient fathers is this, οὐκ εἶπε μεμφόμενος αὐτῇ, ἀλλὰ μεμφόμενος αὐτοῖς, "He said not, Blaming it, but, Blaming them;" and the words following, "Because they continued not in that covenant," do justify that exposition.

Obj. But you will say, How doth it follow that the covenant was faulty, because the Jews continued not in it, any more than that the new covenant is also faulty, because many Christians do not observe the conditions of it? I answer, That the word "faulty" doth not here signify sinful in itself, for so this apostle denies it to be faulty, Rom. vii. 7, but only imperfect and defective as to the great end of the covenant, "Do this, and live," it being a law "that could not give life" (Gal. iii. 21), and as to preserving those that were under it from offending, and so becoming blameworthy, and obnoxious before God (Rom. iii. 29). This being premised, I say, two things show, that the prophet and the apostle so lay the fault on them, as plainly to insinuate, there was also an imperfection and deficiency in the law they were under, which ministered occasion to it; first, because he lays the blame not on some refractory persons only, but on the whole house of Israel and Judah. Now where all, good and bad, come under blame, there must be some imperfection and defect in the law, with reference to the two great ends aforementioned. Secondly, because, for the prevention of this blame, God, by his prophet, doth not call them to a more exact observance of that law and covenant, but promiseth a new covenant; plainly insinuating thereby, that there was need of a new and better covenant, to prevent their transgression, and render them fit objects of his grace and favour for the future. Accordingly this weakness of the law is by Paul resolved, partly into such causes as respect the offenders, and partly into such as respect the law itself: into such as respect the offenders, as ver. 9, "the weakness of the flesh," which made them unable to perform that exact obedience the law required, and so it became unable to justify them; "for this the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh" (Rom. viii. 3), and their carnal inclinations, which made them averse to the spiritual precepts of the law (Rom. vii. 14). And this the new covenant remedied, by requiring, not perfect, but only sincere obedience, as the condition of those blessings which it promiseth, and giving the assistance of the Holy Spirit to perform that obedience. For, to come to the imperfections of the law itself, compared with this new covenant;

First, The first is this, that the law required exact obedience, but gave no inward spiritual assistance for the performance of that duty. Hence the apostle puts this difference betwixt the law and the gospel, that the first is only "the ministration of the letter," the second is "the ministration of the Spirit" (2 Cor. iii.): that under the law, the Jews served God "in the oldness of the letter;" whereas under the gospel, we serve him "in the newness of the Spirit" (Rom. vii. 6): that then the inclinations and desires of the things forbidden by the law, "wrought in our members to bring forth fruit unto death;" whereas, "if we, through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the flesh, we shall live" (Rom. viii. 13); then, "the good which they would, they did not" (Rom. vii. 19); but now, "the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit" (Rom. viii. 4).

Secondly, The law not only made all that were subject to it obnoxious to condemnation for the guilt of sin, but also was unable to remove that guilt, and clear the conscience from the sense and terror of it. It could not justify us, saith the apostle; "for by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified" (Rom. iii. 23, Gal. ii. 16), i. e. it could not absolve us from condemnation on the account of sin: it "could not, by the sacrifices it offered daily, take away the guilt of sins" (Heb. x. 4. 11), and so could not make the worshipper perfect as pertaining to conscience (Heb. ix. 9); whereas, by virtue of the blood of Christ, a full remission of them was procured, so that God would remember them no more (Heb. x. 17, 18), and so the conscience was by it purified from dead works (Heb. ix. 14).

Thirdly, The law, considered not as moral, that being the law common to all mankind, but as purely Mosaical, contained in it only ceremonial precepts, which had no real or intrinsic goodness in them to commend them to our practice: whence, by the apostle, it is said to consist of outward and "carnal ordinances, imposed on them only till the time

I (thr fore) [5] regarded them not, saith the Lord (Jer. xxxi. 31—33).

10 (I say, not according to that covenant:) For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people:

11 And they shall not (have need to) teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest.

12 (I say, I will be their God:) For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

13 In that he saith, [6] A new covenant, he hath made of reformation" (Heb. ix. 10), and to contain only "the elements of the world" (Gal. iv. 3), "weak and beggarly elements" (ver. 9), whereas the new covenant is a law written in the heart (ver. 12).

Lastly, As the Mosaical law had no inward goodness to commend it, so also was it wanting in the promise of those spiritual and eternal blessings, which are the sovereign motives to obedience, and to purification of ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit; whereas, by virtue of the death of Christ, "a promise of an eternal inheritance is procured for us" (Heb. ix. 15), and "an entrance into the holy of holies through the blood of Jesus" (x. 19). On which account the apostle saith, "The law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did" (Heb. vii. 19).

[5] Ver. 9. And I regarded them not.] Κἀγὼ ἠμέλησα αὐτῶν. So the Septuagint, and from them the apostle; whereas the Hebrew runs ואנכי בעלתי בם "And," or "Though I was a husband to them:" but the learned Dr. Pocock hath shown, that the Hebrew בעל not only signifies in the Arabic, to govern, and be a husband, but also to refuse, despise, and nauseate. And so it well accords with the words of the Septuagint.

[6] Ver. 13.] For explication of this new covenant, let it be considered,

First, That it is expressly promised to be made with the whole house of Israel, with them to whom the old covenant was made, with them who were brought out of the land of Egypt; it therefore is not a promise made to, or a covenant made with, some few elect and chosen people out of Israel and Judah, but with those who "abode not" in their former covenant, and so were "not regarded" by God. Now hence it is manifest,

That this can be no promise of absolute election, or vouchsafing irresistible grace to any of the Jews, because then the whole nation of the Jews must have been converted. (2.) Because this is a promise of something to be done "in the last times," or in the times of the Messiah, whereas God hath at all times his elect, and doth at all times vouchsafe them his effectual grace. (3.) Because this is here called a covenant, which implies two parties covenanting, or stipulating; the one obedience, and the other blessings on the performance of it; whereas an absolute promise permits of no conditions. (4.) The elect always persisted in their covenant with God, and were always regarded by him; they always were his people, and he always was their God; this therefore can be no new covenant with them.

Secondly, This being a promise of a new covenant, of which new covenant Christ is declared here to be the mediator through his blood, it cannot properly be said to be fulfilled, in the complete import of it, before our Saviour's sufferings, and the preaching of justification through faith in his blood. Nor seems it to have been yet accomplished in the extent and the full meaning of it, as it will be, when the blindness of the Jews shall be removed, "and so all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 25, 26): "for this is God's covenant with them, when he shall take away their sins" (ver. 28); which though he did make good at the first preaching of the gospel to as many as believed in Jesus; yet, since that was the time of the falling and casting off the generality of that nation, "a remnant" only being then preserved from Judaical blindness, I believe there will be a time, when this, and other like promises made to them in the Old Testament, shall have a more complete accomplishment. But to proceed to the proper import of the words;

First, I conceive that the phrase, "I will put my laws into their minds, and write them on their hearts," imports that he would clearly and conspicuously make known his will to them, and by his Holy Spirit make such a deep impression of it on their spirits, and so continually bring it to their remembrance, that it should be as powerful upon them, and as present to them, as if it were writ upon their hearts. For these two metaphors, both in the scripture and the Jewish writers, chiefly signify two things;

1. A clear and perspicuous revelation of the mind and will of God, so that we need not be at much pains to search it out: as in these words, "The commandment which I command thee this day, is not hidden from thee, neither it is far from thee: the word is near unto thee, in thy mouth, καὶ ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ σου, and in thy heart, and in thy hands, that thou shouldest do it. See, I have set before thee life and death" (Deut. xxx. 11. 14, 15). And so, saith the apostle, it is with "that word of faith which we preach;" it is nigh to the Christian in his mouth to confess, and in his heart to believe it (Rom. x. 8, 9). And the law written in the hearts of heathens, is the law so plainly taught them, that their own consciences do inwardly condemn them when they do transgress it (Rom. ii. 15). This also is apparent from the consequent effect of writing this law in the Christian hearts, and "putting it in their inward parts;" viz. "that they shall have no need to teach every one his neighbour, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know him from the least to the greatest." This law therefore must be plain to the capacities of, and easy to be perceived by, them all: and to this interpretation the fathers* give a general consent.

2. An efficacious impression of them on the soul, and on the memory, so that we do not let them slip out of our minds. So Deut. vi. 6, "These words which I command thee this day shall be in thy heart;" "They shall be כתיבין על לוח ליבכון, writ upon the table of thy heart," saith Jonathan ben Uziel; "and thou shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up" (ver. 7); "They shall be ἐν καρδίᾳ καὶ ψυχῇ σου, in thy heart and soul," saith the Septuagint. As the expression is, Deut. xi. 18, by which expressions he requires μὴ ἀποστῆναι τὸν νόμον ἀπὸ τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν, "that the law should not depart from their hearts" (2 Macc. ii. 3): so, Prov. vii. 1, "My son, forget not my law, but let thy heart keep my commandments;" ver. 3, "Write them upon the table of thy heart." And again, vii. 1, "My son, keep my words, and lay up my commandments with thee: bind them upon thy finger, write them upon the table of thy heart," ver. 3. So the Targum on Cant. viii. 9 saith, God will remember them for the sake of the law which is written, על לוח דלבא, "upon the table of the heart of his children." And, Jer. xvii. 1, the sin of Judah is said to be "written on the table of their hearts;" as if the memory of it, and affection to it, could never be obliterated. And the Targum on Job xxx. 4, saith, "They who let the law slip על לוח לבהון, from the table of their hearts, burning coals shall be their meat." So frequent is this phrase in this sense, both in the scripture and the Jewish writers. Accordingly, Clemens gives this commendation of the Corinthians, that "the commandments of the Lord, ἐπὶ τὰ πλάκη τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν ἐγέγραπτο, were written upon the tables of their hearts."

Secondly, That the words in which this new covenant is framed, Jer. xxxi. 33—35, may have a more exact and full completion, at the second calling of the Jewish nation, this apostle seems to intimate, Rom. xi. 27; but that they also were fulfilled by the first advent of our Lord, can only be denied by them who think, with Mr. Le Clerc, that the apostle argues upon unsound foundations: for he most clearly saith, (1.) That the old covenant was only to continue till the new covenant, in which God promised to "be merciful to their iniquities," took place; and also, that this new covenant was established "in the blood of Jesus, the mediator of a better covenant," ver. 6, and proves that Christ had by his sufferings perfectly procured the remission of the sins of them that were sanctified, or cleansed from the guilt of sin, by faith in his blood, by the words of this new covenant, x. 14—17. (2.) He says, that the old covenant, there mentioned, was to "vanish away" at the coming of this new covenant, ver. 13, and thereby intimates, that this new covenant, mentioned Jer. xxx. 33, began to take place, even from the abolition of the old covenant, consisting in ordinances which were only to continue "till the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 11), and which were taken away by the death of Christ.

This therefore seems to be one of those places which prove there will be a double completion of the promises and predictions combined in the Old, and perhaps in the New Testament, and thereby show they may admit of a double sense, the one relating to the first, the other to the second coming of our Lord.

[7] Ἐγγὺς ἀφανισμοῦ, Is ready to vanish away.] Though the Judaical sacrifices, which signified the death of Christ, after his death, ceased to be obliging, and their discrimination from all other nations on the account of circumcision, and the distinction of meats, ceased, as Paul often testifies; yet these words seem to intimate, that the church, state, and polity of the Jews was not to come to its full period, till the destruction of the temple and city of Jerusalem.

CHAPTER IX.

1 (The apostle had declared, viii. 5, that the tabernacle had only a shadow of heavenly things; this he now proceeds to show in the following words:) Then verily [1] the first covenant had (εἶχε μὲν οὖν πρώτη σκηνή, the first tabernacle therefore had) also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary (in which that worship and these ordinances were performed).

2 For there was a tabernacle made; the first (Gr. σκηνὴ γὰρ κατεσκευάσθη ἡ πρώτη, for a first tabernacle was prepared), wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the shewbread; which (first tabernacle) is [2] called the sanctuary (or, holy).

3 And after the second veil, the (other) tabernacle (was prepared, ver. 2. 6) which is called the Holiest of all;

4 Which had (for its use) the [3] golden censer (used only on the day of expiation), and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, [4] wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded (Numb. xvii. 10, Exod. xvi. 33, 34), and the tables of the covenant (1 Kings viii. 9);

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IX.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἡ πρώτη διαθήκη, The first covenant.] Some of the ancients, as Chrysostom, read only ἡ πρώτη, but none of them read διαθήκη, but many of them σκηνὴ, as Theodoret and Œcumenius; and this I believe to be the true reading: for it is well observed by the fathers, who do, and who do not read the word σκηνὴ, that the apostle having before proved from the enallage of the priest and priesthood, and of the former covenant, that an end was put unto the Jewish constitutions, proceeds now to prove the same from the consideration of that tabernacle which was "a shadow of good things to come." Secondly, because the thread or the contexture of the apostle's argument seems plainly to require this reading: for the tabernacle, consisting of two parts, an outward house called "the holy place," and an inward house called "the holy of holies;" the apostle here calleth the outward house "the first tabernacle," and discourses of it as such, ver. 1, 2; and then, ver. 3, proceeds to the "holy of holies," or "the second tabernacle," saying, "The first or outward tabernacle had a worldly sanctuary," in which the rites of the Jewish worship were performed; for a first tabernacle was prepared by Moses, containing such and such things; and then a second, containing other things: now this first tabernacle is called "a worldly tabernacle," because, as both the Jews and fathers say, it was designed to represent this lower world; the earth and the sea, saith Josephus.* It was κόσμου τοῦ αἰσθητοῦ σύμβολον, "a symbol of the sensitive world," saith Clemens Alexandrinus† (see Dr. Spencer, De Legibus Hebr. p. 188).

The δικαιώματα λατρείας are the constitutions, or the rites and rules of worship prescribed to be used in the service of the tabernacle; δικαιώματα, τουτέστι, σύμβολα, ξεσμοὺς, νομοθεσίας, "ordinances, that is, symbols, constitutions, laws." So Chrysostom, Œcumenius, Theophylact.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἥτις λέγεται ἁγία, which is called the Sanctuary.] Or, as other copies read, ἥτις λέγεται ἁγία, "which is called holy." Vain therefore is the argument of Mr. Le Clerc, that the writer of this epistle did not well understand Hebrew, and therefore cannot be thought to have been St. Paul, but rather some Grecian; to wit, because he calls the sanctuary only ἅγια, "holies;" whereas, according to the constant usage of the Hebrew, he should have called it ἅγια τῶν ἁγίων, "holy of holies." For (1.) all this depends on an uncertain accent; read but ἁγία, and there is no foundation for this argument; seeing, then, the apostle speaks not of the sanctuary, but of the first tabernacle, which was only called "holy." And so Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact read; and Theodoret observes that the tabernacle was divided into two parts by the veil, the one was called "holy," the other "the holy of holies," and that ἡ πρώτη εἶπεν, ὡς πρὸς τὰ ἅγια τῶν ἁγίων, the apostle calls this the first tabernacle, to distinguish it from the sanctuary; as it is evident he doth from the verse following, which demonstrates that ἁγία is the true reading in this verse. (2.) It depends upon a false criticism, for מן הקדש, 1 Kings viii. 8, signifies ex adyto, or "from the most holy place," where the ark was as appears from 2 Chron. v. 8 (see Dr. Lightfoot's Treatise of the Temple, ch. 15, sect. 4).

[3] Ver. 4. Χρυσοῦν θυμιατήριον, The golden censer.] Of this golden censer the Jews inform us, that it was only used on the great day of expiation, when the high-priest entered into "the holy of holies;" and that on other days they offered incense in a silver censer. So Maimonides and Abarbanel (see Buxt. Hist. Arcæ, p. 76).

[4] Ἐν ᾗ, In which, &c.] Of the ark the scripture saith expressly, that there was "nothing in it but the tables of the covenant," 1 Kings viii. 9, 2 Chron. v. 10; whereas "the pot of manna and Aaron's rod" are here said to be also in it. To solve this difficulty, some interpreters say, that as, ver. 2, the apostle tells us what was in the first tabernacle, viz. the candlestick, the table, and the shew-bread; so here he seems to tell us, not what was strictly in the ark, but in the holy of holies, saying, it had for its use "the golden censer; and the ark, and in it the tables of the covenant; the pot of manna and Aaron's rod:" but the words "Over it were the cherubims," relating not to the holy of holies, but to the ark, confute that exposition.

Others say, that the pot of manna and Aaron's rod are said to be in the ark, as being placed in the receptacles of the ark, or the coffers in the side of it, mentioned Deut. xxxi. 26, 1 Sam. vi. 8. Hence they are said to be laid up, not in but "before the ark of the testimony," Exod. xvi. 34, Numb. xvii. 10, or "with the ark," as ב, which answers to

* Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 8. † Strom. v. p. 562, B.

5 And over it (the ark, were) the [5] cherubims of glory shadowing the mercyseat; of which we cannot now speak particularly (so as to give the mystical signification of them).

6 Now when these things were thus ordained (or, things being thus prepared), the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God.

7 But into the second went the high priest alone [6] once every year, (i. e. one day only in the year, and then) not without blood, which he offered for himself (first), and (then) for the [7] errors of (Gr. sins of ignorance committed by) the people:

8 The Holy Ghost (by whose afflatus Moses was directed to prepare the tabernacle) this signifying (by this admission of the high-priest alone, and that but once a year, and that then only when all the people were gone out of the tabernacle of the congregation), that [8] the way into the (true) holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing:

9 Which was a figure for the time then present (ἥτις [9] παραβολὴ εἰς τὸν καιρὸν τὸν ἐνεστηκότα, which figure continues till this present time, viz. in the like service performed in the temple), in which were (προσφέρονται, are) offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not (μὴ δυνάμεναι, which sacrifice cannot) make him that did the service (i. e. who brings these gifts and offerings) [10] perfect, as pertaining to the conscience;

ἐν, here signifies, viz. cum, ad, propè, juxta (see Noldius de Partic. p. 144, 145). So ἐν Γαβαὼν is "near Gibeon," Josh. x. 10, and ἐν Καριαθιαρὶμ, "near Kirjath-jearim," Judg. xviii. (Bochart. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 50, p. 590). And this exposition solves the difficulty, and agrees fully with the tradition of the Jews; for that there were such capsulas to the ark for this use is owned, saith Buxtorf,* both by the Talmud of Jerusalem and Babylon. Maimonides saith,† There was a stone in the west part of the holy of holies, on which the ark was placed, and "before it the pot of manna, and the rod of Aaron." Moses Mikkotsi says the same, and Abarbanel adds,‡ that "our interpreters write, that this place does not deny that the pot of manna and the rod of Aaron were kept there for the children of Israel, as it is said in a certain tradition of our rabbins."

[5] Ver. 5. Cherubims of glory.] So called, because "the glory of the Lord" dwelt between the cherubims, and shined forth from them; Ps. lxxx. 1, "Thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth:" and they being emblems of the angelical nature, were also emblems of the divine presence, before which the angels stood continually.

[6] Ver. 7. Ἅπαξ τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ, Once every year.] The priest entered into the holy of holies on the great day of expiation four times, to offer incense (Lev. xvi. 12), to offer the blood of the goat (ver. 15), and to make an atonement for himself (ver. 17), which makes it necessary to paraphrase the words as I have done.

[7] Καὶ τῶν τοῦ λαοῦ ἀγνοημάτων, And for the ignorance of the people.] It is certain that the law allowed of sacrifices for sins committed not out of mere ignorance; i. e. for lying and false swearing (Lev. vi. 1. 6). We therefore must either say with Vatablus and Munster in locum, that sins committed through the violence of our passions and affections are called sins of ignorance, and so they stand opposed to sins of presumption (Numb. xv. 27, 28. 30), or that the sins of the people are here so styled because they are mostly such.

[8] Ver. 8. Τὴν τῶν ἁγίων ὁδὸν, The way into the holy of holies,] i. e. Into the heavens, was not yet revealed nor opened. Thus did the Jews themselves interpret this symbol, saying, that* "the adytum, ὃ τοῖς ἱερεῦσιν ἦ ἄβατον, which was inaccessible to the priests, represented the heaven where God dwelt." This interpretation all the ancient commentators give us of this place, viz. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, saying, These things were so prepared, that they might learn, ὅτι τὰ ἅγια τῶν ἁγίων, τουτέστιν, ὁ οὐρανὸς, ἔτι ἐστὶν ἄβατος, that is, "that heaven, represented by the holy of holies, was as yet inaccessible," for Christ first entered into heaven, καὶ βατὸν ἡμῖν τοῦτον ἀπέφηνε, "and so rendered it accessible to us:" and therefore, as the apostle saith here, μήπω πεφανερῶσθαι τὴν τῶν ἁγίων ὁδὸν, "The way into this holy of holies was not yet manifested," so he saith in the next chapter, that we Christians have τὴν εἴσοδον τῶν ἁγίων ἐν τῷ αἵματι Ἰησοῦ, "an entrance into heaven by the blood of Jesus," and ὁδὸν πρόσφατον, "a new way which he hath made new through his flesh;" i. e. our forerunner being thus entered into heaven with his blood to appear before God, and so to prepare these mansions for us, the way of our entrance into heaven is now made manifest. And this the ancients say was signified by the rending of the veil, at our Lord's death; viz. τὰ ἄβατα εἶναι λοιπὸν βατὰ, τὸν οὐρανὸν ἀνοιγήσεσθαι, that heaven, before inaccessible, was now opened, and a way was made into the true holy of holies (Chrysostom, Hom. lxxxviii. in Matt. p. 541); and the hope of Christians being now to "enter within the veil," because our forerunner is gone before (Heb. vi. 19, 20), seems to intimate the same thing.

[9] Ver. 9. Ἥτις παραβολὴ εἰς τὸν καιρὸν τὸν ἐνεστηκότα, καθ' ὃν, &c.] Here the Vulgar and Œcumenius read καθ' ἣν, which, saith Dr. Mills, is the true reading, adding, that κατὰ συνείδησιν, accessit aliunde, has been added to the text. The second opposes the Ethiopic, which is a version of no credit, to the Syriac, Arabic, Vulgar, all the Greek scholiasts, and Cyrillus Alexandrinus, who all own the reading of the text: which liberty, if it be allowed, the scripture must be a very uncertain and precarious rule. In the first, the reading of the text is approved by Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, Cyril of Alexandria, de Ador. Sp. p. 357, and by all the eastern versions. The other reading indeed gives a very good sense thus, Which tabernacle was a figure of the present time, according to which figure, gifts and sacrifices were offered;—but since the reading of the text, which runs thus, Which figure continues to this present time, in which, by the Jews, are still offered gifts and sacrifices,—bears the same sense, and is supported by better authority, what reason can be given why it should be changed?

[10] Τελειῶσαι κατὰ συνείδησιν, To perfect according to the conscience.] The best account of this phrase relating to what the law and its sacrifices could not do, may be learned from what the new covenant, and the blood of Christ, in which it was established, is said to do. First, then, that blood, offered in the presence of God, is said to take away sins εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, so as that there shall be no return of them upon the conscience; no need of any more oblation for the sins of such a person; there being in him no more consciousness of guilt, after his justification by faith in the blood of Jesus; "for where remission of sins is, there is no more offering for sins," because the tenor of the new covenant runs thus. "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more" (x. 17, 18). Hence the apostle argues thus, "That the law, with those sacrifices which were offered every year, could not εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς τελειῶσαι, perfect for ever them that come to God with them, because, (if they could have done that,) the worshippers once purged by them would have had no more conscience of sins" (Heb. x. 1, 2); i. e. they would not have been still conscious of the guilt of sin, and so could have no need yearly to repeat the same sacrifices. And of our Saviour's sacrifice he speaketh thus, "That by one offering, τετελείωκεν εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified," i. e. are purged by it from the guilt of sin (Heb. x. 14). Wherefore, to "perfect according to the conscience," is so fully to expiate from the guilt of sin, that it shall no more be remembered by God, and we shall have no more conscience of the guilt of it. Now the consequents of this full remission are these two, (1.) A coming unto God with freedom and full assurance of acceptance with him. This the apostle frequently ascribes unto the death of Christ, who "suffered for our sins that he might bring us to God" (1 Pet. iii. 18), saying, "By him" who hath reconciled us to God by the cross, "we have freedom and access with confidence to the Father, by faith in him" (Eph. ii. 16. 18, iii. 12); and upon that account exhorts us to "come to him in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience" (Heb. x. 22). (2.) A right of entrance into heaven. This, saith the apostle, could not be obtained by the service of the tabernacle (ver. 8), but only by the death of Christ, by which the way into the holy of holies is laid open (x. 19, 20), eternal redemption is obtained for us (ix. 12), and we receive the promise of an eternal inheritance; and so it consequently signifies to have a full assurance of acceptance with God here, and of happiness with him hereafter.

Which could not perfect according to the conscience.] To clear up what has been said upon this verse, let it be noted, that God declares the tenor of the new covenant should run thus: "I will be merciful to their iniquities, and remember their sins no more." Whence observe,

First, That there was no such promise or condition made under the old covenant, that requiring for every new sin of ignorance a new oblation; whereas sins of ignorance and infirmity being not contrary to the sincerity of our obedience, they do not violate the new covenant, and so are pardoned by virtue of the blood of the new covenant, shed ἐφάπαξ, "once for all, for the remission of sins:" for if we thus sin, saith the apostle John, "we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins," 1 John ii. 2; "and if we walk in the light as he is in the light, the blood of Christ cleanseth us from all sin," 1 John i. 7.

Secondly, Observe, that the legal sacrifices served only for the purification of the flesh from ceremonial defilements, and restored to them only a right to the benefits of the Mosaical covenant, viz. life and prosperity in the land of Canaan, but did not so far purify the conscience, as to procure them an admittance into the heavenly Canaan, which, if they had entirely cleansed them from the guilt and the defilement of sin, they would have done; and hence the apostle says, the way into the holy of holies was not opened, whilst the first tabernacle was standing (ver. 8, see the note there).

[11] Ver. 10. Μέχρι καιροῦ διορθώσεως, Till the time of the reformation.] That is, as the next verse expounds it, till the coming of Christ, the Messiah of the Jews, when they themselves expected a "reformation of the law," saying, that "the law which was learned in that age was vanity, in respect of the law of the age to come;"* that is, saith the gloss on Eccles. xi. 8, לפני תורתו של משיח, "in respect of the law of the Messiah;" and that "then the law will be renewed." For our doctors, saith the author of Sephir Ikkarim,† declare, that "all Israel shall receive a second law from the mouth of God immediately, as formerly;" and this they all prove, as the apostle doth, ch. viii., from Jer. xxxi. 31—33.

[12] Ver. 11.] That the tabernacle here mentioned is not the body of Christ, but heaven itself, see note on viii. 2.

[13] Ver. 12. Αἰωνίαν λύτρωσιν, Eternal redemption.] Here it is evident, (1.) that this our high-priest had procured for us a perfect and perpetual expiation from the guilt of sin; and this Schlictingius on the place fully grants. (2.) That this λύτρωσις, or "redemption," was procured by the blood of Christ, we having ἀπολύτρωσιν, "redemption through his blood, even the remission of sin" (Eph. i. 7). That therefore was the λύτρον, or "price" paid, to procure this redemption. That this ἀπολύτρωσις παραβάσεων, "redemption from transgressions" was made θανάτου γενομένου, "by the death of Christ," suffering as a piacular victim for us, there being no other way of procuring this remission under the law (ver. 22), and so no other known to, or heard of by, the Jews. And, lastly, that suffering thus, he must also suffer in our stead, as all piacular victims did. Whence he is said "to give his life, λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, a ransom for many," Matt. xx. 28, ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων, "a ransom for all," 1 Tim. ii. 5 (see the note there).

[14] Ver. 13. Ἁγιάζει πρὸς τὴν τῆς σαρκὸς καθαρότητα, Sanctifies to the purifying of the flesh.] It is truly observed by the reverend Dr. Hammond, that to "sanctify to the purifying of flesh," is to make legally clean, i. e. so as that they might come into the congregation again, it being the sanctification τῶν κεκοινωμένων, "of the unclean;" but still in a metophorical signification, as cleansing signifies expiation, and obtaining pardon of sin; and when this is done by a sacrifice, ἁγιάζειν signifies to expiate, and cleanse from guilt by virtue of it. In which sense it is used throughout this epistle, and that agreeably to the import of it, when it relates to sacrifices in the Old Testament. So x. 10, ἡγιασμένοι ἐσμὲν, "We are sanctified;" i. e. are purged from the guilt of sin "by the body," or, as other copies read, "by the blood of Christ, offered once for all." And, ver. 15, "By one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified;" i. e. hath entirely purged them who by this offering are cleansed from the guilt of sin: "he being offered once, εἰς τὸ πολλῶν ἀνενεγκεῖν τὰς ἁμαρτίας, to bear, or take away, the sins of many, and εἰς ἀθέτησιν ἁμαρτίας, for the putting away sin by the sacrifice of himself," ix. 26, 27; and, ver. 29, where it is styled "the blood of the covenant, ἐν ᾧ ἡγιάσθη, by which he," who now counted it as common, "was sanctified," or cleansed from the guilt of sin; it being the blood shed for the remission of sin, the blood of that new covenant which said, "I will be merciful to their impieties, and their sins and their transgressions will I remember no more," ver. 17, 18: so, xiii. 12, "Therefore Jesus, that he might sanctify the people by his own blood, suffered without the camp:" where both the blood sanctifying, and περὶ ἁμαρτίας, "the sacrifice for sin," ver. 11, to which it answers, show that Christ sanctified the people by the oblation of himself as a sin-offering, to cleanse them from the guilt of sin (see the note on Heb. ii. 11).

[15] Ver. 14. Διὰ Πνεύματος αἰωνίου.] The Vulgar, Chrysostom, and Cyril. Alex. de R. Fide, p. 73, read ἁγίου, but Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, Athanas. Ep. ad Serap. p. 180, Ambros. de Sp. S. cap. 8, Cod. Alex. Syr. Arab. read as the text.

[16] Ἑαυτὸν προσήνεγκεν, Offered himself without spot to God.] In heaven, saith Dr. Hammond: for that oblation, saith Grotius, must be here understood, which answers to the legal oblation made in the holy of holies, which the oblation of 15 [19] And for this cause (διὰ τοῦτο, or, by his blood) he is (become) the mediator of the new testament (in which he promises to be merciful to our iniquities), that by means of (his) death, [20] for the redemption of the transgressions that were (committed by us) under the first testament (and not by that fully expiated), they which are called (to be God's church and people) might receive [21] the promise of (an) eternal inheritance.

Christ upon the cross doth not, but his oblation in the heavens. Against this interpretation some object, that Christ presenting himself with his blood in the heavens, is never styled an oblation; but that is a plain mistake (see note on viii. 3, 4), and of evil consequence: for if Christ had no oblation to offer in heaven, he could not be a high-priest there, since every high-priest must have something to offer in that sanctuary, in which he exercises his priestly office. But yet it being said, not that he offered up his blood, but that προσήνεγκεν ἑαυτὸν, "he offered up himself," which he did upon the cross (Eph. v. 2, Heb. ix. 25. 28), and the προσφορὰ, or oblation of the sacrifice, being properly the giving it up to the death, or to be a piacular victim in the sinner's stead, these words may very well be thus interpreted, Who, through the Holy Spirit, by which he was sanctified from the very womb, offered himself a piacular victim without spot to God. But then the blood of Christ here mentioned, as "purging the conscience from dead works," must be his blood presented before God in the heavenly sanctuary; for the apostle had spoken before, ver. 7, of the blood brought into the holy of holies by the Aaronical high-priest, and declared that it could not perfectly expiate the conscience from the guilt of sin, ver. 10; and therefore here the analogy requires that he should speak of the blood of Christ, brought by our high-priest into the heavenly sanctuary. Moreover, he had said before, that he entered with his blood into the holy of holies, ver. 12, and therefore, ver. 14, must be still speaking of the effect or influence of this blood, there presented for us.

[17] Καθαριεῖ τὴν συνείδησιν ἀπὸ νεκρῶν ἔργων, Purge the conscience from dead works.] Τὸ καθαρίζειν, here, as the comparison clearly shows, being in sense the same with ἁγιάζειν in the verse preceding, must signify the cleansing of the conscience not from the inclination to sin, by the Holy Spirit, but from the guilt of sin, by the blood shed for the remission of it. And, secondly, this is the constant sense of the word καθαρίζειν in the Old Testament, when joined with ἀπὸ ἁμαρτιῶν. So Lev. xiv. 19, "The priest shall make an atonement for him that is to be cleansed from his uncleanness," ἐξιλάσεται ὁ ἱερεὺς περὶ τοῦ καθαριζομένου ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας αὐτοῦ. And, xvi. 30, "The priest shall make an atonement for you to cleanse you, καθαρίσαι ὑμᾶς ἀπὸ πασῶν τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ὑμῶν, from all your sins" (so Josh. xxii. 17, Ps. li. 3, Jer. xxxiii. 8, Ezek. xxiv. 13). Hence then it follows, that the dead works, from which their conscience was to be thus cleansed, must signify works which deserved death by the tenor of the old covenant.

[18] Λατρεύειν Θεῷ ζῶντι, To serve the living God.] God, being a holy God, can enter into covenant with none, or admit them into his service, whilst they lie under the guilt of sin unpardoned, and so have not found grace in his sight. Noah found grace in the eyes of God, and with him he established his covenant, Gen. vi. 8. 18. Abraham believes in God, and "this was counted to him for righteousness;" and then the Lord makes a covenant with him by sacrifice, Gen. xv. 10. 18. So Exod. xxiv. 6, the Jews offer burnt-offerings, and sacrifice peace-offerings to the Lord, and the blood is sprinkled upon all the people, and then he enters into covenant with them. Hence the apostle saith, "Let us draw nigh to God with full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil (or condemning) conscience," Heb. x. 22.

[19] Ver. 15. Διὰ τοῦτο,] May either relate to the end of Christ's mediatory office, and so be rendered "for this end," or, "for this cause;" or to the means, by which that new covenant, of which he is the mediator, was established, and then it will be best rendered, "by this blood;" his blood being styled "the blood of the new covenant," Matt. xxvi. 28, Mark xiv. 24, and the covenant being styled "the new covenant in his blood," Luke xxii. 20, 1 Cor. xi. 25.

[20] Εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῶν ἐπὶ τῇ πρώτῃ διαθήκῃ παραβάσεων, For the redemption of sins under the first covenant.] Paul's design, in the Epistles to the Romans and the Galatians, is to show, that the law could not justify any man, i. e. that it could not procure his absolution from the guilt of sin, but rather left all guilty before God; and his design in this epistle is to show, that the sacrifices offered, under the law, could never take away sin (x. 4). And hence ariseth the necessity that Christ should shed his blood for the redemption, i. e. for the remission of sins committed under the old covenant, before we could be capable of entering into the new, or have a right to the blessings of it.

[21] Τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν, The promise of an eternal inheritance.] The immediate promise of the new covenant, established in the blood of Christ, is "remission of sins" (x. 17); but then this being an "eternal redemption" from them (ver. 12), and such as "perfects for ever them that are sanctified" (x. 14), upon it necessarily follows the promise of an eternal inheritance, there being nothing to exclude us from it, but the guilt of sin. Hence is there a close connexion betwixt Christ's overcoming death, and "bringing life and immortality to light;" and this emphatically is styled the promise of the gospel, Tit. i. 2, 1 John i. 2, v. 11.

[22] Ver. 16. Ἀνάγκη φέρεσθαι, There must be.] "There must be produced," saith Dr. Hammond, as the word φέρειν signifies, John xviii. 28, Acts xxv. 7; "There must intervene;" so Schmidius and Budæus.

[23] Ver. 19. Τὸ αἷμα τῶν μόσχων, &c. The blood of calves and goats.] There seems no need of the conjecture of Bishop Usher and others, that besides the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings mentioned by Moses, Exod. xxiv. 5, there were then offered sin-offerings, the holocausts themselves being expiatory sacrifices; as is evident from these words, Lev. i. 4, "He shall put his hand on the head of the burnt-offering, and it shall be accepted for him to make an atonement for him." Now the Jewish* doctors tell us, that this imposition of hands was always joined with confession of sins over the sacrifice, which confession still concluded with a prayer, that the sacrifice might be an expiation for them. And the phrase, "It shall be accepted, ἐξιλάσασθαι περὶ αὐτοῦ, to make an atonement for him," used here, and Lev. xiv. 20, concerning holocausts, is as much as ever is said of expiatory sacrifices. (2.) This may be farther urged from the word כפר, used concerning holocausts, Lev. i. 3; that being the word used to import expiation for sin; on which account the Syriac version saith, that the burnt-offering was designed, ad placationem obtinendam à Deo, "to appease God;" and the Chaldee* paraphrast, that the burnt-offering came ad expiandum pro cogitationibus cordis, "to expiate for the thoughts of the heart." And it was the general opinion of the Jews, saith Dr. Outram,† that some kind of sins were expiated by holocausts. And, (3.) all the sacrifices of living creatures, before the law, were holocausts; and yet it is certain that many of them were offered to appease God, and expiate for sin. Thus Noah, after the flood, offered burnt-offerings, Gen. viii. 20; and yet Josephus, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 4, hath informed us, that he offered a sacrifice to atone God, and appease his displeasure. The sacrifices which Job offered for his children were burnt-offerings, yet were they also offerings for sin, Job i. 5; the reason of their oblation being assigned, "It may be that my sons have sinned." The oblation which God commanded his friends to make, was a burnt-offering, Job xliii. 7, and yet it was offered to appease God's wrath, and prevailed, with the prayer of Job, λύειν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν αὐτοῖς, "to procure absolution from their sin." Nevertheless, because Josephus, speaking of this matter, mentions the blood, τῶν κριῶν σφαγέντων, "of the rams slain," as the apostle doth τῶν τράγων, "the blood of the goats;" hence it seems necessary to allow these also were slain then, either as sin-offerings, or as burnt-offerings, as they are allowed to be, Lev. i. 2, 3. 10.

[24] Ver. 40. Διαθήκη, Covenant, or testament.] "This discourse," saith Mr. Le Clerc, "is to be looked upon merely as the play of an Hellenistical writer; who, because he saw that διαθήκη was used for that covenant whereof Christ is the mediator, and signified also a testament, and Christ was dead, thence deduced consectaries which are true indeed, considered in themselves, but here rely upon weak principles, rather to set off his discourse according to the custom of that age, than to convert the Jews to the faith by the force of reasoning." Thus is the great apostle of the gentiles turned into a Jewish rabbin, setting off his discourse by weak reasonings, because it was customary for the Jews to do so. "Our word and preaching is," saith the apostle, "not in the words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit," 1 Cor. ii. 4. "By your leave," saith Mr. Le Clerc, "you sometimes speak not in the words of man's wisdom, but of Jewish folly, talking plainly like an allegorical Philo, making often such accommodations of scripture, and such consequences deduced from them, in which no regard at all is had to grammar." "We speak the wisdom of God," saith the apostle. "No," saith Mr. Le Clerc, "your discourse is to be looked upon merely as the play of an Hellenistical writer." "We speak," saith the apostle, "the things which God hath revealed unto us by his Spirit, and have received this Spirit, that we may know the things which are freely given us of God; which things we speak not in words taught by human wisdom, but in words taught us by the Holy Ghost." "No," saith Mr. Le Clerc, "even in things relating to the new covenant, established in the blood of Christ, your discourse relies upon weak principles, and is no better than playing with the ambiguity of words, and deducing consequences without any regard to grammar. For, true it is indeed, that a testament is ratified by the death of the testator, and Christ is dead, but Christ was not the mediator of a testament; for testaments do not want mediators: and if it should be granted that he was, he could not be thought at once a mediator and a testator, by whose death alone a testament was confirmed. The testator here is God the Father, whose heirs men are in conjunction with Christ, but God the Father can in no sense be said to die." Thus Mr. Clerc confutes the author, and yet says, he does not lessen the authority of this epistle, though others think he plainly overthrows it; but, God be thanked, he does it still without just ground. For,

First, It is plainly false that God can be the testator here; and that for his own reason, because "God the Father can in no sense be said to die:" for a testator must have his testament, and where there is a valid testament, "there," saith the apostle, "must of necessity be the death of the testator." "A testament," saith Mr. Clerc, "being ratified by the death of the testator."

Secondly, I grant that Christ was not the mediator of a testament, but then he was the mediator of a covenant; which, as it was sealed with and confirmed by his blood, procuring for us such blessings as he by his will designed for, and declared should be conferred upon, believers, "through faith in his blood," became also a testament. Thus when he said, "For their sakes, ἁγιάζω ἐμαυτὸν (John xvii. 19, i. e.) I will offer myself as a piacular victim, that they might be sanctified," or truly purged from their sins; he adds,* as his last will and testament,—"Father, I will that those whom thou hast given me be with me where I am." So here he is become "a high-priest of good things to come," purchasing eternal redemption for us by his blood. And, ver. 15, he became the mediator of that new covenant, in which God promised to "be merciful to our transgressions, and to remember our sins no more;" procuring the remission of them by the intervention of his death, "that we that believe in him might receive the promise of an eternal inheritance," which he died to entitle us to, and confer upon us; whence it is styled "the purchased possession." This therefore was his will and testament, that they for whom he died "should live through him," and this testament could not be confirmed but by his death: he therefore was at once the mediator, in whom the new covenant, promising to us remission of sins, was made; and the testator, by whose death the testament, that they who believed in him "should have eternal life," was ratified.

Moreover, what if, after all, here should be nothing said of a testator, but only of a mediator of such a covenant as was to be ratified in the blood of Jesus? This sure would confound all that Mr. Le Clerc here offers; and yet I think, with submission to better judgments, that even this may be maintained against him.

For though there be here mention, ver. 16, 17, τοῦ διαθεμένου, yet it is not necessary that word should signify a testator properly so called, but only a promiser, and one that confirms his promise with his own blood. For διατίθημι, in Phavorinus, is ὑπισχνοῦμαι, συντίθεμαι, "I promise, I covenant," and διατίθεσθαι διαθήκην is very properly, in profane authors, "to enter into covenant;" and so the phrase διαθήσομαι διαθήκην, and διέθετο διαθήκην,† is constantly used in the Old Testament; and therefore the participle διαθέμενος, derived from the same verb, must commonly have the same signification here, in which it is still used by the Septuagint, and which it always bears in the New Testament. Thus, Acts iii. 25, "You are the children, διαθήκης ἧς διέθετο, of the covenant which God made to our fathers;" Luke xxii. 29, κἀγὼ διατίθεμαι ὑμῖν, "And I appoint to you a kingdom, καθὼς διέθετο, as my Father hath appointed me:" so here, viii. 10, x. 16, αὕτη ἡ διαθήκη ἣν διαθήσομαι, "This is the covenant which I will make with the house of Isreal." And because covenants were usually made, victimas cædendo, "by sacrifices," and established in blood, as both the Hebrew כרית, the Latin fœdus, and the Greek σπονδὴ, whence the word spondeo is derived, show; and the phrases, ὅρκια τέμνειν, fœdus ferire, and percutere; accordingly it was in the new covenant established in the blood of Jesus. Hence the apostle speaks thus of this covenant, and the appointer, disposer, or the maker of it:

Ver. 15. That by virtue of this blood he is "become the mediator of a better covenant."

Ver. 16. "For where there is a covenant (θανάτου γενομένου, made by death, or ratified by the blood of him that makes it, ver. 15), there of necessity must intervene the death, τοῦ διαθεμένου, of him that makes the covenant (or promise).

Ver. 17. "For a covenant (of this nature) is only firm (ἐπὶ νεκροῖς) in the death of them who make it (as other

22 And [26] almost all things are by the law purged (purified) with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission.

23 It was therefore necessary (by virtue of the Mosaic institution) that the patterns of things [27] in the heavens should be purified with these (sacrifices); but the heavenly things themselves (our bodies to be received into heaven are to be purified) with better sacrifices than these.

24 (I say, the heavenly things themselves,) For Christ is not entered into the holy places (of the tabernacle) made with hands, which are the figures of the true (holy place); but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God (and so prepare and consecrate those mansions) for us:

25 (It was not necessary, I say, that he should enter with his blood, as the high-priest did into the earthly tabernacle,) Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest (did, who) entereth into the holy place every year with (the) blood of others (to make an annual atonement for the guilt of sin);

26 For then must he often have suffered [28] since the foundation of the world (his offering himself before God with his blood being the consequence of his sufferings): but now once [29] in the end of the world (ἐπὶ συντελείᾳ τῶν αἰώνων, in the end of the ages) hath he appeared to put away (the guilt of) sin by the sacrifice of himself.

27 And (in this the death of Christ resembles that of all other men; for) as it is appointed unto men covenants were ratified by the death of the sacrifices used at the making of them), and is of no force whilst (ὁ διαθέμενος) the maker of the covenant lives.

Ver. 18. "Whence (i. e. because, without shedding of blood there is no remission; so it was also in) the first covenant (for it) was not dedicated without blood."

To this sense the contexture of the apostle's argument doth plainly lead; for, ch. viii., he introduceth the promise of a new covenant, in which God engageth to "be merciful to our iniquities, and to remember our sins no more" (ver. 12), and so, by removing our guilt, make us fit to be partakers of "an eternal inheritance." This "remission of sins," saith he, could not be purchased by the gifts and sacrifices under the law, for "they could not fully purge the conscience from the guilt of sin" (ix. 9), but Christ, "by his own blood, hath purchased eternal redemption for us" (ver. 12), and by this blood "he is become the mediator of a better covenant;" he having suffered death "for the remission of sins committed under the old covenant, that we might receive the promise of an eternal inheritance" (ver. 15).

And this death was necessary for him to suffer, for the obtaining of these ends; for "where there is such a covenant, there is a necessity that the death of him who ratifies this covenant with his blood should intervene." For such a covenant is only ratified upon the death of them by whom it is made, and is of no force, whilst he lives that makes the covenant, because this "remission of sins is not to be procured without shedding of blood:" which was a thing so absolutely necessary under the law, that "neither was the first covenant dedicated or established without blood."

Now if this be so, here is no "playing with the ambiguity of the word διαθήκη," nor any intimation of a Hellenist, but rather of a Hebrew, using the word in the sense which both the Hebrew ברית usually bears, and in which διαθήκη answers to it in the Septuagint: and so there was no just occasion for the dangerous reflections which Mr. Le Clerc hath made on this discourse of the apostle.

[25] Ver. 21. Ἐῤῥάντισε, &c.] Of this "sprinkling of the tabernacle and all the vessels," we read nothing in the place of Exodus forecited, or in any other part of the law; but Josephus saith,* that Moses did θεραπεύειν τὴν σκηνὴν, καὶ τὰ περὶ αὐτὴν σκεύη ἐλαίῳ, καὶ τῷ αἵματι τῶν ταύρων καὶ κριῶν σφαγέντων, "consecrate for God's service the tabernacle, and all the vessels of it, anointing them with oil, and with the blood of bulls and rams."

[26] Ver. 22. Almost all things.] He saith, "almost;" because some things, which could abide the fire, were purified by the fire, Numb. xxxi. 23, and others by water, Lev. xvi. 28.

[27] Ver. 23. Αὐτὰ δὲ τὰ ἐπουράνια, The heavenly things.] For explication of these words, let it be observed, First, That the apostle here speaketh all along, not of purification of persons, but of things of the tabernacle, and of the vessels of it, ver. 21, of the τὰ πάντα, "all other things" which were to be purified; of the ὑποδείγματα τῶν ἐν οὐρανοῖς, "the patterns of things in heaven," ver. 23, that is, "the tabernacle and the utensils of it," viii. 5. "The heavenly things themselves," opposed to them, cannot therefore signify men in general, viz. the church triumphant or militant, or, in particular, our souls or consciences, but the heavenly place, styled, ver. 24, "heaven itself," the place into which Christ entered, in which he appears before God, the place of which the tabernacle made with hands was a figure.

Secondly, Observe, that by God's appointment an atonement was to be made for the holy place, by the blood of a sin-offering sprinkled upon and before the mercy-seat seven times, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions and their sins (Lev. xvi. 16). Now these could not defile that holy place into which they never entered, but yet they rendered them and their services unworthy to appear, and to be tendered before it, as they still did, worshipping towards or before this footstool of the divine Majesty. An atonement was also to be made for the tabernacle of the congregation, in which God dwelt among them, because of their uncleanness, which rendered them unworthy to come into that tabernacle where he was present; whence it is observable, that no man was permitted to be in the tabernacle till the atonement was made for it; so that the purification of the holy of holies was only the preparing of it to be still a mercy-seat, to which they might repair with their prayers, praises, and adorations, and from which God might graciously shine forth upon them, when purified by this atonement from the defilements of their sins. And the purification of the tabernacle was only to prepare it to be a place in which they might present their persons before God, thus cleansed by this atonement from the guilt of sin.

And in like manner was heaven itself to be prepared or purified for us, by our Lord's entrance into it with his own atonement, or propitiatory sacrifice; First, That our prayers and praises might ascend up thither, and be accepted at God's mercy-seat, as being offered to God by our high-priest, and rendered acceptable by the atonement he had made for the pollutions cleaving to them. Hence is he represented as having a golden censer, and much incense to offer, with the prayers of all saints, Rev. viii. 3, 4. Secondly, That our persons might be admitted into this heavenly tabernacle, as being cleansed by his blood from those defilements which they had contracted. Accordingly, our Lord tells his disciples, "In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you," John xiv. 2, 3. And here he is said to purify and prepare these heavenly mansions for us, by entering into heaven, there to appear with his blood of sprinkling in the presence of God for us.

[28] Ver. 26. Ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου, From the foundation of the world.] This phrase is used six times elsewhere in the New Testament, viz. Matt. xiii. 35, xxv. 34, Luke xi. 50, Rev. xiii. 8, xvii. 8, and in this epistle, iv. 3, "God's works were finished from the foundation of the world." And in all these places it manifestly signifies, "from the beginning of the world" (see Ps. lxxviii. 2, Matt. xiii. 35); and therefore must in reason bear the same import in this text; and then it proves, against Crellius, that the sufferings of Christ had respect to all preceding generations: for if his sufferings had not respected the sins of the whole world, where is the necessity, upon the supposition here made, of the reiteration of his sacrifice, that he should have suffered from the beginning of the world?

2 For [4] then would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers once purged (by them εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, for ever) should have had no more conscience of sins (i. e. would not have been after conscious of the guilt of sin).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. X.

[1] Ver. 1. Σκιὰν τῶν μελλόντων ἀγαθῶν, A shadow of good things to come.] i. e. Of those good things to come, of which Christ is the high-priest; their tabernacle being only a shadow or figure of that celestial tabernacle, into which he, as "our forerunner, hath already entered" (ix. 11); the purgation they obtained by their sacrifices, "from the defilements of the flesh," of "the purifications of our consciences from dead works" (ver. 13, 14); their annual redemption, of the "eternal redemption" obtained by Christ (ver. 12); their freedom of entrance, being cleansed by their sacrifices, into the tabernacle of the congregation, of our "freedom to enter into the holy of holies."

[2] Οὐκ αὐτὴν τὴν εἰκόνα τῶν πραγμάτων, Not the very image of things.] The apostle here distinguishing betwixt "the things" and "the image" of them, I think the word "image" cannot properly be rendered substance: but we under the gospel do enjoy such lively representations of the good things to come, as are both assurances, and foretastes, and beginnings of them, the earnests of our future glory, in the enjoyment of the Holy Spirit, who is the earnest of it (Eph. i. 14); and by whom we are changed "into the image" of our glorious Lord (2 Cor. iii. 18); the image of our enjoyment of God, and dwelling for ever with him, by being made "a habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. ii. 22); the image of our entrance into his presence, in that "freedom of access we have already to the Father" through Christ (Eph. ii. 18, iii. 12); the image of our final absolution, in that justification which is attended with that "peace of God which passeth all understanding." And this sufficiently answers the objection of Esthius against this sense, viz. That a more express signification of these future good things would not more efficaciously avail towards the exhibition of them: for such an image of them as also is an earnest, foretaste, assurance, and an inchoation of them, is sufficient to "make the comers to God perfect" for ever, as far as we are capable of being so in this life; as being fully assured of the entire pardon of our past sins, so as that they shall not be remembered any more, and of the enjoyment of those future blessings, of which we have received already the earnest, first-fruits, and assurance.

[3] Εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς οὐδέποτε δύνασθαι τοὺς προσερχομένους τελειῶσαι, Could never make the comers to them perfect for ever.] All interpreters allow a σύγχυσις, or trajection of the words in this verse. Now this, which I make in the translation, seems to be confirmed by the effect of our Lord's sacrifice opposed to these; for that, saith the apostle, τετελείωκεν εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, "hath perfected for ever them that were sanctified," i. e. hath cleansed them for ever from the guilt of sin (ver. 14). That therefore which he here denies to the legal sacrifices, must be also this, that they could τελειῶσαι εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, "expiate sins for ever;" or so as that they who were once purged by them, should have no more conscience of sin (ver. 2); and to this sense the following argument inclines.

The words τελειοῦν and τελειῶσαι have two significations; the one is agonistical, and then it signifies to reward and crown, as in those words, "That they without us, μὴ τελειωθῶσι, might not be made perfect," i. e. be crowned, or have their full reward, Heb. xi. 40 (see the note there): the other is sacrificial; for when it is joined with sacrifices, or hath relation to them, it signifies, ἁγιάζειν, καὶ καθαρίζεσθαι, "to sanctify and purge from the guilt of sin." Whence τελειώσεις is rendered by Hesychius and Phavorinus ἁγιάσεις. So the sin-offering, by which Aaron and his sons were sanctified, and set apart for the priesthood, is styled, θυσία τελειώσεως, Exod. xxix. 34; and the sacrifice by which the temple was sanctified, or purged from its defilements, is styled, θυσία τελειώσεως, 2 Macc. ii. 9, and therefore what is here, "cannot make perfect," is, ver. 4, "cannot ἀφαιρεῖν ἁμαρτίας, take away sins;" and, ver. 2, καθαρίζεσθαι is to purge from the conscience of sin (see ix. 9. 12. 14).

And, lastly, the word προσερχομένους here, seems not to signify, the comers to it, i. e. the law, but the comers to God for pardon by these legal sacrifices; for the word in this whole epistle still relates to coming to God, as the phrase is expressly, vii. 25, xi. 6, the "coming to the throne of grace," iv. 16; and in this chapter, ver. 2, προσερχώμεθα, "Let us come (to God) with a true heart."

[4] Ver. 2. Ἐπεὶ οὐκ ἂν ἐπαύσαντο προσφερόμενοι, For then they would not have ceased to be offered.] Some, leaving out the οὐκ, translate the words thus, "For then sure they would have ceased to be offered;" but the οὐκ is found in Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, and the Alexandrian manuscript, and therefore ought not to be omitted: others, with the Arabic version, read the words interrogatively, "For then would they not have ceased to be offered?" which gives a very good sense. But yet there seems to be another sense of them very agreeable to the context; viz. "For then they would not have ceased," or "been taken away," to give place to another sacrifice for sin, as the apostle proves they were, from ver. 5. 9.

[5] Ver. 4. Ἀφαιρεῖν ἁμαρτίας, To take away sins,] Is not, as Grotius here notes, efficere ne ultrà peccetur, "to make us sin no more;" for that is not the effect of Christ's blood, but, as far as in this imperfect state we are enabled so to do, of his sanctifying Spirit. Moreover, the apostle speaks, ver 1, of expiation of the conscience from the guilt of sin, of expiation by the legal sacrifices, which did not inwardly sanc tify, of purgation by the oblation of them, ver. 2, from that sin of which there was "a yearly remembrance" in the oblation of those sacrifices "to make atonement" for them, ver. 3; and therefore the ἀδύνατον γάρ, which connects this verse with the former, and shows that to be impossible to be effected, which he had said before was not effected by those sacrifices, must confine this phrase to the taking away the guilt of sin, by* expiation and atonement for them; not to the removal of the power and dominion of them, by internal sanctification. And so ἀφαιρεῖν ἁμαρτίαν always signifies, either to take away sin by a mere act of grace, absolving from the punishment due to it (as when Nathan said to David, ἀφέλη ὁ Κύριος τὸ ἁμάρτημά σου, "The Lord hath taken away thy sin; thou shalt not die," 2 Sam. xii. 13, and the seraph to Isaiah, "This hath touched thy lips, καὶ ἀφελεῖ τὰς ἁμαρτίας σου, and he will take away thy sins," Isa. vi. 7; and, Isa. xxvii. 9, "By this, ἀφαιρεθήσεται ἀνομία Ἰακὼβ, shall the iniquity of Jacob be forgiven; and this is the blessing, ὅταν ἀφέλωμαι τὴν ἁμαρτίαν αὐτοῦ, when I shall take away his sin;" and when God saith to Joshua, ἰδοὺ ἀφῄρηκα τὰς ἀνομίας σου, "Behold, I have taken away thy sins," Zech. iii. 4); or, when this phrase hath relation to a sacrifice, to take it away by that; as when it is said, Lev. x. 17, "Wherefore have ye not eaten the sin-offering in the holy place, seeing it is most holy, and God hath given it you, ἵνα ἀφέλητε τὴν ἁμαρτίαν τῆς συναγωγῆς, καὶ ἐξιλάσησθε περὶ αὐτῶν ἔναντι Κυρίου, that you might bear (away) the iniquity of the congregation, to make an atonement for them before the Lord?" (see ver. 11.)

[6] Ver. 5. Εἰσερχόμενος εἰς τὸν κόσμον, Coming into the world.] The Socinian gloss here, de ingressû Christi in mundum futurum, i. e. "of Christ's going out of this world into the next," or into heaven, is so absurd, that it needs no refutation; his "coming into the world," in the scripture phrase, being his descending from heaven to be with us; John xvi. 28, "I came down from the Father, and came into the world;" and his going hence into heaven being styled, his leaving of the world, John xiii. 1, xvi. 28, xvii. 11. And though the phrase of "entering into the world" may sometimes in John import Christ's entering on his prophetic office, or his appearing publicly in the world, as ὁ ἐρχόμενος is, "that Prophet which was to come into the world;" yet the connexion of it here with the time when a body was prepared for him, will not suffer us to doubt, that it importeth here his assumption of the human nature, and his being born into the world in it. And so this phrase is used, when Christ is styled "the true Light, that enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world," John i. 9. For though the grammatical construction doth not hinder but that ἐρχόμενον εἰς τὸν κόσμον, may be construed with "Light" thus, "Which coming into the world enlighteneth every man;" yet כל באי עולם, "all that come into the world," being the constant phrase by which the Jews express all men living, as Dr. Lightfoot on the place observes; and the Jews themselves, speaking of God himself after this manner, אתה מואר כל באי עולם, † "Thou art he that illuminates every man that comes into the world;" this is a plain confirmation of our translation of these words.

[7] Σῶμα κατηρτίσω μοι, A body hast thou prepared, or framed, for me.] The words in the Hebrew are, אזנים כריית לי, "My ears hast thou bored," in plain allusion to the ceremony used to a slave that would not have his liberty, but would continue in his obedience to his master, and would not go free (Exod. xxi. 6, Deut. xv. 17). And seeing this was done out of love to his master, the boring of his ear seems not to be commanded as a note of infamy, but as a solemn devoting of him to his master's service; though were it used as a mark of servitude, it answers still exactly to our Saviour, who "took upon him," saith the apostle, μορφὴν δούλου, "the form of a servant," or of a slave, and "became obedient to the death" for us, when he might have been free from it, out of love to his Father and us his children (Heb. ii. 14). And because he only could appear in this form, and performed this obedience in the body he assumed for this purpose, the seventy interpreters, perhaps by the internal motion of the Holy Spirit, translated the phrase thus, "A body hast thou prepared (or framed) for me:" for that the apostle did not change the translation of the Septuagint, but find it thus, his words declare, when he saith, "He taketh away the first," viz. sacrifice, and offering, according to the law, "that he might establish the latter," i. e. the oblation of his body, or his obedience to the death in his body thus prepared for him. So read Theodoret, Austin, Euthymius, Chrysostom, Apollinarius, and Ambrosius; so read the Arabic and Ethiopic versions; and they who read otherwise, may be supposed to have followed not the Greek, but the Hebrew. And this reading the apostle approves and follows, as the true meaning of the Hebrew phrase, and that which so fitly doth express our Saviour's oblation of himself (as that sacrifice which was to put an end to those which only were the types and shadows of it), and his giving up himself, entirely a servant, to do the will of God; on which account, slaves and servants, who were altogether at the beck and will of their lords, were both by Jews and heathens called σώματα, "bodies." Thus Raguel gave to Tobias half his goods, σώματα, καὶ κτήνη, καὶ ἀργύριον, "servants, and cattle, and money," Tobit x. 10. The sale of the captive Jews, by Nicanor, is in the Greek thus, ἀποδόσεως Ἰουδαϊκῶν σωμάτων, 2 Macc. viii. 11, Joseph. Antiq. Jud. lib. xii. cap. 2, p. 390, F. So all the servants of the men of Sichem are, πάντα τὰ σώματα αὐτῶν, Gen. xxxiv. 29. And σώματα is by our translation rendered "slaves," Rev. xviii. 13. So Aristotle, Strabo, Demosthenes, and Julius Pollux, use the word (see Constantine).

I do not find that the ancient Jews interpreted these words of Christ in express terms; but they say enough to justify the apostle's argument from this text. For hence they conclude, that* "God had no principal regard to sacrifices, and that obedience and praise were better than sacrifice;" and that† "a farther salvation was to be expected, even the salvation of God," Ps. l. 23, Isa. xlv. 17, which was תשועת עולמים, "an eternal salvation;" or, in the language of the apostle here, "salvation, εἰς τὸ παντελές, for ever," Heb. vii. 25, εἰς τὸ διηνεκές, x. 14.

[8] Ver. 7. In the volume of the book it is written of me, that I should come to do thy will.] It being there written, that the Messiah was to "make his life an offering for sin," Isa. liii. 10, and by that to "cause these offerings and sacrifices to cease," Dan. ix. 27; therefore he is said to go to his cross, "as it was written of him," Matt. xxvi. 24; and the rulers of the Jews are said to have "fulfilled the scriptures" in condemning him, and to have "done that which was written of him," Acts xiii. 27. 29 (see Luke xxiv. 44. 46).

the Syriac version; yet, because it is in the Alexandrian copy, in Œcumenius, Theophylact, the Arabic version, and in many manuscript copies, I thought fit to give it a place in the paraphrase, and then it is easy to perceive that ἡγιάσμεθα must be repeated, to complete the sense.

[9] Ἐν ᾧ θελήματι, By the which will.] Christ had said in the psalmist, that his Father would not have the sacrifices and oblations of the law continued, but that his will was, that he should once for all suffer for the sin of man; by the execution of which will, performed by Christ's oblation of his body for us, we are sanctified: where ἁγιάζειν, or ἁγιάζεσθαι, doth not signify to be freed from the power and dominion of sin, but from the guilt of it; as is proved, note on ix. 13: and this is farther proved, from the means of this sanctification, viz. the oblation of Christ's body, that being offered as a piacular victim, to purge us from the guilt of sin, and from the condemnation due unto us for it: nor doth the apostle here understand the oblation of Christ's body in the heavens for us, that being properly his intercession, but the oblation of his body on the cross, and his sufferings (Heb. ii. 10, 11, xiii. 12). And, lastly, this being effected by the oblation of Christ's body, ἐφάπαξ, "once for all;" as it restrains the word to his oblation on the cross, which was but once performed, and is past (whereas his appearance in the heavens for us is still present and perpetual), so doth it perfectly overthrow the pretended sacrifice of the mass: for, if "by this one oblation he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified," what efficacy can there be in this vain repetition of it? nay, must it not import, that remission of sins is not fully obtained for us by our Lord's sacrifice on the cross? for, saith the apostle, "where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin" (ver. 18).

[11] Ver. 12. Εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, For ever.] By comparing this with ver. 14, "By one offering he hath perfected, εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, for ever them that are sanctified," and with ver. 1, where it is denied that the legal sacrifices could, τελειῶσαι εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, "expiate sins for ever;" and from the stress the apostle here (ver. 10), and elsewhere, lays upon this προσφορὰ ἐφάπαξ, "oblation once for all,"—I imagine that these words may be better rendered thus, "This man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sin for ever, is sat down."

[12] Ver. 14.] That τετελείωκεν εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς is to "expiate sin for ever," see note on ver. 1; and that the apostle here speaks of them who are sanctified by this expiation, hath been observed, note on ix. 13; as is apparent from the testimony of the Holy Ghost produced here to confirm this, viz. that "God would remember their sins no more" (ver. 17).

A question ariseth from ver. 4 and 11, Upon what ground is it here asserted, that the legal sacrifices could never take away sin? and wherein lies the difference, in point of expiation, between the sacrifices of the law and the oblation of the body of Christ, that one could purge the conscience from the sense of guilt, and take away sin for ever, and the other could not? "If all must be resolved into divine appointment and divine acceptation, how is it 'impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sin?' Was it not possible that God might have appointed and accepted of the life of a beast, instead of that of the greatest malefactor, who thereby might be freed, not only from a temporal, but likewise from the obligation to eternal death?" Now in answer to this question, I conceive, that divine acceptation must neither wholly be excluded, nor wholly be assigned, as the cause that the oblation of our Saviour's body was thus available for that expiation of the guilt of sin, which could not be obtained by the legal sacrifices.

And, First, I say, divine acceptation must not, yea, cannot wholly be excluded; for that would render the oblation of our Lord's body, of what virtue soever it might be in itself, wholly unable to procure the pardon of our sin, and exclude all true remission and forgiveness of sin. For,

The punishment of another, being not the thing threatened or required, but only the death of the offender, can be of no avail to free the criminal from punishment, though he, that is the substitute, be never so able or so well inclined to suffer it; unless the governor, or he to whom the execution of the law belongs, be willing to accept of his vicarious punishment; and whensoever he is pleased, and sees just cause to do so, it is an act of grace and favour to the criminal, and a remission of his personal obligation to bear the punishment he had deserved. In punishments inflicted on the criminal, it is true, that so far as he suffers what the law exacts, so far doth he dissolve the obligation to further punishment, and so far must his punishment be inconsistent with remission; for as far as any man is punished, he is not forgiven. But by admission of another to suffer in our stead, we are as much forgiven as we could be, did he not suffer in our stead, because we are as much exempted from suffering any punishment on the account of our offences; and how can we be more forgiven, than we are by such an act as removes from us the whole punishment as much as if we had never offended? the vicarious punishment is indeed the motive and the procuring cause of this forgiveness, as it renders it consistent with the governor's honour, and with the ends of government, to grant it; but it takes off nothing from the freedom of the pardon.

Secondly, I add, That divine acceptation must not be assigned as the only cause that the oblation of our Saviour's body was thus available for the expiation of the guilt of sin; for then no reason can be given why he might not have accepted of the blood of bulls and goats, and much more the sufferings of any ordinary man, for the procuring our exemption from the guilt of sin; whereas two reasons have been already offered in the note on ii. 14, why the blood of bulls and goats could never take away sin; viz. first, because they were not of the same nature and original with man, who sinned, and so could not dissolve the debt his nature had contracted. Secondly, they never could procure for us a resurrection, and so they could not free us from that eternal death our sins deserved; nor could any mortal man do it, because he never could have power to raise his own body; only that Jesus who had "power to lay down his life, and take it up again" who "hath life in himself," and who can make "the dead hear the voice of the Son of man, and live," can do this. Indeed, they could do nothing of that which was requisite, saith this epistle, and the whole scripture, for that end. But the great reason why the blood of bulls and goats could never take away sins, is this, that they could never answer the great ends of punishment, and thereby render it consistent with the honour of the governor, and with the ends of government, to admit the substitution of them in our stead. Now the ends which wise men do assign to punishments, are these:

First, Παράδειγμα, That they who suffer may be exemplary to others, and may, by what they suffer, deter others from the commission of the like offences; by letting them, in their example, know what they must suffer, when the guilt of their own sins is laid upon them.

Secondly, Νουθεσία, That the offender may learn wisdom, by the rod: that the remembrance of what was suffered for it might prevent the repetition of his sin; and that he may be fitted to embrace that counsel of our Saviour, "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come upon thee."

expiated the sins of) them that are sanctified (through faith in his blood, procuring the remission of sins, Acts xxvi. 18).

15 Whereof (and of this) the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us: for after that he had said before,

16 This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in (or, upon) their minds will I write them; (Jer. xxxi. 33,)

17 (He adds, as a farther promise, or part of the new covenant,) And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more.

18 Now where (such a) remission of these is (as

Thirdly, Τιμωρία, The vindication of the prince's honour, and the preservation of the laws he hath established from contempt. Now to appply this to our purpose, I say,

1. That by the obedience of our Lord Christ unto the death in our stead, these ends of punishment are very signally obtained, and that with more advantage to God's glory than if the punishment of our offences had been inflicted upon us; and so God, by it, may be truly said to have been satisfied, seeing that justice, which consists in punishing for the transgression of a law, is truly satisfied, when all those ends, for which the punishment of the offender could be desired, are obtained.

2. I add, That none of these ends could be at all obtained by the suffering of bulls and goats, and not comparatively by the sufferings of any mortal man whatsoever. And,

First, God, by this dispensation, hath given us the best and most effectual example to deter us from sin: for three things only can be requisite to this end, viz. that the punishment of sin be insupportable, when we suffer it; inevitable, when we, by our rebellions, have made ourselves the vessels of God's wrath; and that we have a lively sense and deep impression of all this upon our spirits. Now,

The example of our Saviour's sufferings shows how insupportable the punishment will be, which justice will inflict upon the sinner; for if the apprehension of it produced such agonies and consternations in the soul of Christ, that God saw need to send an angel to support him under them, how must the sinner sink under that burden, when it is laid upon his shoulders! if he, who was the well-beloved Son of God, found it so dreadful to lie under the burden for some hours; to lie exposed for ever to it, must be far more intolerable: if the consideration of God's paternal love, and of the glorious issues of his sufferings, was scarce sufficient to support our Lord under the terrors of that cup; what will support the sinner, when he shall know himself to be the everlasting object of God's wrath!

This example also shows, that impenitent sinners cannot escape this wrath of God, since he inflicted so great a punishment on the beloved of his soul, when he became our surety. For if on this account "God spared not his only Son," we may be sure he will not spare his stubborn enemies. With what strong cries, and with what earnestness, did our Lord pray to be delivered from this cup! and yet, when he had "made his soul an offering for sin," thus did it "please the Lord to bruise him." If then his ears were shut against the cries of his beloved Son, how can they be opened to the howlings of rebellious sinners? if God was pleased to lay so great a load on him who was but sponsor for our sins, their punishment cannot be milder who commit them. And,

Lastly, This example gives us the most lively sense and deep impression of these things, as being the most sensible demonstration of God's indignation against sin, which is recorded in the sacred writings. To find God drowning the whole world, and raining fire and brimstone on Sodom and Gomorrha for sin; to see the darling objects of his love, the Jewish nation, become for above seventeen hundred years the objects of his sorest wrath, are instances sufficient to deter men from sin: but then to see God mix a cup so bitter, so full of gall and wormwood, for his own innocent and well-beloved Son, and make him drink it off, only because he undertook to be our surety; to see him lifted up upon the cross, the earth trembling under him, as if unable to bear his weight, the heavens darkened over him, as if shut against his cry, and all this because our sins did meet upon him,—is a sure and eminent demonstration of God's indignation against sin.

Secondly, Whereas inevitable ruin must have followed, upon the execution of the deserved punishment on the offender's person, God, by this method, hath taken a most excellent way for reformation of the sinner, which was the second end of punishment: for what can be a more effectual motive to abstain from sin, than this example, which so clearly represents the greatness of the provocation in the greatness of the punishment, and shows it is impossible that guilty persons should avoid the stroke of God's vindictive justice, or bear the weight of his almighty arm?

Thirdly, God, by this dispensation, hath sufficiently consulted the preservation of his honour, and secured the reverence and observation of his laws; which was the third great end of punishment. For,

God, by declaring thus, he would not pardon our offences, without this satisfaction made for the violation of his law, hath fully vindicated his institutions from contempt; seeing, by this example, he hath let all men know, that though he be a God of great long-suffering and mercy, he "will by no means clear the sinner," or suffer sin to go unpunished.

Again, God, by this dispensation, hath vindicated his honour more than if he had destroyed the sinner; having more evidently shown his hatred of, and great displeasure against sin, by punishing it so severely in his only Son, when he became our surety: for the greater the inducement is to remit the punishment of sin, the greater must be his hatred who inflicts it; that therefore this consideration, that he who suffered was his well-beloved Son, would not induce him to remit the punishment, must be the highest demonstration of his most perfect hatred of all iniquity.

But that none of those ends could be at all obtained by the substitution of a bull, or goat, or ram, to suffer in our stead, must be extremely evident, this being a substitution very supportable, especially by the rich, who very freely spend much more upon the satisfaction of their lusts, and who would therefore gladly buy a freedom to commit them at so small expense. This then would be so far from tending to reform the sinner, that it would rather be a great encouragement to him to continue in his evil courses, when he thus knew the damage would be very little to him; this also could not tend to the honour of the lawgiver, but rather would tempt men to conceive that his displeasure against sin could not be great, since he required so little to repair his honour; and that he was not much concerned for any satisfaction for the violations of his law, when such slight matters were by him thought sufficient expiations for them.

Moreover, the oblations of any ordinary man could not procure this expiation for us: (1.) Because he could only suffer that punishment he had deserved by his own sins: now evident it is, no satisfaction can be made by me for others, by suffering that which justice doth require me to suffer for my own offences. (2.) Because he could not overcome death, he never could raise up himself from the grave, and so could not procure that redemption from it to another, which he could not obtain for his own self. Nor (3.) is it visible how he can serve the ends of justice, or of government, by doing so, more than the criminal himself would do by his own sufferings. For, (1.) what great indication would it be of divine hatred to sin, that he required only the death of a mortal man, to expiate the sins of the whole world? Or, (2.) what discouragement could this afford to sinners from continuing in their evil courses, or what great dread of divine vengeance? for if, as it was conjectured by most nations, the death of a malefactor might be sufficient for this purpose, what nation could ever want such expiations for their sins! or, if it were to be a good man, seeing they bore so great love to mankind in general, and to their country in particular, some of them would still be ready to offer their own lives for preservation of their nation: or how, by this, would God consult either the honour of his government, or secure the reverence and observation of his laws, by thus requiring only one criminal to suffer less than he himself deserved, to make atonement for the continual violations of his sacred laws by a whole nation, or even the whole race of men?

[13] Ver. 18. Οὐκ ἔτι προσφορὰ, &c. No more offering for sin.] From these and many other passages of this epistle, the sacrifice of the mass, declared by the Trent council (see xxii. can. 2, 3) to be "a true and proper propitiatory sacrifice for sin," is utterly overthrown. For, (1.) from these words of the apostle, "It was not needful that he should offer himself often, for then must he have often suffered," ix. 24—26, it is very evident, that Christ cannot offer himself but he must suffer: since then they dare not say that Christ suffers in the mass, neither can they say that Christ offers himself there. (2.) From those words, "Without shedding of blood there is no remission," ix. 22, it follows, either that the sacrifice of the mass must be a bloody sacrifice, and so Christ's blood must be as often shed as he is offered in the mass, or else that it obtaineth no remission of sin. (3.) This follows from these words, "By one oblation he hath perfected," (i. e. hath perfected and fully expiated, and that) "for ever, them that are sanctified;" for what necessity of, what virtue can there be in, doing that again, which is perfectly and fully done already, and that for ever? And, lastly, where remission of sins is so obtained by Christ's own oblation, that God will "remember them no more," there is, saith the apostle, "no more need of offering for sin;" but by the blood of Christ, the blood of the new testament, such remission is obtained, saith the same apostle, ix. 15. 17. Ergo, &c.

[14] Ver. 20. Ὁδὸν πρόσφατον, A new way.] The way into the highest heaven being before ἄβατος, "impassable," saith Josephus (see note on ix. 8); there being no entrance for us into that place, till our forerunner had entered into it, vii. 20; till he had purified and prepared it for us by his better sacrifice, ix. 23, John xiv. 2. This was the doctrine of all the primitive Christians, that Christ, by his death, opened this veil for the just that were, from Adam,* ἀπυκεκλεισμένοι, excluded from those blissful regions: †that διέσχισε φραγμὸν τὸν ἐξ αἰῶνος μὴ σχισθέντα, "he rent open the enclosure which from the beginning had not been laid open." Hence, Tertullian‡ saith, the patriarchs were Dominicæ resurrectionis appendices, "the appendants of our Lord's resurrection;" and therefore, as καὶ ἔχοντες is here to be repeated from ver. 19, so the preposition διὰ, "through," seems here not to denote the means, or the condition of entrance into the holy of holies, but rather the term to be passed through; as if he should have said, "We have a new way of entrance through the veil, now rent;" which, before it was so, hindered our entrance into that place; that is, through the flesh or body of Christ broken upon the cross, and so letting out that blood which procures that entrance, as the blood the high-priest carried with him procured his entrance, ix. 7.

[15] Καὶ ζῶσαν, And living way:] That is, ζωοποιοῦσαν, "leading to and giving life," saith Grotius. He dying for us, "that we might live through him," 1 John iv. 9. Thus the "bread of life," John vi., and the "word of life," Acts v. 20, Phil. ii. 16, is the bread and word giving life, in opposition to the dead shadows of the law, saith Dr. Hammond, or the sacrifices prescribed by it, all whose virtue was in their death; we being "reconciled by the death of Christ," but "saved by his life" (Rom. v. 10); our access to these mansions being obtained by this "forerunner, made higher than the heavens" (vii. 26), "made a priest there, after the power of an endless life" (ver. 16), and "therefore able to save us to the uttermost, because he lives for ever, there to make intercession for us" (ver. 25).

[16] Ver. 21. A high-priest.] i. e. A high-priest so merciful and able to help us when tempted, and so faithful in the performance of his office (ii. 14).

[17] Ver. 22. Ἐῤῥαντισμένοι τὰς καρδίας, &c. Having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, &c.] Here is a manifest allusion to the things requisite to procure to a defiled Jew admittance to God's sacred presence in the temple or the tabernacle. The Jewish maxim saith, that "the very root and essence of the sacrifice was sprinkling of blood;" and therefore, on the great day of expiation, the blood of the bullock for the sin-offering, and the goat for the sin-offering, which was brought in to make atonement in the holy place for the people, was sprinkled before the mercy-seat seven times (Lev. xvi. 14, 15. 27), and so they were made clean from all their sins before the Lord (ver. 30), and admitted again into the tabernacle of the congregation, from which they were excluded till this sprinkling was performed (ver. 17). Again, when the Israelites were in a great fear, that by coming near the tabernacle they should be consumed, saying, "Behold, we die, we perish: whosoever cometh any thing near unto the tabernacle of the Lord, shall die" (Numb. xvii. 12, 13); God appoints the water made of the ashes of the red heifer, to cleanse them from those legal impurities, which rendered them unfit to come into his tabernacle, and made it dangerous for them to approach unto it, styling it on that account a "purification from sin" (ver. 9); and this water was to be sprinkled on the unclean, and he was to wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and being thus purified, might come into the sanctuary (ver. 19, 20): this sprinkling of the blood and water, "sanctifying to the purifying of the flesh" (Heb. ix. 13). "Let us therefore," saith the apostle, "who have (not our flesh only, but) our consciences purified from the guilt of sin, by the sprinkling (not of the blood of bulls and goats, but) of the blood of Christ, and have our high-priest still presenting this blood before the mercy-seat, and who have our bodies washed with the pure water of baptism, the laver of regeneration (as the clothes and bodies of the unclean were with fountain-water), draw near to God" with greater freedom than they could.

their Messiah, styled by Luke, "the days of vengeance," xxi. 22; ἡμέρα τῆς εἰσόδου αὐτοῦ, "the day of the Lord's coming, which who can bear?" saith the prophet, Mal. iii. 2; ἡμέρα καιομένη ὡς κλίβανος, "the day burning like an oven;" ἡμέρα ἡ ἐρχομένη, "the day coming that shall so burn up them that do wickedly, as not to leave them root or branch;" ἡμέρα Κυρίου ἐγγίζουσα, "the day of the Lord drawing near, when all the inhabitants of the land shall tremble," Joel ii. 1; μεγάλη ἡ ἡμέρα Κυρίου καὶ ἐπιφανὴς, "the great and terrible day of the Lord," ver. 11. 31; ἡμέρα αὐτοῦ, "the day of the Son of man." That this is the meaning of the place, will appear from the scope of the apostle, which is to terrify them he writes to, by the consideration of that dreadful day of vengeance threatened to the unbelieving Jews, not only by our Lord, but their own prophets, and now near at hand; as it follows from ver. 26 to 32.

[19] Ver. 26. Ἑκουσίως γὰρ ἡμαρτανόντων ἡμῶν, For if we sin wilfully.] That these words do not concern every sin committed knowingly against the laws of Christ, but only such as do consist in apostatizing from the faith after we have received the knowledge of it, and rejecting him as our prophet and lawgiver, will appear, (1.) from the parallel place, vi. 4—6; for they who there "cannot be renewed unto repentance," are they who "fall away" from the faith, after they have been "enlightened," &c.; which plainly answers to these words here, "They who sin wilfully, after they have received the knowledge of the truth." They are there said to "crucify afresh the Lord of life, and to put him to an open shame;" yea, to "fall away" after "they have tasted of the heavenly gift, and have been made partakers of the Holy Ghost;" which always answers to the "trampling under foot the Son of God," and the "doing despite to the Spirit of grace." (2.) From the instances produced out of the Old Testament: for the argument used, ver. 28, from the comparison of "him who despised Moses' law," and therefore was to "die without mercy, under the hand of two or three witnesses," Deut. xvii. 6, plainly concerns them only who transgressed God's covenant, by "going and serving other gods," ver. 2, 3. And as for those who sinned "voluntarily," or "with a high hand," under the law, and so were to be "cut off," and have no sacrifice allowed to expiate their sin (Numb. xv. 30, 31), they were such as "blasphemed" or "reproached the Lord," i. e. revolted from, and would not own him as their governor; they "despised the word of the Lord;" they made the covenant given in Sinai void, by contemning the authority by which it was enjoined, as the Hebrew signifies, and so they were indeed apostates from God. (3.) From the preceding exhortation, ver. 25, not to fall off from the assemblies of Christians; and the following, not to "cast away their confidence," ver. 35, not to "draw back" from the faith, ver. 38; it being "better not to have known the way of righteousness, than, having known it, to depart from the holy commandments delivered to them," 2 Pet. ii. 21; and, lastly, from the expressions used, ver. 29, which can agree to none besides apostates from the Christian faith: for, to "tread the Son of God under foot," must surely signify the extremest contempt that can be cast upon him; to "count the blood of the covenant" (by which we are purified) itself, κοινὸν, "unclean," and polluting, can be only done by him who looks on Christ, not as the Saviour of the world by it, but as one who deserved to suffer what from the Jews he did: and to "do despite to the Spirit of grace," cannot well signify less than that which our Lord styles the "sin against the Holy Ghost," which men cannot commit, and in their hearts continue Christians.

[20] Ver. 29. Ἐν ᾧ ἡγιάσθη, By which he was sanctified.] That this refers not to Christ sanctifying himself, or offering himself as a piacular victim for us (John xvii. 19), but to him who "counted this blood an unholy thing," seems clear, first, from the constant usage of this phrase in this epistle, where "he that is sanctified" is he "that is purged from the guilt of sin," ii. 11; and in this very chapter, where it is said, ver. 10, that we are ἡγιασμένοι, "sanctified by the oblation of the body [or, the blood] of Christ;" and, ver. 14, that "by one oblation he hath perfected for ever τοὺς ἁγιαζομένους, them that are sanctified." Secondly, from the phrase, "the blood of the [new] covenant," i. e. of that covenant in which God promises to "be merciful to our iniquities, and remember our sins no more," viii. 12, x. 17. Thirdly, because, though Christ is said to "sanctify himself," yet is he never said to be sanctified, but only ἁγιάζειν τὸν λαὸν, "to sanctify the people by his own blood," xiii. 12 (see the reading justified, Examen Millii).

[21] Ver. 30. Saith the Lord, λέγει Κυρίος.] These words are not to be found in many manuscripts; they are not in the Vulgar, Syriac, or Ethiopic version; not in the original, or in the Septuagint; and therefore seem to have crept in here from Rom. xii. 19; where, instead of οἴδαμεν γὰρ τὸν εἰπόντα, "We know him that speaketh, we find, γέγραπται γὰρ, "For it is written;" which reading Chrysostom here hath, and without these words the sense runs better.

[22] And again:] Not Ps. cxxxv. 14; the words there being taken from Deut. xxxii. 36, but in the same place, or in the following verse. So ii. 13, "I will put my trust in him," Isa. viii. 17, καὶ πάλιν, "And again (ver. 18), Behold, I and the children which God hath given me."

[23] Ver. 34. Τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου, My bonds.] Were this certainly the true reading, it would fairly prove Paul the author of this epistle; but the other reading, τοῖς δεσμοῖς συνεπαθήσατε, "You had compassion of them that were bound."

spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves (by the testimony of that Spirit who is the earnest of our future inheritance, Eph. i. 14, iv. 30,) that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance.

35 Cast not away therefore your confidence (παῤῥησίαν, your freedom in profession of the faith), which hath great recompence of reward, (for with the mouth confession is made unto salvation, Rom. x. 10.)

36 For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God (i. e. have suffered according to his will, 1 Pet. iv. 19), ye might receive [24] the promise (reward).

37 For (the vision of Habakkuk, respecting the coming of Christ, and exhorting you to wait for him, said then, Yet for a time, as I do now,) yet a little while, [25] and he that shall come (Gr. ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that cometh now to reward your patience) will come, and will not tarry.

38 (It also adds these words of comfort to the faithful, and terror to the revolter, Expect him now, Δίκαιος δὲ, for) Now the just shall live by (his) faith: but [26] if any man draw back (καὶ ἐὰν ὑποστείληται, and if he draw back from it), my soul (saith God) shall have no pleasure in him.

is more likely to be the true reading, for so read the Alexandrian and two other manuscripts, the Syriac, the Vulgar Latin, and Chrysostom.

Γινώσκοντες ἔχειν ἐν ἑαυτοῖς κρείττονα ὕπαρξιν ἐν οὐρανοῖς, καὶ μένουσαν.] Note that Origen, in his book de Martyrio, omits the words ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, that Clement of Alexandria* reads ἐπ' ἑαυτοὺς, that some read instead of it ὑμᾶς, and that all the ancient versions follow this reading. Note also, that all the Greek fathers read ἐν οὐρανοῖς, which two various readings make the Greek run clear and smooth (see Examen Millii in locum).

[24] Ver. 36. Τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν, The promise.] That is primarily "the recompense of reward," mentioned ver. 35. So, xi. 39, ἐπαγγελία, "the promise," is the same with "the recompense of reward," ver. 26, the "things not seen," but "hoped for," which are the objects of our faith, ver. 1. But then this epistle being directed to the believing Jews, who had both from their prophets and from our Lord a promise, that "in the great terrible day of the Lord, whosoever should call upon the name of the Lord should be saved," Joel ii. 32, and that the εὐαγγελιζόμενοι οὓς Κύριος προσκέκληται, i. e. "they whom the Lord hath called by his gospel should be delivered," ibid.; that when the day was to come that "burned like an oven," then was "the Sun of righteousness to rise on them that feared him, with healing on his wings," Mal. iv. 1, 2; that "he who endured to the end shall be saved," Matt. xxiv. 13; and to whom it was said, Hab. ii. 3, 4, "The vision is, עוֹד לַמּוֹעֵד, yet for a time" then, now "for a very little time;" ὑπόμεινον αὐτὸν, "With patience wait for him [the Messiah, say the Jews], for he that cometh will come, and will not tarry:" "Wait for him," say the Jews,† לְקַבֵּל שְׂכַר, "to receive your reward." Christ also having taught them by a parable that God would come, ἐν τάχει, "speedily to avenge his elect who cried unto him (under persecutions) day and night" (Luke xviii.), I believe that the receiving this promise verified to them, which tended so exceedingly to confirm their faith, might be here intended, especially if we consider that the apostle could not properly affirm of our Lord's coming to judgment, that it was μίκρον ὅσον ὅσον, "a very very little while, and he would come, and would not tarry."

[25] Ver. 37. Ὁ ἐρχόμενος.] This is the peculiar title given to the Messiah by the Jews, as we learn from the Baptist's question to him, σὺ εἶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος; "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" (Matt. xi. 3) and from the hosannas of the Jews, sung to him in these words, "Blessed be, ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. xxi. 9). And the Jews do not only interpret this passage of him, but also encourage themselves to wait for him by this very argument of the apostle, לְקַבֵּל שְׂכַר, "that they may receive their reward," for "blessed," say they,‡ "are all that hope in him" (Isa. xxx. 18).

[26] Ver. 38. Ὑποστείληται, If any man draw back.] The reverend Dr. Hammond hath shown from Phavorinus, and from Acts xx. 20, 21, Gal. ii. 12, that this word signifies to draw back, refuse, and fly from a thing; and so the object of it being here faith, must signify his flying from and drawing back from the faith, or refusing still to profess it; and, as it follows, must be his "drawing back unto perdition;" and because this is done usually from fear of persecution, hence it is joined with fear; Gal. ii. 12, Peter ὑπέστελλεν ἑαυτὸν, "withdrew himself, fearing the circumcision;" and sometimes is put to signify fear: so Deut. i. 17, μὴ ὑποστείλῃ πρόσωπον ἀνθρώπου, "You shall not be afraid of the face of man;" and because men's cowardly fears make them to hide, dissemble, and play the hypocrite, hence it is reckoned by Julius Pollux,* among the words which signify to conceal and hide; and by Hesychius and Suidas is rendered, ὑποκρίνεται δολιεύεται, "He plays the hypocrite, and deals deceitfully;" all which, in things which do respect our God and our religion, are pernicious to the soul; especially if we consider that "he that draws back" stands opposed, ver. 39, to "him that believeth," and therefore is an unbeliever; and, ver. 38, to "him that liveth by his faith," and therefore can have none, or only a dead faith: and, lastly, that God here solemnly declares, his "soul shall have no pleasure in him," and then he must still lie under his sad displeasure.

Note, Secondly, That ἐὰν δὲ ὑποστείληται refers plainly to "the just man," the man who "lives by his faith;" and in the prophet, to him that is with faith and patience to wait for the accomplishment of the vision; and, ver. 39, the ὑποστειλάμενος, "the drawer back" stands opposed to him that "believeth to the salvation of the soul." The words do therefore plainly suppose, that "the just man," who "liveth by (that) faith," in which, if he persisted, he would "save his soul," may "draw back unto perdition." And this is also evident from the ensuing words, "My soul shall take no pleasure in him," for they do plainly intimate that God took pleasure in him before his drawing back; for otherwise this threat would signify nothing, the Lord taking pleasure in no man but in just men only, and such as "live by faith."

Note, Thirdly, That ἐὰν δὲ may be rendered not hypothetically, "And if," but cùm verò semet subtraxerit, "But when he shall draw back;" which I have shown to be the common import of the Greek ἐὰν, note iii. 15. But if we read them hypothetically, the supposition cannot be of a thing impossible; for then God must be supposed to speak thus, If the just man do that which I know is impossible for him to do, and which I am obliged by promise to preserve him from doing, my soul shall have no pleasure in him; which is to make God seriously to threaten men for such a sin, of which they are not capable, and of which they are engaged to believe they are not capable, if they believe the doctrine of perseverance, and so to threaten them to none effect.

CHAPTER XI.

1 Now (the) faith (by which the just man lives, x. 38) is the [1] substance (or, the firm expectation) of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen (i. e. by which we are confirmed in the truth of them).

2 For by it the elders (i. e. the fathers before and since the flood) obtained a good report (or, testimony from God, left on record in the holy scriptures).

3 Through (that) faith (which is the evidence of things not seen) we understand that the worlds (the lower, middle, and superior worlds, see note on i. 2) were framed [2] by the word of God, so that (the) things (of them) which are seen were not made of things which do (did then) appear (but, ἐκ τῶν ἀοράτων, of things not then visible, Gen. i. 2).

4 By faith Abel offered unto God [3] a more excellent sacrifice than (that of) Cain, by which (faith) he obtained witness (i. e. a testimony from God) that he was righteous (or, accepted by him), [4] God testifying (his acceptance) of his gifts: and by it he being dead yet speaketh (i. e. declareth by his faith, that God is a rewarder of the righteous, though they die).

5 By (virtue of this) faith (that God would reward those that serve him, though in this world he might not do it,) Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and [5] was not found (on earth), because God had translated him (from it): for before his translation he had this testimony (from God, Gen. v. 22. 24), that he pleased God.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XI.

[1] Ver. 1. Ὑπόστασις τῶν ἐλπιζομένων.] The word ὑπόστασις, in the Old Testament answers either to the Hebrew תקוה, which signifies expectation, as Ruth i. 12, ἔστι μοι ὑπόστασις; "Have I any expectation of a husband?" Ezek. xix. 5, ἀπώλετο ὑπόστασις αὐτῆς, "Her expectation was lost:" or to the word תוחלת, which is of the same import, as Ps. xxxix. 7, ἡ ὑπόστασίς μου παρά σοί ἐστι, "My expectation is from thee," Ps. lxxxix. 47. It also bears the same sense in the New Testament, signifying there a confidence of expectation, as 2 Cor. ix. 4, "Lest we should be ashamed, ἐν τῇ ὑποστάσει ταύτῃ τῆς καυχήσεως, in this confidence of boasting:" and, xi. 17, "That which I speak, I speak not after the Lord, but as it were foolishly, ἐν τῇ ὑποστάσει ταύτῃ τῆς καυχήσεως, in this confidence of boasting:" and in this epistle, iii. 14, "We are made partakers of Christ, if we hold, τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς ὑποστάσεως, the beginning of our confidence firm to the end." And this import of the word accords best with the instances of this faith that follow, they being such as generally consisted in the expectation of some future good, which, saith the apostle, they have not yet received completely, ver. 39. Hence it is that I render the words thus, "Faith is the confidence, or firm expectation, of things hoped for."

[2] Ver. 3. Ῥήματι Θεοῦ, By the word of God.] That is, as the comparing this with i. 3 shows, by the word of the divine Λόγος. So Philo, speaking of the framing of the heaven and earth, saith, τῷ γὰρ περιφανεστάτῳ καὶ τηλαυγεστάτῳ ἑαυτοῦ Λόγῳ ῥήματι ὁ Θεὸς ἀμφότερα ποιεῖ, "God hath made them both by his illustrious and splendid Logos, with a word" (Leg. Alleg. lib. i. p. 33, G). And of Moses he saith, that dying, he did not, ἐκλείπειν, "cease to be, nor was he gathered to the most," as others, ἀλλὰ διὰ ῥήματος τοῦ Αἰτίου μετανίσταται, δι' οὗ καὶ ὁ σύμπας κόσμος ἐδημιουργεῖτο, "but he was translated by the word, or command, of that Cause by which the whole world was made" (L. de Sacrif. Abel et Cain, p. 102, C.) Now, whether this ῥῆμα be the word of the Father speaking to the Son or Logos, or the word of the Λόγος, saying, "Let them be made, and they were made," it is hence evident that this Logos must be a person, and not an attribute (see the note on Heb. i. 3).

[3] Ver. 4. Πλείονα θυσίαν, A more excellent sacrifice.] Philo, in his discourse on this subject, De Sacr. Cain et Abel, p. 107, makes the defect of Cain's sacrifice to consist in two things; first, that he did not offer it soon enough, but μετ' ἡμέρας, "after certain days:" secondly, that he did not offer the first-fruits of the earth, as did Abel of the first-fruits of his sheep, but only of the fruits; but there is no ground for either of these things in the text, which seems to intimate, that they both offered at the same time; nor doth it say that Cain offered not of the first-fruits of the earth. The apostle here plainly discovers, that the thing which gave the preference to Abel's sacrifice above that of Cain's was his faith, viz. that "faith" which is "the substance of things hoped for," or his expectation, or persuasion, that God would certainly reward those who diligently endeavour to please him in this or in the other world. Accordingly the Targum of Jerusalem, and Jonathan ben Uziel, upon the place, declare, that "Cain denied that there would be any future judgment or reward hereafter to the just, and that Abel did maintain the contrary, that there should be a future recompense for the righteous:" and this he, being dead, yet preaches by his faith; for this faith, which God so signally approved of, and confirmed with so great a testimony, he will not suffer to go unrewarded, as he must do in one so quickly slain, because God thus preferred his sacrifice before his brother's, if he did not reward him in the other world. And therefore Philo says, that "seeming to die, as to this corruptible life, ζῇ τὴν ἄφθαρτον, καὶ τὴν ἐπὶ Θεῷ ζωὴν εὐδαίμονα, he lived the incorruptible and blessed life in God" (L. Quod deter. &c. p. 127, C, D.) To say, as do the fathers, "He yet speaketh, because he is still celebrated in the world," is to say nothing proper to Abel, that being also true of all the other patriarchs; and to refer this to the cry of his blood for vengeance, is to refer to that which seemeth not to be the commendation of his faith, by which the apostle here declares he speaketh.

[4] Μαρτυροῦντος, God testified upon his gifts.] That is, saith Theodotion, ἐνέπρησε, "he caused fire to descend from heaven, and consume his sacrifice," and thereby testified his acceptance of it: so he discovered his acceptance of the sacrifice of Abraham, Gen. xv. 17, and of the sacrifices of Aaron, Lev. ix. 24, of Gideon, Judg. vi. 21, of David, 1 Chron. xxi. 26, of Solomon, 2 Chron. vii. 1, and of Elijah, 1 Kings xviii. 38. And accordingly the prayer of the Israelites for their king runs thus, "The Lord remember all thy offerings, and turn to ashes thy burnt sacrifice," Ps. xx. 3. To this agrees the interpretation of R. Solomon and Aben Ezra, among the Jews; of Œcumenius and Theophylact on the place: and Jerome* confirms it by this inquiry, "Whence could Cain know that God accepted the sacrifice of Abel, and rejected his, if the interpretation of Theodotion was not true?"

[5] Ver. 5. Οὐχ εὑρίσκετο, &c. Was not found on earth, because God had translated him.] God killed him not, saith Onkelos: and this we may sufficiently learn from the story, Gen. v.; for of all the rest mentioned in that chapter, it is said they "died;" but of him this is not said, but only that "he was not, because God took him," ὅτι μετέθηκεν αὐτὸν ὁ Θεός, "because God translated him," saith the Septuagint, the book of Wisdom, and the son of Sirach (Wisd. iv. 10, Ecclus. xiv. 44). Moreover, it is said of Noah and of Abraham, that they "walked with God," Gen. vi. 9, xvii. 1; but it is not said that they "were not, because God took them;" this phrase must therefore import something which happened not to them: many of the Hebrew doctors say, that he was taken into heaven, or into paradise; "He was taken into heaven by the Word of the Lord," saith the Targum of Jonathan; "He was translated into paradise," say the Arabic and Ethiopic versions; "God showed him the tree of life," say R. Menachem, and Zohar, in 2 Kings ii. 1; "He translated him into paradise," say Kimchi and Menasseh ben Israel.† Hence Munster on the place speaks thus, Asserunt nostri hunc Enoch cum corpore et animâ translatum esse in

6 [6] But without (this) faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God (in a way of duty) must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek (to please) him. (To believe that he is, relates to that faith which is the evidence of things not seen; for God is invisible: to believe that he is a rewarder, to that faith which is the expectation of things hoped for.)

7 By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet (i. e. of a future deluge), moved with fear (of what God threatened), prepared an ark to the saving of his house (from that deluge); by the which he condemned the (old) world (which would not believe his prediction of this deluge), and became [7] heir of the righteousness which is by faith.

8 By faith (in God's promise) Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went, (no, not so much as what the land of promise was; God's first command unto him being only this, Get thee into a land which I shall show thee, Gen. xii. 1.)

9 By faith (Gen. xii. 7. 13. 15) he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise (it being renewed to Isaac, Gen xxvi. 3, and to Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 13):

10 [8] For (God having said unto him, I am thy shield, and thy reward shall be exceeding great, Gen. xv. 1) he looked for a city which hath foundations (a heavenly one, ver. 16, which cannot be shaken, Heb. xii. 28), whose builder and maker is God, (it being not a building made with hands, as those on earth, but eternal in the heavens, 2 Cor. v. 1, Heb. ix. 11.)

11 Through faith also Sara herself (who at first believed not, Gen. xviii. 12, after that the Lord had renewed the promise to her, saying, At the time appointed I will return unto thee, according to the time of life, and Sarah shall have a son, ver. 14) received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past (the ordinary) age (of bearing children), because she judged him faithful who had promised.

12 Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead (his body being dead, and the womb of Sarah dead, as to the procreation of children, Rom. iv. 19), so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as paradisum. To be translated, saith Philo,* is μετοικίαν στείλασθαι τὴν ἀπὸ θνητοῦ βίου πρὸς τὸν ἀθάνατον, "to go from this mortal to an immortal life." The same was the opinion of the ancient fathers, of Irenæus,† and of Pseudo-Justin,‡ who saith, that "they who rose with Christ are with Enoch and Elias, ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ, in paradise." See others cited for this opinion by Feuardentius upon Irenæus. Note, lastly, that this translation into paradise was the fruit of his faith, that faith which was "the expectation of things hoped for," and that God would reward his diligence in seeking him: for since he by this faith "obtained this testimony, that he pleased God," God could not take him hence in displeasure, but out of favour to him.

[6] Ver. 6.] In this sixth verse we have the heathen's creed, that "God is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him;" without which the apostle declares, (1.) That it was impossible for them to please God, and so God must either have laid upon them no obligations to please him, or required what he knew to be impossible, or given them sufficient means to know this. (2.) That they could have no sufficient motives to serve him, or to come unto him in expectation of his blessing upon them that did so, and therefore the heathens embraced this as a principle of natural religion, that "God could not suffer it to go ill with good men, either in life or death," but would be sure to take care of and provide good things for them. Thus Socrates§ requests his judges to receive this as a certain truth, that "a good man, living or dying, can be subject to no evil, because the gods never neglect his affairs;" and this is recommended by Cicero,¶ and by Jamblichus,¶ as the great principle which philosophy suggests as an encouragement to virtue; that "if we believe that nothing is concealed from God, we must believe that which happens to the friend of God, happens for the best; and that what seeming evils happen to him, will do him good, in this or in the other life. For he can never be neglected by the gods who is desirous to be a virtuous and good man, and as like to God as he is able; but περὶ τοῦ ἀδίκου πάντα τούτων ἄτε διανοεῖσθαι, of the wicked and unjust man we are to believe just the contrary." And this again Jamblichus delivers us as a great principle of philosophy, that "if we believe there is a God, who is Lord of all things, we must own that whatsoever is good and honest must be asked of him, for all men give good things to them they love and rejoice in, and the contrary to them to whom they are disaffected, and therefore much more will the gods do so." Another principle, also founded in the nature of man, and laid down by them as the foundation of all religion, was this, That if piety were not advantageous to them, no man would embrace it, it being natural to all men to pursue their advantage, and to decline the contrary. So Arrian,* upon Epictetus, lays down this for an axiom, that "if piety and profit did not go together, piety would be preserved in none; the reason is, because nothing is so natural to us as to affect and pursue our own advantage: so that if you place what is holy and just in that which profits, you preserve them; but if you separate what is honest from what is advantageous, you destroy what is just and honest, as being weighed down by profit."† Simplicius adds,‡ that "where is profit, there we place our piety;" and thence infers, that "we cannot love, honour, and worship the Deity, whatsoever reasons may be alleged for so doing, if we conceive him hurtful, and not profitable to us, because every living creature flies what is hurtful, and the causes of it, and affects and follows what is profitable:" and this they learned from their master Epictetus,§ who lays the foundation of all religion upon this principle, that "where profit is, there is piety:" and he, perhaps, from Plato, who lays it down for an axiom, that τὸ μὲν ὠφέλιμον καλόν, τὸ δὲ βλαβερὸν αἰσχρόν, "what was good was profitable, what evil hurtful."

Of the happiness promised to them who are justified by faith, or to persons who by faith had an hereditary right to it, viz. not only to the temporal salvation the ark afforded, but to that spiritual and celestial which the ark typified (1 Pet. iii. 21). For "being justified through faith, we are made heirs through hope of eternal life," Tit. iii. 7, "heirs of salvation," Heb. i. 14, "heirs of the kingdom," James ii. 5 (see note on Gal. iii. 29, and on Heb. i. 14).

salem Targum, and that of Jonathan, interpret this phrase, "Fear not, the reward of thy work shall be great in the world to come."—"So ought we," saith Theophylact, "to look to things above, and make no great account of those on earth."

Ver. 12. Καὶ ταῦτα.] Some manuscripts read τοῦτον, but all the Greek scholiasts read καὶ ταῦτα, being, according to the custom of the Greek language, used by way of amplification, and signifying idque, and is well rendered by our translation, "and that."

[9] Ver. 13. Τὰς ἐπαγγελίας, The promises.] Here note, (1.) that these words καὶ πεισθέντες, "And were persuaded," are neither to be found in the ancient version, nor the Greek commentators. (2.) That the promises here mentioned, as not received by these patriarchs, cannot be temporal promises: for οὗτοι πάντες, "all these," as it cannot be referred to the whole Jewish offspring, since many of them, as the apostle has observed, iii. 18, 19, iv. 2. 6. 11, "died in unbelief;" so neither to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob only: for (1.) they are not all that died in faith; and, (2.) the same is said of all in general, ver. 39, οὗτοι πάντες, "These all died in faith, not having received the promise." Now we find no temporal promise made to Abel and to Enoch; and that temporal promise which God made to Noah, he fulfilled. (2.) The text saith, "They embraced them, confessing they were strangers and pilgrims upon earth;" whence the apostle makes this inference, that "they sought another country, that is, a heavenly;" which makes it necessary to conceive, that the promises here mentioned, as not received, were, as Œcumenius saith, τὰ οὐράνια, "heavenly promises," τὰ περὶ τῆς βασιλείας τῶν οὐρανῶν, καὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως, "the promise of the kingdom of heaven and the resurrection," saith Theophylact. Thus Philo* saith, οἱ κατὰ Μωυσῆν σοφοὶ πάντες εἰσάγονται παροικοῦντες, "All the wise men are introduced by Moses as strangers, their souls coming from heaven to travel here on earth," and that they desire to return thither; παροίδα μὲν τὸν οὐράνιον ἐν ᾧ πολιτεύονται, ξένον δὲ τὸν περίγειον ἐν ᾧ παρώκησαν νομίζουσαι, "looking upon heaven as the city where they dwell, and the earth in which they travel, as their place of pilgrimage." And again, πᾶσα μὲν ψυχὴ σοφοῦ παροίδα μὲν οὐρανόν, γῆν δὲ ξένην ἔλαχε, "The soul of every wise man looks on heaven as his country, the earth as the place of his pilgrimage" (De Agric. p. 153). So did Abraham, saying, "I am a stranger and a sojouner with you," Gen. xxiii. 4. And Jacob, calling the time he lived here, "the years of his pilgrimage," Gen. xlvii. 9. So David, saying, "I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were," Ps. xxxix. 13. The same he speaks of the whole Jewish nation, saying, 1 Chron. xxix. 15, "We are strangers before thee, and sojourners, as were all our fathers." And this he learned out of the law, where God speaks thus to them, Lev. xxv. 23, "The land is mine, for ye are strangers and sojourners with me, ἐναντίον μου, saith the Septuagint. Accordingly, the philosophers taught, that to die was to go into our country, πρὸς τὴν πατρίδα τὴν ἀληθινὴν ὅδεν ἥλθομεν, "to the true country whence we came" (Simpl. in Epict. p. 77).

[10] Ver. 16. Κρείττονος ὀρέγονται, They desire a better country.] The ancient Jews declare, that "the earthly Canaan was a type of the spiritual Canaan, and the promise of living in it for ever, was a parable representing their future happiness in the world to come." It is written,* "All Israelites have their portion in the world to come, as it is said, And thy people shall be all just, they shall inherit the land for ever," Isa. lx. 21. "This land," saith Maimonides,† "is a parable, as if he should say, The land of the living; and that is the world to come." And R. Menachem on Gen. xii. refers it to "the land which is above, watered with waters which are above." If they received this parabolical interpretation from the patriarchs, here is the reason of their faith, and expectation of this better country. Vain here is the interpretation of Mr. Le Clerc, both upon the tenth and sixteenth verses; for, (1.) a city which has foundations is, saith he, Jerusalem; whereas, in Abraham's time there was no such city that he could expect; nor was that "a city which could not be shaken," Heb. xii. 28, it having been long since destroyed; nor was it "a city whose builder and maker was God," but man. Again, he expected a better country, that is, a heavenly, "i. e. the land of Canaan, which was an antitype of heaven:" so Mr. Le Clerc, in flat contradiction to the apostle, saying, the country they expected "was not that from whence they came out," ver. 14, 15; i. e. was not Canaan, but "a heavenly country;" and he adds, "God had provided for them a city," not Jerusalem, sure, but "a heavenly city."

[11] Οὐκ ἐπαισχύνεται, God is not ashamed to be called their God.] i. e. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. To be their God and their Father is the same thing. Thus, Jer. xxxi. 1, "I will be the God of all the families of Israel," ver. 9, is thus varied, "I am a Father to Israel." "I will be their God, and they shall be my people," 2 Cor. vi. 16, is, ver. 18, "I will be a Father to you, and you shall be my sons and my daughters." To be sons of God, is to be "heirs of God," Rom. viii. 17, to be "sons of the resurrection," Luke xx. 36, to "inherit all things," Rev. xx. 7. And the υἱοθεσία, or "adoption" promised by God, is "the redemption of the body" from corruption (see note on Matt. xxii. 31, 32, and on Rom. xviii. 17. 23): and this is the reason why God, taking upon himself the title of their God and Father, answers this title, by "preparing for them a city."

[12] Ver. 17. Προσενήνοχεν, &c. He offered up Isaac.] So speaks the New Testament twice, here and James ii. 21. So the Jews constantly; Philo‡ informs us, that though the fact was not perfected, "yet it was preserved in the minds of the readers, and mentioned in the sacred volumes, as a thing entirely and absolutely done." And to this day they pray,§ "That God would be gracious to them for the merit of the sacrifice of Isaac," according to the prayer which both the Targum of Jerusalem and Jonathan mention on Gen. xxii. 14, as made by Abraham; to this effect, viz. "I beseech thee, O God, by thy mercies, that when the sons of Isaac shall offer to thee in the time of their necessity, thou wilt be mindful of this binding of Isaac." Hence have they framed this story,* "That when the knife touched the throat of Isaac, his soul departed, and that when God said, Lay not thy hand upon the lad, it returned, and so he, being dead, revived." And truly Abraham, having done all that belonged to him to do towards this offering his son, and being fully resolved to have gone through the work, had not God's call restrained him, may well be said, in the divine construction, to have actually done it; and to this some refer Abraham's receiving Isaac "from the dead in a figure," he being thus snatched from the jaws of death, and restored to him when he expected nothing but his death.

[13] Ver. 20. Εὐλόγησεν τὸν Ἰακὼβ, He blessed Jacob.] It may be inquired how he could bless Jacob by faith, when he knew not that it was Jacob. To this I answer, that to the blessing him by faith, it was not necessary he should know him to be the person he intended thus to bless, but only that he should feel the divine afflatus, or the Spirit of prophecy upon him when he blessed him; that being sufficient to confirm him, that his benediction should be established by that God before whom he blessed him, and who guided his lips and his heart in it: and though we have translated it as a prayer, it mostly runs in the future tense, and may wholly be translated as a prophecy, and so it must be uttered in faith. And whereas it is objected farther, that Isaac thought he was blessing Esau; now so to bless him as to make him lord over his brother (ver. 29), could not be spoken in faith, because the oracle had before declared to Rebekah, "that the elder should serve the younger:" I answer, first, that this rather is an argument against the truth of his benediction, than the faith of it; it rather proves that Isaac should not thus have blessed Esau, than that he believed not what he said: but indeed it proves neither, for Isaac might feel such a strong afflatus upon him, as might convince him that his benediction was derived from the gift of prophecy, and so would certainly be accomplished, whomsoever it concerned. Secondly, the learned Bishop of Ely on ver. 4 answers, that either Rebekah had not acquainted Isaac with the oracle, or it seems he did not understand it as Rebekah did.

[14] Ver. 21. Καὶ προσεκύνησεν, And worshipped] God, for the assurance he had of being buried in the land of promise, which he desired out of faith in the promise God had made to him, Gen. xxviii. 13.

[15] Ver. 23. Ἀστεῖον, A comely child.] He was, saith Stephen, ἀστεῖος τῷ Θεῷ, "of a very excellent beauty," Acts vii. 20, μορφῇ θείος, "of a divine form," saith Josephus;† "of an angelical form," say the Jews.‡ He was, saith Justin, one, quem formæ pulchritudo commendabat, renowned for his beauty. Josephus also adds,§ that an Egyptian scribe, to whose predictions they gave great credit, had foretold one should be born of Israel, "who, if he came to age, should grievously afflict the Egyptians, and bring out the Israelites from among them; and that God had by a vision declared to Amram, that this child, to be born to him, should deliver the Israelites out of Egypt;" which, if true, gives a farther ground of their faith.

[16] Ver. 24.] Josephus informs us, that when Pharaoh had put the crown upon his head, adopting him as the son of his daughter, to be his successor, "he let the crown fall to the ground, and stamped upon it with his feet." But the words μέγας γενόμενος being the very words used Exod. ii. 11, where it is said, "It came to pass, that when Moses was grown, he went out unto his brethren;" the apostle doubtless had relation to them, and interpreted his going out unto them to be his owning himself to be one of them. "It came into his heart," saith Stephen, "to visit his brethren" (Acts vii. 23); i. e. to join himself to the afflicted Jews.

[17] Ver. 26. Τὸν ὀνειδισμὸν, The reproach of Christ.] The seed of Abraham, even before they went down to Egypt, are styled "the christs of God;" Ps. cv. 15, μὴ ἅψησθε τῶν χριστῶν μου, "Touch not my christs." And the prophet Habakkuk, speaking of God's judgments upon Pharaoh, and God's deliverance of them from him, saith, ἐξῆλθες εἰς σωτηρίαν λαοῦ σου τοῦ σῶσαι τὸν χριστόν σου, "Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people, to preserve thy christ" (Hab. iii. 13): so that "the reproach of Christ" may be the reproach of the people of God (ver. 15). Moreover, the reproach which he and they suffered was for their faith in the promised seed, and that was Christ (Gal. iii. 16); on which account it might be truly styled "the reproach of Christ," as the afflictions of the apostle are styled "the afflictions of Christ," Col. i. 24, and he himself "the prisoner of Christ," Eph. iii. 1, as being the reproach he suffered for his faith in the promised seed, which was Christ.

Photius here saith, "The reproach of Moses may be called the reproach of Christ, as being such as Christ suffered," νῦν ὁ Χριστὸς ἔπαθε, in which sense we are bid to "go forth to him without the camp, bearing his reproach," xiii. 13. Betwixt this and the following verse some Latin copies insert these words, Fide magnus factus Moses occidit Ægyptium, considerans dolorem suorum, which Dr. Mills thinks genuine, though they are neither owned by any of the versions, nor any of the Greek commentators.

[18] Εἰς τὴν μισθαποδοσίαν, The recompense of reward] Here mentioned could not be temporal, for Moses came not into the land of Canaan, nor could he expect any greater blessings in that land than he might have had in Egypt. He therefore must have respect to some spiritual and heavenly recompence.

[19] Ver. 27. Μὴ φοβηθεὶς, Not fearing.] It is expressly said that Moses, when he fled from the face of Pharaoh, "feared," Exod. ii. 14; and it is farther evident from these words of God to him, "Go, return into Egypt, for all the men are dead that sought thy life," iv. 19. And therefore they who refer this to that flight say, "He did not fear his wrath, so wrath of the king (when he pursued after him, Exod. xiv. 13): for he endured, as seeing him (present with them) who is invisible (and therefore said unto the people, ver. 30, Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of God, Exod. xiv. 14).

28 Through faith (in God's promise, that upon seeing the blood of the paschal lamb upon the upper door-posts, and the two side-posts of the houses of the Israelites, he would pass over them, when he slew the first-born of the Egyptians, Exod. xii. 13. 23) he kept the passover, and (observed) the sprinkling of (the) blood (of it; and this he did) lest he that destroyed the firstborn (see note on 1 Cor. x. 10) should touch them.

29 By faith they passed [20] through the Red sea as by dry land: which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned.

30 By faith (in God's promise, Josh. vi. 5) the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compassed about seven days.

31 [21] By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not, (which faith she testified) when she had received the spies with peace.

32 And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me (should I proceed) to tell of Gedeon (who, through faith overthrew the Midianites, Judg. vii.), and of Barak (who slew the Canaanites, Judg. iv.), and of Samson (who vexed the Philistines), and of Jephthae (who slew the Ammonites, Judg. xi.; and) of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets:

33 Who through faith subdued kingdoms (as Joshua and David did), wrought righteousness (as Abraham, Gen. xv. 6, Phinehas, Ps. cvi. 30, or turned the people from idolatry into the way of righteousness, as Samuel, 1 Sam. xii., Elijah, 1 Kings xviii. 39), obtained promises (as Abraham and David), stopped the mouths of lions (as Daniel),

34 Quenched the violence of fire (as the three children, Dan. iii. 17), escaped the edge of the sword (as David did the sword of Goliath, 1 Sam. xvii. 46, 47, and of Saul; the Jews the sword of Haman, Esth. iv. 14, Elijah the sword of Ahaziah, 2 Kings i. 15), out of weakness were made strong (as Gideon with his three hundred men, Judg. vii. 15, Samson, Judg. xvi. 28, Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xx. 12, Jonathan, 1 Sam. xiv. 12, Job and Hezekiah, 2 Kings xix.), waxed valiant in fight (as Joshua, Gideon, David), turned to flight the armies of the aliens (the Maccabees).

35 Women received their dead raised to life again (the widow of Zarephath, 1 Kings vii. 20, the Shunammite, 2 Kings iv. 36): and others were tortured (Eleazar, 2 Macc. vi. 28), not accepting deliverance (ver. 26. 30); that they might obtain a better resurrection (2 Macc. vii. 9. 11. 14. 23. 29. 36):

36 And others had trial of cruel mockings (2 Macc. vii. 7. 10) and scourgings (μαστιγούμενοι, 2 Macc. vi. 30, vii. 1. 37), yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonment (as Joseph, Samson, Jeremiah):

37 They were stoned (as Zechariah, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21), they were sawn asunder (σώματα λιμαινόμενοι, Isaiah, by Manasseh; see Buxt. Lex. p. 1360), [22] were tempted (or, ἐπυράσθησαν, they were scorched and fried, 2 Macc. vii. 5), were slain with the sword (1 Macc. ii. 38): they wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins (Elijah, 1 Kings xiii. 19, 2 Kings ii. 8. 14); being destitute, (as Elijah when fed by crows, 1 Kings xvii. 4,) afflicted, tormented; (Gr. evilly entreated, 1 Kings xix. 10.

38 And though they were men) (Of whom the world was not worthy:) (yet) they wandered in deserts (1 Macc. ii. 29), and in mountains (ver. 28), and in dens and caves of the earth (2 Macc. vi. 11).

as to distrust the providence of God in working a deliverance to his people by his hand;" but his unwillingness, when God commanded him to go back to Egypt, confutes this gloss. Others say he feared not the wrath of the king, when he said unto him, "Take heed to thyself, see my face no more; for in that day thou seest my face thou shalt die," Exod. x. 28. But then he had not forsaken Egypt, and when he went from it, he did so by the command of Pharoah, Exod. xii. 31, and so needed not to fear him. Against the exposition given in the paraphrase it is objected, that it agrees not with the order of the words, because the passover, mentioned ver. 28, was kept in Egypt. But this objection will be of little force, if we consider that other things are mentioned in this chapter out of the order in which they were performed; thus, ver. 32, Gideon is mentioned before Barak, and Samson before Jephthah, as also ver. 33—36.

[20] Ver. 29. Through the Red sea.] That this they truly did, see note on 1 Cor. x. 1.

[21] Ver. 31.] She testified her faith, not only by preserving thus the spies, but by saying to them, "I know that the Lord hath given you this land," Josh. ii. 9; and again, "The Lord your God he is God in heaven above, and on earth beneath," ver. 11.

[22] Ver. 37. Ἐπειράσθησαν.] That this is not the right reading, may easily be gathered from this one consideration, that after two such great punishments as stoning and being sawn asunder, it is very improper to introduce their "being tempted," which signifies no certain kind of punishment at all, and is included in all the other punishments here mentioned. Some therefore read ἐπυράσθησαν, some ἐπυρώθησαν, some ἐπρήσθησαν, all signifying, "They were burnt;" which reading agrees well with the story of the Maccabees, where they bring Eleazar and the young men ἐπὶ τὸ πῦρ καταβλέγοντες αὐτοῦς, "to the fire, and burnt their flesh:" so that Josephus (from cap. 6 to cap. 12) saith, they were, ὡς ἐπὶ πυρὶ μετασχηματιζόμενοι εἰς ἀφθαρσίαν, "as one might say, translated in the fire to incorruption." But yet I prefer the opinion of those who think this was an error arising ἐκ διττογραφίας, "from writing the same word twice," or rather that some who knew not what ἐπρίσθησαν meant, writ for it ἐπειράσθησαν, and so in time they came to be both written; because the Syriac hath not ἐπειράσθησαν. Eusebius* cites Paul's words thus, ἐλιθάσθησαν, ἐπρίσθησαν, ἐν φόνῳ μαχαίρας ἀπέθανον. Tertullian† paraphrases them thus, Hieremias lapidatur, Esaias secatur, Zacharias inter altare et ædem trucidatur. Clement‡ of Alexandria reads thus, ἐλιθάσθησαν, ἐπειράσθησαν, ἐν φόνῳ, &c., which gives just ground to conjecture that some ignorant writer put ἐπρειράσθησαν for ἐπρίσθησαν. This fault is very visible in the transcriber of Origen;§ for in his fourth homily of Jeremy we read in the Greek, ἐπρίσθησαν, ἐπειράσθησαν, but in the old translation there is only secti occisione gladii occubuerunt. And in the fifteenth homily,‖ ἄλλον ἐλιθοβόλησαν, ἄλλον ἐπρίσθησαν, ἄλλον ἐπίκτειναν, which shows that Origen did not own the word ἐπειράσθησαν. And though we find the word again in his homilies¶ on Matthew, yet whosoever reads the place will find that Origen takes no notice of it, but proceeds immediately from ἐπρίσθησαν to ἐν φόνῳ μαχαίρας ἀπέθανον, saying, the word ἐπρίσθησαν refers to Isaias, and the words ἐν φόνῳ μαχαίρας ἀπέθανον to Zacharias. In the fourth dialogue against Marcion, p. 125, he proves that the prophets were not phantoms, but men consisting of flesh and blood, because ὁ μὲν ἐπρίσθη σαρκὶ, ὁ δὲ ἐλιθάσθη, καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ ἐν φόνῳ μαχαίρας ἀπέθανον, "one of them was sawn asunder, another was stoned, and the rest were killed by the sword:" and in his Exhortation to Martyrdom, p. 232, he adds, "The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews saith, ἐλιθάσθησαν, ἐπρίσθησαν, ἐν φόνῳ μαχαίρας ἀπέθανον, They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were slain with the sword." From all which places it is evident, that ἐπρίσθησαν was the reading followed by the ancients.

through faith, (μαρτυρηθέντες, having obtained a testimony from God, or from his word, that they pleased him through faith, notwithstanding) [23] received not the promise (of a heavenly country, ver. 13. 16, not the recompense of reward, ver. 26, not the better resurrection, ver. 35):

40 God having provided (Gr. foreseen) [24] some better thing for us (and so deferring the completion of that promise till we also should be made partakers of it), [25] that (so) they without us should not be made perfect.

[23] Ver. 39. Οὐκ ἐκομίσαντο τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν (or, as some copies read, τὰς ἐπαγγελίας), Received not the promises.] These words being the same with those in ver. 13 of this chapter, "All these died in faith, μὴ λαβόντες ἐπαγγελίας, not having received the promises," it is reasonable to interpret them to the same sense, viz. of their not having received the heavenly kingdom and blessed resurrection they expected. And so the whole current of this epistle will force us to interpret them: for it is the promise of "entering into rest" after we have "ceased from our labour" here on earth (iv. 1. 10), "the promise of an eternal inheritance" (ix. 15), the promise we are to receive after we have "patiently done the will of God" (x. 36).

[24] Ver. 40. Κρεῖττόν τι περὶ ἡμῶν, Some better thing concerning us.] viz. Our hope of entering into the veil, by reason of our forerunner entering in thither first (vi. 19, 20): we having a high-priest "higher than the heavens" (vii. 26), "set on the throne of majesty in the heavens" (viii. 1), who by his death hath procured, that "they which are called might receive the promise of an eternal inheritance" (ix. 15), and who hath, by his entrance into this holy place with his blood, "purified and prepared these holy places for us," (ver. 23, 24; the way into which was "not opened before," ver. 8), and given us "freedom of entrance into the holiest through the blood of Jesus, by this new way which he hath consecrated through his flesh" (x. 20); we being therefore "come to mount Sion, the city of the living God, to the heavenly Jerusalem, and to the spirits of just men made perfect" (xii. 22).

[25] Ἵνα μὴ χωρὶς ἡμῶν τελειωθῶσι, That they without us may not be made perfect.] This all the fathers interpret of their receiving their crowns or their rewards hereafter. Thus of Abel and Noah Chrysostom saith, "That they might not be crowned before us, ἵνα ὥριαε πᾶσι τῶν στεφάνων καιρὸν, God hath appointed one time of coronation for them all." Οὐδέπω τῶν στεφάνων ἐπήλαυσαν, "They have not yet obtained their crowns," saith Theodoret, "God expecting still those that are to combat, that he may proclaim them victors altogether." Origen having cited this place, saith thus:* "You see that Abraham yet expects to obtain perfection, yea, Isaac and Jacob, and all the prophets expect us, that with us they may obtain perfect bliss." Yea, he says the same, not only of all the saints of the New Testament, but even of the blessed apostles, saying,* "Even the apostles have not received their joy, but wait that I might be partaker with them; nor do the saints departed obtain the full reward of their good actions." Nor did the primitive fathers mean this only of their bodies, but also of their souls, which they conceived not to be exalted to the highest heavens; saying, that they had not yet received their full reward, yea, that they were not to expect it till the day of judgment (see note on 2 Tim. iv. 8). And therefore I cannot but wonder to hear a very learned person, in his note on this place, saying, "It will be acknowledged by all, that then," i. e. at our Saviour's resurrection, "the patriarchs received this promise, or that the sufferers here mentioned then received it;" especially when the apostle here saith, "They were tortured, not accepting a deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection," which surely they have not yet obtained: and I more admire that this should by him be interpreted of "deliverance from their persecutors, and rest from persecutions;" for is this promise fulfilled to Christians? To them, who, "if they will live godly, must suffer persecutions," and "through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of God?" And do they who were thus tortured find this perfection "with us?" Or had they any other rest or freedom from them, than what death gave them? Surely the exposition of all the ancient fathers is much to be preferred before this new and singular invention, as also before the new doctrine of the Florentine council, "That the souls of saints departed do already behold the face of God in heaven."

* Vides ergò quia exspectat adhuc Abraham, ut quæ perfecta sunt consequatur, exspectat et Isaac et Jacob, et omnes prophetæ exspectant nos, ut nobiscum perfectam beatitudinem capiant. In Lev. hom. vii. f. 71, D.

CHAPTER XII.

1 Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a [1] cloud (i. e. a multitude) of witnesses, let us (who are to run a Christian race) lay aside every weight (of worldly cares and affections), and the [2] sin which doth so easily beset (and circumvent) us (and so hinders our feet from making a due progress in it), and let us run with patience the race that is set before us,

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XII.

[1] Ver. 1. Νέφος, A cloud,] For a multitude, is a phrase used by Homer, who calls a multitude of footmen, νέφος πεζῶν, which Virgil* thus translates, Insequitur nimbus peditum: this cloud of witnesses therefore contains all the worthies mentioned in the former chapter, who by their words and actions have testified how much the objects of their faith were valued before all worldly things, and how equitable it was to "endure afflictions, not accepting a deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection."

[2] Τὴν εὐπερίστατον ἁμαρτίαν, The sin that easily besets us.] The apostle being here speaking of the Christian's race, this phrase is best interpreted with relation to it, and so it must respect the sin which cleaves to our affections, which are the set before him (as a reward of his sufferings) endured the cross, despising the shame (of it), and (therefore) is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.

[3] Ver. 2. Ἀφορῶντες, &c. Looking to Jesus,] As an example of patience under sufferings, fit to be imitated by his disciples, and as one gloriously recompensed in his human nature for the sufferings he sustained in it, and as one who will give to us the same happy repose after our sufferings; he having, as the author of our faith, promised, and being able, as the finisher of our faith, to confer that glorious recompense (x. 35, 36).

3 For consider him that (being so excellent a person, and so dear to God, yet) endured (patiently) such contradiction of sinners against himself (such blasphemies against his doctrine, such calumnies against his person, such malicious and unwearied attempts against his life), [5] lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds, (under the conflict of afflictions ye endure.

4 For which fainting ye have no such cause as this Captain of salvation, and this cloud of witnesses had: for) [6] Ye have not yet resisted unto blood (as they did), striving against sin.

5 And (by your proneness to grow weary, and even faint under the combat,) ye (seem to) have forgotten the exhortation which speaketh unto you as unto children (thus), My son, [7] despise not thou (be not slothful and dispirited under) the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him (Prov. iii. 11, 12):

6 For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth (into that relation).

7 If ye (then) endure chastening, [8] God dealeth with you as (a father) with (his) sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not (for his offences)?

8 [9] But if ye be without (such) chastisement, whereof all (sons) are partakers, then are ye (treated as) bastards (whom the reputed parent disregards), and not (as) sons (whom he loves, ver. 6).

9 Furthermore (εἰ δὲ, and if) we have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and (yet) we gave them reverence (and honour, in expectation of the long life promised to them that do so, Exod. xx. 12): shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the [10] Father of (our) spirits (who gives and who recalls our spirits at pleasure), and (so) live (everlastingly)?

him.] That ἀντὶ is used for the final cause, appears from these examples in the New Testament; "He gave himself a ransom ἀντὶ πολλῶν, for many," Matt. xx. 28; "Render not evil, ἀντὶ κακοῦ, for evil," Rom. xii. 17; "Her hair is given, ἀντὶ περιβολαίου, for a covering," 1 Cor. xi. 15; ἀντὶ τούτου, "For this cause shall a man leave father and mother;" and here, ver. 16, ἀντὶ βρώσεως μιᾶς, "For one morsel of bread he sold his birthright" (see 1 Thess. v. 15, 1 Pet. iii. 9). Note also, that the apostle goes on in his agonistical terms, and having spoken, ver. 1, of the προκείμενος ἡμῖν ἀγῶν, "race before us" to run, he here speaks in the same language, of the joy set before our Saviour in his race; that is, of the βραβεῖον, the "prize" or crown placed in his view for his encouragement to run to it; it being the custom in those games* "to hang the crown at the end of the goal, that he who came first to it might snatch it, or lay hold of it:" "the joy set before him" must therefore be the prospect of that majesty and glory, power and dominion, he in his human nature was to be invested with, as the reward of these his sufferings; "he for the suffering of death being crowned with majesty and honour" (Heb. ii. 9); "God having therefore highly exalted him, and given him a name above every name" (Phil. ii. 9): and thus we have just cause to look upon him as an example of faith and patience, and of God's especial favour to them that suffer for his sake.

[5] Ver. 3. Ἵνα μὴ κάμητε ἐκλυόμενοι, Lest you be wearied and faint in your minds.] These also are two agonistical terms; the one signifies to be weary, as in those words of C. Marcius,† νικώντων οὐκ ἔστι τὸ κάμνειν, "Conquerors must not be weary, and so give over the fight;" the other, to faint and be dispirited, so that we can run or fight no longer: and because in those combats they fought ὀρθοστάδην, "standing upright," and χεῖρας ἐκτείνοντες, "stretching out their hands," therefore the apostle exhorts them, in their spiritual combat, to "stretch out the hands that hang down, and ἀνορθοῦν, to erect their feeble knees," ver. 12 (Faber. Agon. lib. i. cap. 8).

[6] Ver. 4. Ἀνταγωνιζόμενοι μέχρις αἵματος, Ye have not resisted unto blood.] This is another agonistical expression belonging to the pugiles, who were oft besmeared with blood, and sometimes died under the blows they received from the clubs of their adversary (Faber. Agon. lib. i. cap. 7).

[7] Ver. 5. Μὴ ὀλιγώρει.] Ὀλιγωρεῖν is, say Phavorinus and Hesychius, ἀμελεῖν, ῥᾳθυμεῖν, "to be unregardful of, to be slothful;" ὀλίγωρος, μικρόψυχος, "to be crest-fallen;" ἀναπίπτειν, animo concidere, "to faint, and be dispirited." Τὸ ἀναπίπτειν, κυρίως ἐπὶ ψυχὴν ἐστὶν, οἷον ἀθυμεῖν ὀλιγωρεῖν. Athen. Deip. lib. i. p. 23, B.

[8] Ver. 7. God dealeth with us as with sons.] Here the note of Chrysostom is this, That from those things, whence men usually conclude they are deserted by God, the apostle shows, that God demonstrates his fatherly affection to them.

[9] Ver. 8.] Hence the Jews speak thus, "Woe to the man who goeth out of the world without tribulation" (Buxt. Lex. p. 1528).

[10] Ver. 9. Τῷ πατρὶ τῶν πνευμάτων, To the Father of spirits.] This phrase is not here put to signify the author of our new spiritual birth; for spiritual graces and dispositions are never called πνεύματα, "spirits" in scripture; nor is the Holy Spirit, who produceth them, ever mentioned in the plural, when they are spoken of. It is plainly a Hebrew phrase, used twice by Moses when he speaks thus to God, "O God of the spirits of all flesh" (Numb. xvi. 22); and again, "Let the Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh, set a man over the congregation" (Numb. xxvii. 16); and he is so styled, both as the Creator of them, or that God who "formeth the spirit of man within him" (Zech. xii. 1), and the preserver and governor of them; "The God in whose hand is the soul of all living, and the spirit of all flesh of man" (Job xii. 10), and into whose hands they do "return" at death (Eccles. xii. 7), according to that old tradition of the heathens, preserved in Epicharmus,* that man dying, ἀπῆλθεν ὅθεν ἦλθε πάλιν, γᾶ μὲν εἰς γᾶν, πνεῦμα δ' ἄνω, "returns from whence he came, his earthly part to the earth, his spirit upwards:" and the tradition of the Hebrews, that in the time of our dissolution† "God comes and takes away his part, and leaves the part of our father and mother," styled here, "the fathers of the flesh." Josephus saith,‡ that at the formation of Adam, "God made man out of the earth, and sent him a soul and spirit." Philo saith,§ that "his body was indeed made of earth, shaped into human form, but his soul was only derived from the Maker and Governor of all things;" and this was signified by these words, "He breathed into him the breath of life:" so that though according to his visible part he was mortal, as to his invisible he was immortal: hence saith the Targum of Jonathan, on Numb. xvi. 22, xxvii. 16, "It is God that putteth the spirit of the soul in the bodies of all men:" and the Targum of Jerusalem, "It is God who ruleth over the souls of all flesh" (see Pug. Fid. p. 401).

[11] Ver. 10. Πρὸς ὀλίγας ἡμέρας, For a few days] Seems not here to refer to the days of children's minority, for that makes nothing to the purpose of the apostle's argument; and the motive to suffer divine chastisements, used by the scripture, is, not that they are long, but that they are but "for a very little while," Heb. x. 7, "momentary," 2 Cor. iv. 17, ὀλίγον ἄρτι, "but for a little," 1 Pet. i. 6; nor is κατὰ τὸ δοκοῦν αὐτοῖς, "after their pleasure," but "as it seemed good to them." This therefore seems to be the meaning of the words, That earthly parents chastise their children, aiming at that which seems best for them in this present life, consisting of few days, or for their temporal good in this life: but God doth it for their spiritual and eternal benefit, to make them here "partakers of his holiness," and so fit them for "the peaceable fruits of righteousness" hereafter.

[12] Ver. 11.] The word γεγυμνασμένοις, used here, shows that this phrase is agonistical, and taken from the exercises performed by them naked in the Olympic games, where one of the crowns given to the victors being στέφανος ἐλαΐνος, "of olive," the symbol of peace; hence Faber conceives the Christian's crown is here represented by "the peaceable fruits of righteousness."

[13] Ver. 13. Τροχιὰς ὀρθὰς, Straight paths.] i. e. Make straight paths in the way of Christianity, not stepping out of it to avoid persecution, that they who are already lame and feeble, may not be moved, by your example, to go out of it, but rather, by your constancy in it, may be confirmed.

[14] Ver. 14.] Be of a pure and peaceable conversation towards all with whom you do converse; for as this is necessary in order to your living with God, so will it tend much to prevent the persecutions of men.

[15] Ver. 15.] That ὑστερηκέναι is the same with ἀφίστασθαι, "to depart from the grace of God, which brings salvation;" or, to depart from the faith, and by so doing fall short of the promised rest, Heb. iv. 1, the words of the apostle, and his scope, which is to preserve the Jews from backsliding from Christianity to Judaism, and the following exhortation, not to "refuse him that speaketh now," ver. 25, and ἔχειν τὴν χάριν, "to retain and hold fast the grace of God," ver. 28, sufficiently show. But this is still more clear from the words of Deut. xxix. 18, whence this whole verse is taken, which runs thus; μὴ τίς ἐστιν ἐν ὑμῖν——τινὸς ἡ διανοία ἐξέκλινεν ἀπὸ Κυρίου, "Lest there be among you any man or woman whose heart turneth away from the Lord our God, to go and serve the gods of the nations, μὴ τίς ἐστιν ἐν ὑμῖν ῥίζα ἄνω φέρουσα ἐν χολῇ καὶ πικρίᾳ, lest there should be among you a root springing with gall and wormwood;" which makes it probable that the true reading here should be, not ἐνοχλῇ but ἐν χολῇ· though it be certain, that the word ἐνοχλέω signifies to create trouble to ourselves or others, as Dan. vi. 21, Esth. ii. 22. 29, and in those words of Antoninus, lib. vii. §. 16, τὸ ἡγεμονικὸν αὐτὸ οὐχ ἑαυτῷ ἐνοχλεῖ; "Doth not the mind create trouble to itself!" See the full consent of the ancients to the word ἐνοχλῇ, which is here rejected by Dr. Mills, Examen Millii in locum.

[16] Ver. 16. Πρωτοτοκία, The birthright] Which Esau sold contained these privileges: (1.) a double portion of his father's goods, Deut. xxi. 17; (2.) power and dominion over the younger; for he succeeded in the government of the family, or kingdom: "Reuben, thou art my first-born, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power," Gen. xlix. 3; "The kingdom gave he to Jehoram, because he was the first-born," 2 Chron. xxi. 3. This Isaac gave to Jacob in these words, "Be thou a master to thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee," Gen. xxvii. 29. (3.) The honour of priesthood, in their own family at least: so, Exod. xxiv. 5, "He sent the young men" (Chald. "the first-born") "of the sons of Israel, and they offered burnt-offerings, and sacrificed sacrifices to Jehovah." Afterward the Levites were taken into the service of God, instead of all the first-born among the "children of Israel," Numb. iii. 41, consecrated before to God, Exod. xxii. 29, Numb. viii. 17, Gen. xxv. 29. This birthright Esau sold, when he was faint, ἐκλείπων, and this shows how proper this instance is to preserve them from being "wearied and fainting in their minds."

The Targum of Ben Uziel saith, that he was made faint by committing idolatry, shedding innocent blood, and going in to a damsel betrothed, that day; and this shows him a fornicator, both in the spiritual and carnal sense, and a profane person. And, lastly, Mercer saith, Primogenituram hæreditatem cœlestem adumbrâsse; "that the primogeniture was a type of their celestial inheritance:" which also seems to be hinted by the paraphrases on the place; for that of Uziel saith, "He denied the life of the world to come and contemned his birthright:" and the Targum of Jerusalem, that "he contemned his birthright and despised his part in the life to come, and denied the resurrection;" and Chrysostom here styles him ἀκρατὴς καὶ πνευματικὰ ἄπεμβολῶν. And as this shows his profaneness, so also doth it show the appositeness of his example to the apostle's purpose.

[17] Ver. 17. Ἐκζητήσας μετὰ δακρύων αὐτήν, Though he sought it carefully with tears.] Though these words, thus expounded, do not immediately prove that true repentance may find no acceptance with God (that which Esau sought with tears, being not his own repentance, but the blessing which Isaac gave to Jacob, and would not repent of, Gen. xxvii. 33), yet are they designed to insinuate, that men may so despise the blessings of Christianity, as to be after thought unworthy to enjoy them; that by their apostasy they may fall so entirely from God, as that he will not be prevailed on to restore them to their lost and despised privileges, upon their tears and fastings; as is apparent in the case of the Jews, who have large times of penance and humiliation, but are not to this day restored to the grace and favour of God, and to the privilege of being his peculiar people, and first born, as once they were.

[18] Ver. 18. Ψηλαφωμένῳ ὄρει, To the mountain that might be touched.] And therefore was corporeal and terrene, and and the (great) voice of words; which voice (was so terrible, that) they that heard (it) intreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more (lest they died for it, Exod. xx. 19, Deut. v. 25, xviii. 16):

20 (For they could not endure [19] that which was commanded (that severe cautionary command which runs thus), And if so much as a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned, or thrust through with a dart:

21 And so terrible was the sight, that [20] Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake:)

22 But ye are come (under the gospel dispensation, to things of a more excellent nature, not apt to terrify and discourage, but create joy and comfort to you: not as then to mount Sinai, but) [21] unto mount Sion, (whence you expect all your spiritual blessings; not to the terrestrial Jerusalem, which is in bondage with her children, Gal. iv. 25, but) and unto the city of the living God, [22] the heavenly Jerusalem, and (not to thousands of angels attending on God, as at mount Sinai, Ps. lxviii. 17, but) to an [23] innumerable company of angels, (ministering to them who shall be heirs of salvation, Heb. i. 14,

25 [29] See (therefore) that ye [30] refuse not him that by being touched after the prohibition (Exod. xix. 12) would procure present death: but you are come to the spiritual and heavenly Zion, which will certainly give life to all that belong to it.

[19] Ver. 20. Τὸ διαστελλόμενον.] Διαστέλλομαι signifies to command with vehemence, or severity, Matt. xvi. 20, Mark v. 43, viii. 15.

[20] Ver. 21. Μωϋσῆς εἶπεν, Moses said.] This, interpreters think, Paul received by tradition of his ancestors, though no footsteps of this tradition have been found among them. But doubtless the apostle had respect to Deut. ix., where, ver. 15, Moses sees the mount "burning up to heaven," and ver. 19, saith ἐφοβῆς εἰμι, "I exceedingly fear."

[21] Ver. 22. Σιὼν ὄρει, To mount Zion.] All the good things, blessings, and comforts, which God will give to Israel, are only out of Zion, say the Jews, Vajikra Rabba, §. 24, Midrash Tillim ad Ps. xiv. Hence came their strength, Ps. cx. 2, and help, Ps. xx. 2, blessings, Ps. cxxviii. 5, life, Ps. cxxxiii. 3, and salvation, Ps. xiv. 7.

[22] Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐπουρανίῳ, To the heavenly Jerusalem,] "Which is the mother of us all," Gal. iv. 26; where "our city is," Phil. iii. 20. This the rabbins call "the Jerusalem of the age to come, to be built in the days of the Messiah;" saying also, that "the inferior Jerusalem is a figure of that which is above" (see note on Gal. iv. 26). And it is here styled "the heavenly Jerusalem;" not that heaven is primarily intended by it, and not the church of Christ on earth; but propter originem et finem, as having its rise from heaven, and as leading to it; on which account the gospel-state is styled oft "the kingdom of heaven."

[23] Μυριάσιν ἀγγέλων, To myriads of angels.] The glorious citizens of heaven who attend at the throne of God, to whom we are united, they being made "one with us, in Christ" (Eph. i. 10), and to whom we are reconciled by him (Col. i. 20).

[24] Ver. 23. Πρωτοτόκων, Of the first-born:] i. e. Of the apostles, who received the first-fruits of the Spirit (Rom. viii. 23), and of the churches which received first the Christian faith (Eph. i. 12), "whose names are written in heaven," i. e. who are enrolled among the citizens of the new and heavenly Jerusalem, or among the just, for whom the kingdom is prepared. "In this rejoice," saith Christ, "that your names are written in heaven," Luke x. 20. Thus, Exod. xxxii. 32, Moses, by the Targum, is introduced speaking thus, "I know thou hast writ my name in the book of the just:" and of the false prophets, the Targum on Ezek. xiii. 9 saith, "They shall not be written in the book of eternal life, which is written for the just of the house of Israel;" and into this kingdom they only are to enter, whose "names are" thus "enrolled in the book of life" (Rev. xxi. 27.)

[25] Καὶ κριτῇ Θεῷ, And to God the judge of all.] Who will adjudge the crown of glory to those who have "fought the good fight of faith" (2 Tim. iv. 8), who "run this race with patience" (1 Cor. ix. 24, 25), and will give them "the kingdom prepared for them" (Matt. xxv. 34, Luke xii. 32).

[26] And to the spirits of just men, τετελειωμένων, made perfect.] This word here cannot well signify them who are crowned in the agonistical sense; because the apostle, in the former chapter, had asserted of those witnesses which died in faith, that they had "not yet received the promise," and were not to be crowned before us Christians; and saith, that he himself expected to receive his "crown" only "at the great day" (2 Tim. iv. 8). But it signifies either that they had fulfilled their course, and so rested from their labours and conflicts, as Chrysostom here saith, and so have nothing more to do but to receive their crown: or, in the other sense of the word, τελειοῦσθαι, "to be made perfect" in holiness, or to be perfectly purged from all guilt of sin, and so fit to be admitted to this kingdom: in which sense the apostle here denies that there was any τελείωσις, or "perfect expiation" made by the Levitical priesthood; "the law making nothing perfect" (Heb. vii. 11. 16): and that the offerings prescribed by it could not, τελειῶσαι, "make perfect the worshipper, as to his conscience" (Heb. ix. 9): that they could not τελειῶσαι εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, "perfect him for ever," so as that he should need no farther expiation for sin (Heb. x. 1); and that Christ, "by one offering, τετελείωκεν εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, had perfectly expiated for ever them that were sanctified" (ver. 14). And accordingly the Targum upon 1 Chron. xxi. 15, saith, "God saw the house of his sanctuary which is above the heavens, where the souls of the just are;" and hence it is evident, that the souls of just men are not reduced by death to a state of insensibility; for can a soul that reasons, and perceiveth good things, be made perfect by perceiving nothing at all? Can a spirit, which here enjoyed the pleasures of a good conscience, of a life of faith, and of communion with God, and the comforts of the Holy Ghost, be advanced to perfection by a total deprivation of all those satisfactions and enjoyments?

[27] Ver. 24. Αἵματι ῥαντισμοῦ, The blood of sprinkling.] Not that of bulls and goats, with which Moses sprinkled the people, when they entered into the old covenant (Exod. xxiv. 8), and the tabernacle, and the vessels of the ministry, to sanctify them for the Levitical service; but the blood of Christ, by which the heavenly places are purified and prepared for us (ix. 23, 24), and by which we have entrance into the holiest (x. 19, 20): whereas the blood sprinkled seven times, for their purification under the old testament, was sprinkled before the veil, because the priests could not enter with it within the veil.

[28] Κρείττονα λαλοῦντι παρὰ τὸν, or, παρὰ τὸν Ἄβελ, Which speaketh better things than that of Abel.] Than the blood of Abel; not because that called for vengeance, this for mercy; but than the blood of the sacrifice of Abel offered by faith, by which God testified his acceptance, and by which he, being dead, yet speaks (Heb. xi. 4); that procuring acceptance for himself alone; this, for all believers: that, speaking only for him, and declaring him righteous; this, interceding to God, for the justification of all men, through faith in his blood.

[29] Ver. 25. Χρηματίζοντα, Him that speaketh.] This word both in the Old and New Testament, signifies speaking as from God, or words proceeding from him (see Jer. xxv. 30, xxvi. 3, xxix. 23, xxx. 2, xxxvi. 4, Matt. ii. 22, Luke ii. 26, Acts x. 22, Rom. xi. 4, Heb. viii. 5, xi. 7). So 2 Macc. ii. 4, χρηματισμοῦ γενηθέντος αὐτῷ, "The prophet being warned of God, commanded that the ark should go with him."

speaketh (now by his Son to you). For if they escaped not (God's severe judgments) who refused him that spake on earth (by Moses), much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh (by his Son coming down, and by his Spirit sent down) from heaven (1 Pet. i. 12):

26 [31] Whose voice then shook the earth (when the law was given, Exod. xix. 18, Ps. lxviii. 8): but now (under this dispensation) he hath promised (yet a farther shaking), saying, [32] Yet once more (at the making my new covenant) [33] I shake not the earth only, but also heaven (Hag. ii. 7, 8).

27 And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain.

28 Wherefore we receiving (the promise of) a kingdom which cannot be moved, (or shaken, or give place to another,) [34] let us have (or retain that) grace, whereby (alone) we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear:

29 For our God is (to the disobedient and rebellious among us, as he was to them, Deut. iv. 24, ix. 3) [35] a consuming fire.

[30] Μὴ παραιτήσησθε, Refuse not.] As they did, saith Theodoret, "desiring, ἀντὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ τὸν Μωσέα λαβεῖν, instead of God to have Moses;" by saying, "Speak thou to us, and let not God speak to us" (Exod xxix. 19): "desiring not God but an angel," saith Philo on these words, De Somniis, p. 455, E (see note on Col. ii. 19).

[31] Ver. 26. Οὗ ἡ φωνὴ, Whose voice.] He speaks here not of the voice of Christ, but of the God of Israel, who, at his appearance on Sinai, "shook the earth;" of his voice who made the promise, that Christ, "the Desire of all nations, should come." Nor can the apostle, or the prophets, speak of Christ's second coming, to give new heavens and new earth, by the conversion of the Jewish nation: for, first, this shaking was to be the forerunner of the coming of the Desire of all nations, or contemporary with it; now he was to come to "fill that very house" then built "with glory," and to make the glory of it greater than the glory of that house built by Solomon. The prophet must therefore speak of a shaking antecedent to the destruction of the temple: and therefore the apostle, speaking of the very thing promised in the words of the prophet Haggai, must also speak of the first advent of our Lord. Secondly, the prophet speaks of a shaking which was to happen "after a little time" (Hag. ii. 7), and therefore not of an advent of our Saviour, after two thousand years expired, yet to come. And, thirdly, the apostle says plainly, that Christians had then "received this kingdom, which could not be shaken" to give place to another; and upon that grounds his exhortation to them, to retain or hold fast the grace received (ver. 28): which shows, it was not a kingdom yet to come after one thousand seven hundred years; but that which, throughout the gospel, is styled "the kingdom of God," and "of heaven," and is said to be then come unto them, Matt. xii. 28.

[32] Ἔτι ἅπαξ, Yet once more.] The word "yet" signifies, that there was yet to be another shaking, for the introduction of another covenant, and consequently for the abolishing the first; and the word "once" only that there should be no more shaking, after the introduction of the second covenant.

[33] Ἐγὼ σείω, &c., I shake not the earth only, but the heavens.] Hag. ii. 7. The ancient Jews speak of this place thus; "I will give a short glory to the Israelites, and afterward shall the Messiah come," Talm. Tr. Sanhed. cap. 11. Expounding this place of the coming of the Messiah, they add, that "as the first tabernacle and temple were built and destroyed, so was the second temple, but the Messiah should build a temple, and God had built a tabernacle and temple in the heavens, which should never be destroyed," Pug. Fid. p. 304, 309.

Now this shaking of the heaven and earth, being to be accomplished at the coming of the Messiah, or, "the Desire of all nations," cannot signify the removal and subversion of the material heavens and earth, they being not thus shaken at Christ's coming: but this is a metaphor frequently used in the prophets, to signify the subversion of a state and kingdom, and of the government which obtains amongst them; as when the prophet, speaking of the destruction of Babylon, saith, "I will make the heavens shake, and the earth shall be removed out of its place," Isa. xiii. 13. And of the destruction of the Jews by the Assyrians, he useth these very words, "The earth shall be moved, and the heavens shaken," Joel ii. 10 (see Judg. v. 4, Ps. lxxvii. 18, Isa. xxiv. 19, 20). Thus, at our Lord's coming to destroy Jerusalem, say some interpreters; to destroy antichrist, as others think; "the powers of heaven shall be shaken" (Matt. xxiv. 30, Mark xiii. 25, Luke xxi. 26), which import of this phrase being not understood by Esthius, he, without cause, rejecteth this interpretation of the word.

Secondly, This shaking, being "for the removal of things which were shaken," and they being not the material earth, must signify the things which were then introduced with the shaking of the earth, i. e. the covenant made, and the worship and tabernacle, and other materials then appointed to be made with hands for God's service; which, as the apostle, throughout this whole epistle, contends, were to be abolished, and to continue only until the time of reformation (ix. 10), and then to give place to that new covenant and dispensation, which procured for us an eternal redemption, and an entrance, "not into the holy places made with hands, but into heaven itself."

[34] Ver. 28. Ἔχομεν χάριν.] It is the observation of critics here, and elsewhere, that ἔχειν, to have, is often put for κατέχειν, to retain, or hold fast: so ἔχειν πίστιν καὶ ἀγαθὴν συνείδησιν, is "to hold faith and a good conscience," 1 Tim. i. 19; ἔχειν τὸ μυστήριον τῆς πίστεως, "to hold the mystery of faith;" ὑποτύπωσιν ἔχειν, "to hold fast the form of sound words," 2 Tim. i. 13. Χάρις, throughout the whole New Testament, doth signify the favour and the grace of God, so freely tendered to us in the gospel (see note on 2 Cor. vi. 1): so that the import of those words seems to be this; Let us continue steadfast in that faith and dispensation delivered in the gospel, as being that alone which renders both our persons and our services acceptable to God; let us not "fall from the grace of God" (ver. 15); let us not "cast off our confidence" (x. 35); "let us hold fast the profession of our hope without wavering" (ver. 23), continuing to serve God with a holy reverence.

[35] Ver. 29. Πῦρ καταναλίσκον, A consuming fire.] To consume thine enemies, if thou obey him, and to "bring them down before thy face" (Deut. ix. 3); but to consume thee, if thou forget the covenant thou hast made with him (Deut. iv. 24). This hath relation to the Shechinah, or glorious presence of God, "the sight of which was like devouring fire" (Exod. xxiv. 17), and from which went out fire to consume Nadab and Abihu (Lev. x. 2), and those two hundred and fifty persons who burnt incense (Numb. xvi. 35), and of whom the psalmist speaketh in these words, "A fire burned in their congregations, the flame burnt up the wicked" (Ps. cvi. 18).

styled, by Abraham, "the Judge of all the earth," Gen. xviii. 24, "Jehovah," ver. 22, and Abraham praying to him with so great humility, "Oh! let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak unto him, who am but dust and ashes," ver. 27. 31, it seems more proper with the ancients to conceive, he at least should be "the Son of God, the Angel of the covenant;" for the Word of God, saith Justin Martyr,* καὶ ἄγγελος καλεῖται, καὶ Θεὸς, παῖ Κύριος, καὶ ἀνὴρ, καὶ ἄνθρωπος, Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ φανείς. Yet since, in the opinion of the Jews, they were three angels (as Ainsworth and Cartwright note upon the place, the apostle, writing to them, saith no more of them), I rather think, with the reverend Bishop of Ely, that it may be granted, that the three that appeared to Abraham were created angels; but then they appeared only as the retinue of the Shechinah, or divine Majesty, styled "the Lord," ver. 1. 13. For after the same men, who came in, and did eat with Abraham, and rose from the table, were departed (ver. 16. 22), Abraham stands yet "before the Lord," that is, before the divine Majesty who appeared to him, ver. 1, and styles him "the Judge of the whole earth." And this agrees well with the opinion of the Jews, who, as they acknowledge that the three men whom Abraham entertained were created angels, so also do they own that there was then a separate appearance, or divine Majesty, which talked with Abraham. And this takes off the observation of Crellius, and others, on this place, that the name "Jehovah" is given to angels; for according to this interpretation, the name Jehovah is not given to any of the three angels which were entertained by Abraham, but only to the Shechinah, or divine Majesty, which appeared with them, and spake to Abraham, from ver. 10 to 17, and to whom, after the departure of these three, one into heaven, and two to Sodom, Abraham still speaks to the end of that chapter.

[2] Ver. 4. Τίμιος ὁ γάμος, Marriage is honourable.] It is not worth disputing, whether these words should be rendered as a precept, thus, "Let honourable marriage, and the bed undefiled, obtain among all;" or, as our version renders them, by way of assertion. The observation of the ancients upon the place is this, that "marriage is honourable in all persons,† old and young, and in all things."

[3] Κρινεῖ ὁ Θεὸς, God will judge;] i. e. Κατακρινεῖ, "He will condemn" them: so, John iii. 16, "God sent not his Son into the world, ἵνα κρίνῃ τὸν κόσμον, that he might condemn the world;" "He that resisteth, shall receive to himself, κρῖμα, punishment," or "condemnation," Rom. xiii. 2; so Matt. xxiii. 14, 1 Cor. xi. 29, 1 Tim. iii. 6, Jude 4, Mark iii. 29, Luke xxiii. 40; τοῦτον κρίναντες, by "condemning" Christ, they fulfilled the voice of the prophets, Acts xii. 27. That the apostle here should give these cautions against the Gnostics amongst the Jews, is said without ground, for no man can prove that any Gnostics had been then among them; but they had then the sect of the Nicolaitans‡ among them, mentioned Rev. ii. 6. 15, who did ἀναίδην ἐκπορνεύειν, "fornicate without shame, holding whoredom and adultery to be things indifferent." Moreover, Justin Martyr saith,* that wherever they travelled, they multiplied to themselves wives, ὀνόματι γάμου, "under pretence of marriage" (see note on Rom. ii. 22). On which account there was ground sufficient for this exhortation. Note hence, that whoredom is a mortal sin.

[4] Ver. 5.] Hence we learn, First, That we are then "covetously minded," when we are not content with the things we enjoy at present, but are impatiently desirous of having more.

Secondly, That what God promises to any of his servants, may, in like circumstances, be applied to them all; for this promise, which the apostle here makes and applies to all good Christians, was particularly made to Joshua, i. 5.

[5] Ver. 8.] i. e. Through all times and ages: for, as Philo† observes, τριμερὴς γὰρ ὁ χρόνος ἐκ παρεληλυθότος, καὶ ἐνεστῶτος, καὶ μέλλοντος, "Time consists of three parts, the past, present, and to come, and these three signify, ἅπαντα τὸν αἰῶνα, all time," or the whole compass of it: so that, as the same doctrine of Christianity must always be professed by all Christians, so the same Jesus is always ready to assist and reward the sincere professors of it.

That the apostle speaks here, not of their living but dead guides, will appear, partly from his exhortation to remember them, the living guides being the objects, not of their memory, but sense; partly from the phrase ἐλάλησαν, "who have spoken," which intimates, they had now left off speaking; and partly from the ἔκβασις, "the close," or period of their conversation here on earth, they are exhorted to look back unto; their living bishops they are commanded to obey (ver. 17), their dead bishops to remember (ver. 7): for I think, saith Origen on Matthew (ed. Huet. tom. i. p. 420), he who is styled by Christ, ὁ ἡγούμενος, "a guide," Luke xxii. 26, is, ὁ καλούμενος ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις ἐπίσκοπος, "he who is called in the churches a bishop."

[6] Ver. 9. Διδαχαῖς ξέναις,] I render, "new doctrines," and therefore strange to the ears of them that hear them first; so ξένα δαιμόνια are "new demons," Acts xvii. 18; and the apostle saith, they were not to look upon their fiery trial, ὡς ξένου ὑμῖν παραβαίνοντος, "as if some new thing had happened to them," 1 Pet. iv. 12.

[7] Βεβαιοῦσθαι τὴν καρδίαν, That the heart is established,] Is a Hebrew phrase, signifying to comfort, strengthen, and refresh the heart. So, Gen. xviii. 5, "I will fetch a morsel of bread, וסעדו לבכם, and comfort your hearts;" Judg. xix. 5. 8, στήριγον καρδίαν σου, "Comfort thy heart with a morsel of bread;" of which the psalmist saith, that καρδίαν ἀνθρώπου στηρίζει, "it strengthens man's heart," Ps. civ. 15; whence it is often styled στήριγμα ἄρτου, Ps. cv. 16, Ezek. iv. 16, v. 16, xiv. 13, "the staff of bread."

[8] The "grace" here mentioned is, say the ancients, ἡ τῆς χάριτος διδασκαλία, "the doctrine of the gospel," or of the grace of God tendered in it." The "meats" here mentioned are the meats eaten in the Jewish festivals, new moons, and sabbaths, Col. ii. 16, or their peace-offerings and oblations, styled βρώματα, "meats," Heb. ix. 10; which feasts some Jewish zealots would have observed with the Christian festi-the grace brought to us by the gospel); not with meats (eaten at the Jewish festivals, and their peace-offerings), which have not profited (to the purifying of the conscience from guilt, Heb. ix. 9) them that have been occupied therein.

10 We (Christians) have (a sacrifice upon) [9] an altar (that of the cross), whereof they have no right to eat (or to partake) which serve the tabernacle (i. e. cleave still to the worship appointed for the Jewish tabernacle.

11 The truth of this they may learn from their own institutions concerning sacrifices:) For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest [10] for (a) sin (offering), are (by the law of Moses not to be eaten, but) burned without the camp (Exod. xxix. 14, Lev. iv. 21, vi. 30, xvi. 27).

12 Wherefore Jesus also, (our sin-offering, the person typified by theirs offered on the great day of expiation, Lev. xvi.,) that he might sanctify the people with his own blood (carried into the heavenly sanctuary), [11] suffered without the gate. (He therefore thus answering the type of that sin-offering, of which neither priest nor people were to eat, they who still do adhere to the legal institutions, are by that law excluded from partaking of this sacrifice.)

13 Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp (the terrestrial Jerusalem, the Jewish church and service), [12] bearing his reproach.

14 For here have we (especially, who are thus persecuted,) no continuing city, but we seek one to come (even the city of the living God, xii. 22).

15 By him therefore (our high-priest) let us offer the (Christian) [13] sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, (in the language of the prophet, Hosea xiv. 2,) [14] the fruit of our lips giving thanks to his name.

16 But (and for the other Christian sacrifices, those of alms,) to do good and to communicate forget not: for with such sacrifices God is (still) well pleased.

17 Obey them that have [15] the rule over you, (your bishops and pastors, ver. 21,) and submit yourselves (to their godly admonitions): for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account (to God for them), that they may do it [16] with joy (in the presence of Christ, that they have gained you to him, and built you up in the faith, 1 Thess. ii. 19), and not with grief (that they could not prevail upon you to live suitably to their instructions): for that is unprofitable for you (and pernicious to you).

18 Pray for us (for our freedom and success in preaching the gospel, Eph. vi. 19, Col. iv. 3, and our deliverance from the enemies of our faith, 1 Thess. iii. 1, 2): for we trust we have a good conscience, in [17] all things (being) willing to live honestly.

19 But I beseech you the rather to do this (now), that I may be restored to you the sooner.

20 [18] Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep, through (with) the blood of the everlasting vals, viz. their passover and pentecost (1 Cor. xi.), and in the same riotous manner (ver. 21). And these sacrifices, or peace-offerings, they would have still retained, perhaps as being not sacrifices for sin, but freewill-offerings, and only sacrifices of praise. So that the import of these words is this; It is good the soul, or heart, be established, refreshed, and comforted, not with meats eaten in the Jewish festivals, or at their eucharistical oblations, which profit or avail nothing to the peace and quiet of the conscience, but with the divine favour, and that gospel grace by which justification and remission of sins is obtained through the blood of Jesus; of which they cannot be partakers who still cleave to the legal observations.

[9] Ver. 10. Θυσιαστήριον, An altar.] That the "altar" here, signifies the sacrifice offered upon the altar, is plain from this, that of this altar they were to eat. So they that eat of the Jewish sacrifices are said to be, κοινωνοὶ θυσιαστηρίου, "partakers of the altar," 1 Cor. x. 18, i. e. of the things offered at the altar; and then it must import the body of our Lord offered and broken on the cross: by partaking of the memorials of which body, we testify our communion with Christ and his church (ibid. ver. 16, 17); and of this, saith the apostle, they have no right to partake who adhere still to the Mosaical oblations.

[10] Ver. 11. Περὶ ἁμαρτίας.] That περὶ ἁμαρτίας signifies "a sacrifice for sin," or "a sin-offering," see note on 2 Cor. ult.

[11] Ver. 12. Without the gate.] That sin-offering which was carried without the camp, whilst they were in the wilderness, when the temple was seated at Jerusalem, was carried "without the gate" of the city (Maimon. de Rat. Sacrif. Faciend. cap. 7, §. 4, Ainsw. in Lev. vi. 30). And this is the reason of the variation of the phrase here.

[12] Ver. 13. Τοίνυν ἐξερχώμεθα.] Some quarrel with the apostle for beginning a sentence with τοίνυν, which it is confessed that the best Grecians rarely do; but this, saith Stephanus, is not without example; and Vigerus notes, τοίνυν initio quidem periodi ponitur, sed tamen vocem sequi, that is, "it is sometimes first in position, but it is not so in construction."

His reproach.] i. e. His cross and sufferings, which the persecuting Jews inflict upon his followers, as they did upon him, "persecuting them even to strange cities" (Acts xxvi. 11), and "from city to city."

[13] Ver. 15. Θυσίαν αἰνέσεως, The sacrifice of praise.] The Jews say that, in seculo futuro, "in the age to come"* (which often signifies the age of the Messiah), "all oblations shall cease, but the oblation of thanksgiving, which shall never cease," and that praise is more acceptable to God than all sacrifices; which they prove from those words of the psalmist, "I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices, because they were not always before me: offer unto God thanksgiving," Ps. l. 23, "He that offereth praise, honoureth me." And the Greek commentators observe, that the sacrifices God now requires, are unbloody sacrifices, to wit, those of praise and thanksgiving, and imitation of Christ. So Chrysostom and Œcumenius.

[14] Καρπὸν χειλέων, The calves of our lips.] Hos. xiv. 2. So the Jews themselves interpret these words, "What shall we render for the calves of our lips?" Dr. Pocock notes,† That καρπὸς is here taken for κάρπωμα, which in the Septuagint signifies "a holocaust," which being usually of young bullocks, corresponds to "the calves of our lips" in Hebrew. So in the Song of the Three Children, καρπῶσαι ἐπί σου, is to "sacrifice before thee," ver. 14.

[15] Ver. 17. Τοῖς ἡγουμένοις ὑμῶν.] Περὶ ἐπισκόπων λέγει, "He speaks of bishops," say Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact. Clemens Romanus‡ places them before the presbyters, saying, τοῖς νόμοις Θεοῦ ἐπορεύεσθε, ὑποτασσόμενοι τοῖς ἡγουμένοις ὑμῶν, καὶ τιμὴν τὴν καθήκουσαν ἀπονέμοντες τοῖς παρ' ὑμῖν πρεσβυτέροις, "Ye walked in the laws of God, being subject to your guides or rulers, and giving convenient honour to your presbyters or elders."

[16] Μετὰ χαρᾶς, With joy:] That is, say others, that they may go on with their work joyfully, which they can only execute with trouble and sadness, when they find you refractory to their admonitions; but these words, "That they may do it," seem plainly to relate to the account they must give up hereafter to God.

[17] Ver. 18. Ἐν πᾶσι.] In all times, circumstances, things, and places. Here is the true test of an upright conscience, that in all times, things, and cases, it renders us industrious to walk exactly according to the rules of righteousness. The want of this some of the Jews might suspect in the apostle, as not being concerned for the observation of the law.

[18] Ver. 20.] These words seem to express all the three offices of our great Mediator, which are the foundations of all our prayers and praises directed to God, and of all the blessings we receive or expect from him; his prophetic office, in that he is styled "the great Shepherd of the sheep;" his priestly office, in that he is said to be "brought again from the dead with the blood of the everlasting covenant;" and his kingly office, in that he is styled "our Lord Jesus."

[19] Ver. 21. Καταρτίσαι ὑμᾶς, Make you perfect.] Here is the duty of every good Christian, to be "ready for every good work" (Tit. iii. 1), "doing the will of God from the heart" (Eph. vi. 6).

[20] Ποιῶν ἐν ὑμῖν, Working in you, &c.] Here is the power by which we are enabled so to do, and the motive to the performance of our duty, viz. the grace of God teaching us, "denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present world;" and "the expectation of the blessed hope and glorious appearance of our Lord," to reward our services (Tit. ii. 11—13). The love of God the Father, in giving up his Son to the death for us; and of Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us, "that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people zealous of good works" (ver. 14), and who "died for all, that they who live might not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him that died for them" (2 Cor. v. 15). And, lastly, the inward assistances of the Holy Spirit, bringing these things to our remembrance, exciting us to the performance of our duty, strengthening us against our temptations, and comforting and supporting us under our sufferings.

Ποιῶν ἐν ὑμῖν τὸ εὐάρεστον ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ, Working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight.] That God doth some way work in us every good work, and whatsoever is well pleasing in his sight, can be denied by none who understand the scriptures; and one would think it should be as little the subject of dispute, whether God works these things as a vomit or a purge works in us by physical and irresistible operations, or whether he works on reasonable creatures by offering reasons to persuade them, and upon men endowed with a will, to make them willing, as all men do, by propounding motives and encouragements of a prevailing nature, to engage them to choose the good and refuse the evil; of which I have said so much in the treatise of grace, annexed to 2 Cor. vi. 1, that I shall say nothing more at present, but that it is unaccountable how actions should be good, unless we consent to them, or how they should be ours, unless we choose and do them. This text is therefore vainly urged to prove, that we are purely passive in the work of our conversion, and that we neither do nor can do any thing towards it:

First, Because God evidently speaks this to them who were already true believers, and converts to the Christian faith, and wanted only to be "made perfect in every good work." Secondly, Because he exhorts all Christians to "work out their salvation with fear and trembling;" upon this very account, that "it is God that worketh in them both to will and to do" (Phil. ii. 13). For if God so worketh in us, that we do not co-operate with him, why are we commanded to "work out our salvation?" For can we act where we are purely passive? Or can that be a reason why we ourselves should act, that another will effectually do this very thing without our co-operation? Is it not rather a reason why we should not work at all; since this work will be certainly performed without us? See more to this effect in the note on Phil. ii. 10. Note also, that the word καταρτίσαι, which begins this verse, signifies "fully to instruct," as in those words, Luke vi. 40, "The disciple is not above his master, κατηρτισμένος δὲ πᾶς, but he that is fully instructed is as his master;" 1 Cor. i. 10, ἦτε δὲ κατηρτισμένοι, "Be ye perfectly instructed in the same mind and judgment," Eph. iv. 12. God hath appointed apostles, prophets, and evangelists, pastors, and teachers, πρὸς τὸν καταρτισμὸν τῶν ἁγίων, "for the full instruction of the saints, till we all come to the unity of the faith, and knowledge of the Son of God," ver. 13. So the Glossa Græco-Latina, καταρτίζω, struo, instruo, κατηρτισμένος, constructus, instructus; and in this sense this may be reasonably deemed a prayer, that God would fully instruct the believing Jews in every good work requisite to be done in obedience to his will, and so would work in them that which was well pleasing in his sight, we being thus "transformed by the renewing of our mind, εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν, that we may approve (and so be inclined to do) the good, εὐάρεστον, well pleasing, and perfect will of God" (Rom. xii. 2).

[21] Ὧι ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, To whom be glory for ever, Amen.] Here Schlictingius saith, that he who is a Christian cannot be ignorant, that "glory for ever and ever" is to be ascribed to Christ, as well as to the Father, as it is Rev. v. 12, 13, 2 Pet. iii. 18. And how then can he be ignorant that Christ is to be owned as the true God? This being the doxology ascribed in the New Testament to him, "of whom, and by whom, and to whom, are all things," Rom. xi. 36; to God the Father, Gal. i. 5; to the omnipotent God, Eph. iii. 20. 24; to him "who dwelleth in light inaccessible," 2 Tim. iv. 15, 16; to "the God of all grace," 1 Pet. v. 10, 11; to "the only wise God our Saviour," Jude 25. In Clemens,* it is frequently ascribed, τῷ Θεῷ παντοκράτορι, "to Almighty God, to whom be glory for ever and ever, Amen," as a character peculiarly belonging to him. And in the Jerusalem Targum,† this is the frequent appendix to the mention of the great God, "Let his name be blessed (i. e. glorified) for ever and ever, Amen:" so that both in the opinion of Jews and Christians this was a doxology proper to the true God.

[22] Ver. 24. Τοὺς ἡγουμένους, &c. That have the rule over you.] Hence it seems evident, that this epistle was not sent to the bishops or rulers of the church, but to the whole church, or to the laity.

GENERAL EPISTLE OF ST. JAMES,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

GENERAL PREFACE TO THE SEVEN CATHOLIC EPISTLES.

Of these Epistles in the general, I have only this to note, That from the fourth century they have both obtained the name of Catholic Epistles, and also have been ranked in the same order in which they now stand in our bibles, viz. by the council of Laodicea,* by Cyril of Jerusalem,† by Athanasius,‡ and Greg. Nazianzen;§ by Amphilochius,‖ and by others.

Only it is not easy to assign the reason why they in a particular manner were so called; it could not be, because they were, passim receptæ ab omnibus et ubique, "generally received by all:" for we learn from the testimonies of Origen,¶ Eusebius, Amphilochius,†† and St. Jerome,‡‡ that the ancients doubted of four of the seven, or five of them.

Œcumenius and others say, they were so styled, because they were written, not to one nation, as were generally those of Paul, ἀλλὰ καθόλου τοῖς πιστοῖς, ἤτοι Ἰουδαίοις τοῖς ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ, "but generally to the faithful, or to the Jews of the dispersion:" which last expression seems to hint the true reason of the name, viz. because, excepting the two brief Epistles of John, they were written to the Jews dispersed throughout the world. Which, though it be true also of the Epistle to the Hebrews, yet hath that no inscription, and for a long time was also questioned; nor was it written to the dispersed Jews, but to the inhabitants of Judea, ch. xiii., and upon these accounts might not come into the number.

PREFACE TO JAMES.

§. 1. That the author of this epistle was an apostle, hath been proved, note on ver. 1, whence it must follow, that he could not be James, the son of Zebedee, because that James was slain by Herod, A. D. 44, twenty-eight years before the destruction of Jerusalem, which yet was nigh at hand, and even at the door, when this epistle was indited; see note on v. 8, 9. Nor could he be James the Just, bishop of Jerusalem, for he was no apostle, if he was not the same person with James the Less. It seemeth therefore that he was James the son of Alpheus, apostle and brother of our Lord, styled James the Less, in distinction from James the son of Zebedee, styled the Greater, by reason of his age. For that the James mentioned by Paul, Gal. i. 19, was an apostle in the strict acceptation of the word, is evident from this, that having spoken of Peter, who doubtless was an apostle in that sense, he adds, "Others of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother;" and, ii. 6, he reckons him, with Peter and John, among the στῦλοι, or "the chief pillars" of the church; and to me he seems to be the same with James the bishop of Jerusalem. For,

First, Of this James, the bishop of Jerusalem, who was styled the Just, Jerome* saith, that "he was the son of Mary, the sister of the mother of our Lord, of whom John makes mention," xix. 25, where she is styled "the wife of Cleophas" or "Alpheus;" and by Mark, xv. 40, "the mother of James the Less."

Secondly, It seems highly probable, that the James mentioned in Acts xv. was strictly an apostle; for Paul and Barnabas were sent up to "the apostles and elders," ver. 2; they were received by the apostles and elders, ver. 4; "the apostles and elders were gathered together," to decide the question touching the circumcision of the gentiles, ver. 6. The first person that speaks to it is Peter the apostle, the second James, who having determined the question, "it seemed good to the apostles and brethren to send letters to the churches," ver. 22; and these they send with this inscription, "The apostles, elders, and brethren." In all which places it is evident, that the word "apostles" must be taken in the proper sense, they being still distinguished from all the elders or bishops which were not apostles: nor can it be thought reasonable that James here should be ranked amongst the elders, or the inferior sort of the clergy; it remains then that he was in the strict sense an apostle. There being therefore no other of that name then living, but "James the son of Alpheus," who also was the brother of our Lord, i. e. his mother's sister's son (i. e. his cousin), he in all likelihood must be the bishop of Jerusalem.

Thirdly, The story of three that were called James, viz. James the Great, James the Less, and James, bishop of Jerusalem, is, saith Dr. Cave,† "a great mistake, and built upon a sandy bottom:" "For besides that the Scripture mentions no more than two of this name, and both apostles, nothing can be plainer than that James the apostle, whom Paul calls the brother of our Lord, was the same that presided among the apostles, and determined in the synod at Jerusalem. Nor do either Clemens Alexandrinus‡ or Eusebius out of him, mention any other than two, St. James, put to death by Herod, and St. James the Just, bishop of Jerusalem, whom they expressly affirm to be the same with him whom St. Paul calls 'the brother of our Lord.' Once indeed Eusebius makes our St. James one of the seventy, though elsewhere quoting a place of Clemens of Alexandria,* he numbers him with the chief of the apostles, and expressly distinguishes him from the seventy disciples." And though Jerome,† when he represents the opinion of others, styles him the thirteenth apostle, yet elsewhere, when speaking his own sense, he sufficiently proves that there were but two, James‡ the son of Zebedee, and the other the son of Alpheus, the one surnamed "the Greater," the other "the Less;" and he frequently styles the author of this epistle, writ to the twelve tribes, "James the apostle:" besides, saith he, the main support of the other opinion is built upon the authority of Clemens' Recognitions, a book, in doubtful cases, of no esteem and value.

§. 2. And having thus shown, that James the apostle, and brother of our Lord, was the author of this epistle, we cannot reasonably doubt the authority of it: especially if we consider that it is cited by Clemens Romanus,§ four several times by Ignatius,‖ in his genuine Epistle to the Ephesians, and by Origen,¶ in his thirteenth homily upon Genesis. Eusebius saith, it was "known to most, and publicly read in most Christian churches;" Jerome,†† that in process of time it obtained authority. Esthius‡‡ notes, that "they who before doubted of it, in the fourth century embraced the opinion of them who received it, and that from thence no church, no ecclesiastical writer, is found who ever doubted of it; but, on the contrary, all the catalogues of the books of holy scripture, published by general or provincial councils, Roman bishops, or other orthodox writers, number it among the canonical scriptures; quæ probatio ad certam fidem faciendam cuique catholico sufficere debet; which proof must give sufficient certainty of it to any catholic." As for the seeming contradiction of this epistle to the doctrine of Paul, in the matter of justification by faith, see it sufficiently cleared in the close of the annotations on the second chapter.

§. 3. Fourthly, That this epistle was directed to "the twelve tribes which were scattered abroad," the words of this epistle show; but whether "the twelve tribes" import only those of them which returned into Judea, or those of them also who were carried away by the Assyrians, and never returned to their own nation, so as to make any more a distinct people, or a body politic under their own governors, is uncertain: that God had absolutely determined that the ten tribes should never more return to such a state, the prophet Hosea in many places doth inform us; as when God by him saith, "I will no more have mercy on the house of Israel, but I will utterly take them away," i. 6; that they should be among the gentiles as "a vessel wherein is no pleasure," viii. 8; and they should not "dwell in the Lord's land," ix. 3. And again, "I will drive them out of my house, I will love them no more: my God will cast them away, because they did not hearken to him, and they shall be wanderers among the nations," ver. 15. 17.

And yet that God designed not to exclude them from the blessings promised in the days of the Messiah, or from being called into the church of Christ, is as evident from many expressions, and gracious promises of God, recorded in that prophet, concerning the same tribes of Israel; as, v. g. that "the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered: and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people: there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God," i. 10, &c. And again, "I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness and judgment, and in lovingkindness, and in mercies; I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness, and thou shalt know the Lord," ii. 19, 20; "I will have mercy on her which hath not obtained mercy; and I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God," ver. 23. And again, "Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king, and shall fear the Lord, and his goodness, in the latter days," iii. 5 (see xiv. 4. 8). Now these prophecies being not to be fulfilled upon them, by bringing them into their own land; it seemeth reasonable to conceive, they might be fulfilled by calling them to embrace the gospel; and that by doing so were those words fulfilled, "I will call them my people, who were not my people," not only towards the gentiles, Rom. ix. 24—26, but also towards those Israelites of whom they primarily were spoken, 1 Pet. ii. 10. And to this the inscription seems to lead us, it being ταῖς δώδεκα φυλαῖς ταῖς ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ, "to the twelve tribes, to those who are in the dispersion." That the places whither these ten tribes were carried by the Assyrians were well known to the other Jews, see proved by Dr. Lightfoot; that in Mesopotamia, Media, and Babylon, where they were placed, the Jews abounded in a very great measure, Josephus* testifies. They had there three famous universities, Neerda, Sorana, and Pombeditha. We therefore have great reason to believe the gospel was then preached among them by the apostles of the circumcision. See the preface to the First Epistle of John.

There is one farther observation taken notice of by Grotius and Dr. Hammond, That some part of this epistle seems to be directed, not only to believers, but even to the unbelieving Jews, especially the first six verses of the fifth chapter, where he saith, "Ye have killed the Just, and he doth not resist you;" which cannot well agree to the converted Jews, to whom he seems to turn his speech, in these following words, "Be patient, therefore, brethren," ver. 7: yea, the whole third and fourth chapters may be equally directed to both; the name of brethren suiting to both, when used by a Jew writing to them, Rom. ix. 2.

§. 4. As for the occasion of this epistle, it seemeth to be written upon two accounts:

First, To correct the pernicious errors both in doctrine and manners, which had crept into the theology of the Jews, and had an evil influence on their practice. See note on ii. 11, and ver. 14, to the end of the chapter.

Secondly, To comfort and establish the sincere believers, under the pressures which they then suffered, or were shortly to expect, from the unbelieving Jews, or their false brethren. Where note,

That though the Jews, from the beginning of the apostles' preaching, were still incensed against the Christians; yet seeing Christianity, whilst they continued preaching to the Jews, did not spread much among other nations, and since the Jews were under restraints in the time of Caius, who had no good affection to them, they could not proceed far in showing their hatred to the Christian faith. What persecutions therefore happened in those early times, concerned only the churches of Judea, or thereabouts, or spent themselves on the chief leaders and assertors of the Christian faith, Stephen, James, Peter, and Paul, or on the churches converted from the Jewish synagogues, and reached no farther than the places where they were converted; and though they were begun by instigation of the Jews, yet were they chiefly managed by the heathen powers, or by their own countrymen. For about the thirty-ninth year of Christ, "then had the churches peace throughout all Judea, Galilee, and Samaria," Acts ix. 31; and so they seem to have continued till after the council of Jerusalem, the churches being then "established in the faith, and increasing in number daily," Acts xvi. 5. Yea, when Paul comes to Rome, he receives all that came unto him for two whole years, "preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching the things which concerned the Lord Jesus Christ with all confidence, no man forbidding him," Acts xxviii. 30, 31. So that at least till the fourth or fifth year of Nero, the gospel was freely preached at Rome, without any contradiction either of the Romans or the Jews: but then, in his sixth year, afflicti suppliciis Christiani, "the Christians were subjected to punishment by him," saith Suetonius;† "and it seems very probable," saith Dr. Lightfoot, "that even then Nero had by some act or edict suppressed Christianity, not only at Rome, but also at Judea;" as he gathers from that clause in Tacitus, Repressaque in præsens exitiabilis superstitio, rursûs erumpebat, non modò per Judæam, originem ejus mali sed per urbem etiam; which shows, that before the persecution began, in the tenth of Nero, of which Tacitus there speaks, Christianity had been by him suppressed, not at Rome only, but Judea. Here then some place Peter's πύρωσις πρὸς πειρασμόν, "burning for trial," which forwarded the defection which was so general in the churches of the Jews that had received the gospel, they falling to Moses again, or joining the adhesion to the law with the profession of the gospel, that so they might retain their liberty, the religion of the Jews not being at all suppressed by him, and that they might escape the rage of the Jews; who doubtless, by his example, would be induced to express that hatred they had still borne against the Christians. The same Nero, in his tenth year, renews this persecution of the Christians; "and this he did," saith Orosius,* "not only at Rome, but by his edict, through all the provinces of his empire;" and this encouraged the Jews every where to show their utmost rage against all those of their religion, whether Jews or proselytes, who had embraced the faith of Christ sincerely; and the more they drew nigh to their final desolation, the more did Satan enhance their fury against those Christians whom he found the fatal enemies and overthrowers of his kingdom.

§. 5. Note, Lastly, That whereas Mr. Le Clerc saith, note on v. 3, "that St. James doth not speak here to the Jews who had embraced the faith in Palestine, but to those who were scattered abroad," seeing he speaks to the whole twelve tribes, I doubt not but these of Palestine must be included; but when he adds, that those "Jews only who lived in Palestine and the neighbouring countries, and had risen up in arms against the Romans, were destroyed by them," suggesting that the Jews, dispersed through the other parts of the Roman empire, received no harm—this is a great mistake; for these being the days of vengeance upon the unbelievers of that nation, God's severe judgments reached them every where, as we may fully learn from the rueful account Josephus† gives us of their calamities throughout all their dispersions: for, saith he, "when the Romans had no enemies left in Judea, the danger reached, πολλοῖς καὶ τῶν ἀπωτάτω κατοικούντων, to many of them living the remotest from it; for many of them perished at Alexandria, and Cyrene, and in other cities of Egypt, and throughout all Syria." And Eleazar, in Josephus,‡ having reckoned up many places where they were cruelly slaughtered, concludes thus, μακρὰν ἂν εἴη νῦν ἰδίᾳ λέγειν, "It would be too long to speak of all these places in particular."

We know from Tacitus,§ and others, that the Jews were a nation generally hated by all about them, and by those among whom they lived, partly because they used, ritus contrarios cæteris mortalibus, "rites contrary to all other nations," and spake and thought contemptuously of their deities and worship; partly because they bore adversûs omnes alios hostile odium, "the greatest hatred to men of other nations," and showed the greatest contempt of them, calling them dogs, and thinking it unlawful to converse with them, and a pollution even to touch them. All nations, therefore, where they lived, must upon all occasions be ready to rise up against them, as we may learn from the slaughter of them in Cæsarea,‖ Damascus, Scythopolis, and throughout all the cities of Syria, about the beginning of the war, of which Josephus gives us the account. When therefore the Romans were very much incensed against them, because when other nations had submitted to their empire, soli Judæi non cessissent, they dared to rebel, must they not be sure to suffer in every province where they dwelt, not only from the Roman governors, but also from those people in every nation who bore so great hatred to them? And hence Eusebius* informs us, that "they did thus suffer in all other places."

Secondly, Josephus† doth confess, that the Jews in Judea did expect, ἅπαν τὸ ὑπὲρ Εὐφράτην ὁμόφυλον ἡμῖν συνεπαρθήσεσθαι, "that all of their own nation, even beyond Euphrates, should be assistant to them in this war;" and doubtless they were not wholly disappointed in their expectation; for in their war commenced under Hadrian, Dion‡ expressly says, that "the Jews out of all nations came to their help." We therefore reasonably may conceive, this also was so in the former war under Vespasian and Titus, and then we cannot doubt that who shared in the war must also bear a share in the calamities it brought upon that nation, in those days of vengeance, which befell them for their infidelity, and the rejection of the true Messiah, of which the Jews who lived in other nations were as guilty as those who lived in Judea.

§. 6. And hence also I return an answer to an objection which I foresee may be made against my interpretation of some passages in the fourth and fifth chapters of this epistle, viz. that I restrain them to what was done to and by the Jews in Judea; whereas this epistle is written "to the twelve tribes which were scattered abroad," ver. 1.

For, First, As all the Jews of the dispersion were under the government of the sanhedrin, and after, of the patriarch of the Jews residing in Judea, and obeyed his pleasure; so many, both Jews and proselytes, went up out of all nations to their feasts: when the Holy Ghost fell down on the apostles at the day of pentecost, we find them there, Acts ii., and when Jerusalem was besieged, at their paschal feast,§ and so, even upon that account, they must be somewhat concerned in what was done and suffered in Judea; and if they sided with them in that war, as I have shown it probable they did, they must be more concerned in these matters. But,

Secondly, Josephus tells us, that they had wars about the same time, in many places of their dispersion, with the gentiles; that when the Alexandrians, in the reign of Nero, had impeached three of their brethren as enemies and spies,‖ ἦρξε πᾶν τὸ Ἰουδαϊκὸν ἐπὶ τὴν ἄμυναν, "all the Jews there rose up to their aid;" and that Tiberius Alexander, the governor of the city, commanded the Roman legions to slay them, καὶ τὰς κτήσεις αὐτῶν διαρπάζειν, καὶ τὰς οἰκίας καταφλέγειν, "and to seize upon their goods, and burn their houses;" which they did, killing fifty thousand of them on the spot: that the Jews invading the cities and villages of Syria, the Syrians fell upon them in all their cities, and were especially moved thereunto by covetousness, τὰς γὰρ οὐσίας τῶν ἀναιρεθέντων ἀδεῶς διήρπαζον, "for they fell boldly upon the substance of the slain:" and in these, and all the other places mentioned by Josephus, the Jews were as forward to take up arms against the gentiles, as they were to suppress the Jews. Here then is a sufficient account of their "wars and tumults," mentioned ch. iv., and of their "riches being corrupted," and their "flesh eaten by fire," ch. v.

CHAPTER I.

1 [1] James, a servant of God (the Father) and of the Lord Jesus Christ, (sendeth) [2] to the twelve tribes which are [3] scattered abroad, greeting.

2 My brethren, count it (matter, not of sorrow, but of) all joy when (through the divine permission) ye fall [4] into divers temptations (i. e. afflictions from the world);

3 Knowing this, that (this outward trouble, sent for) [5] the trying of your faith (by the help of God's overruling grace, and the aid of his Holy Spirit then especially residing on you, 1 Pet. iv. 14) worketh (in you) patience.

4 But (and) let patience have her perfect work (in you), that [6] ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing (to make you perfect in Christ Jesus, and entire as to all Christian graces.

5 Εἰ δὲ, And) If any of you lack wisdom (how to exercise and preserve this patience, under the various temptations he may be subject to), let him ask (it) of (that) God, that giveth to all men liberally (whatsoever he sees needful for us), and upbraideth (us) not (for want of this wisdom); and (if he duly ask) [7] it shall be given him.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἰάκωβος, James.] That this was James an apostle, is confirmed from the testimony of Eusebius,* who declares of that James to whom the ancients ascribed this epistle, that "he was the brother of the Lord." The same we learn from the Syriac, Arabic, Vulgar, and Ethiopic versions, by all which he is styled "James the apostle."

[2] Ταῖς δώδεκα φυλαῖς, To the twelve tribes.] That some of the ten tribes remained in, and some of them returned to, the land of Israel, we are assured from the cities of Manasseh, and Ephraim, and Simeon, even to Naphtali, purged by Josiah from their idols (2 Chron. xxxiv. 6, 7): as also from the money sent in to repair the house of the Lord from Manasseh, Ephraim, and the remnant of Israel (ver. 9), from the mention made of the children of Israel, that were come again out of their captivity (Esd. vi. 21), and the sin-offering made by Ezra, at the dedication of the temple, of twelve goats, "according to the number of the tribes of Israel" (v. 17), and from these following words, viii. 25, "The children of those which had been carried away, which were come out of the captivity, offered twelve goats for a sin-offering:" and, lastly, from the mention of the twelve tribes by the apostle Paul, who "instantly served God day and night" (Acts xxvi. 7).

[3] Ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ, Which are scattered abroad.] That the Jews were dispersed throughout the world, we learn from the words of Agrippa, in his oration to them, who tells them, that† "there was not a nation upon earth where some part of them were not seated;" and that if they of Judea should rebel, all of them that resided in other places would be destroyed, and every city would be filled with the blood of them: from the words of Strabo, cited by Josephus,‡ that "it was not easy to find an eminent place in the whole world where the Jews did not reside;" from Philo,§ in his oration against Flaccus, where he makes mention, τῶν πανταχόθεν τῆς οἰκουμένης Ἰουδαίων, "of the Jews dispersed throughout all the world:" adding, that one region could not contain the Jews, but‖ "they dwelt in most of the flourishing cities of Asia, and in Europe, in the islands, and in the continents, not much less in number than the inhabitants;" and introducing Agrippa¶ interceding to Caius for them, as inhabiting in the most celebrated parts of Africa, Asia, and Europe. And even Cicero, in his oration for another Flaccus, declares, that the gold which the Jews sent to their temple at Jerusalem, "was sent from Italy, and all the other provinces of the Roman empire."

[4] Ver. 2. Πειρασμοῖς ποικίλοις, Into divers temptations.] Temptations, saith Œcumenius, are of two kinds; (1.) Such as lead to sin, which "the lusts of the flesh" and "the love of riches" produce in us (1 Tim. vi. 9), against which our Lord instructs us to pray that we enter not into them; and of these the apostle begins to discourse, ver. 13. Or (2.) such as are sent for the trial of our constancy and sincerity in the faith; and to our patience and perseverance under these is promised a great reward in heaven; and of these the apostle speaketh here, and ver. 12 (see Luke xxii. 28, Heb. iv. 15).

[5] Ver. 3. Τὸ δοκίμιον ὑμῶν, The trial of your faith,] Being attended with these assistances, and consolations of the Holy Ghost, and these firm hopes of a most glorious reward of all our sufferings, tends naturally to make us bear them patiently (as the apostle speaketh here). But then it is as true, that ὑπομονὴ κατεργάζεται τὴν δοκιμὴν (Rom. v. 4), i. e. "this patience worketh the trial;" and by that, in good Christians, the experience of their sincerity and constancy in the faith, and therefore it concerns them not to faint under these tribulations.

[6] Ver. 4. Τέλειοι καὶ ὁλόκληροι, That you may be perfect and entire.] For where there is the perfect work of patience there must be a strong faith as the foundation of it, a steady virtue, or Christian fortitude, enabling us thus to sustain these fiery trials; an exact knowledge of our duty, to bear these afflictions with a meek and quiet spirit, with forgiveness of, love to, and prayer for, them that persecute us, which includes the height of charity under the highest provocations: a great love to God, for whose sake we suffer, and strong affection to his service; a greater fear of his displeasure, than of the wrath of man; an entire trust and dependence on him, and a full resignation to his will of providence, in which consists the life of godliness; an exact temperance, as to the honours, pleasures, and temporal concernments of this life we lose by these our sufferings, and a true charity to our Christian brethren, for whose example and encouragement we do thus suffer. Now these are all the graces which the apostle Peter doth require to make us fruitful and perfect Christians (2 Pet. i. 5—8).

[7] Ver. 5. Δοθήσεται, It shall be given.] Hence it appears, that this wisdom depends not on our own skill or strength; nor can it be obtained without divine assistance.

[8] Ver. 6—8. Αἰτείτω—μηδὲν διακρινόμενος—ἀνὴρ δίψυχος.] Who is the ἀνὴρ δίψυχος, καὶ διακρινόμενος, "the double-minded and the wavering man," we may learn from Hermas,* who informs us, that "visions and revelations are, διὰ τοὺς διψύχους, for the double-minded," that is for τοὺς διαλογιζομένους ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν, εἰ ἄρα ἐστὶ ταῦτα ἢ οὐκ ἔστιν, "them who reason in their hearts, whether these things will be or not." And again,† Credite Deo, qui estis dubii, "Believe in God, you that are doubtful, for he can do all things. Woe to the doubtful, who have heard these things, and contemned them. thing wavering. For he that wavereth (in the time of temptation) is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed (to and fro by every temptation).

7 For let not (μὴ γὰρ, let not then) that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord.

8 (For) A double minded man is unstable in all his ways, (and therefore cannot pray in faith, as he that would be heard must do.

9 And if temptations be matter of the Christian's joy,) Let the brother of [9] low degree (impoverished by them) rejoice (still) in that he is exalted (to be rich in faith, and an heir of the kingdom of God, ii. 5, Luke vi. 20):

10 But (let) the [10] rich (rejoice), in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away (Gr. for as the flower of the grass he shall pass away, when it is scorched with the sun).

11 For the sun is no sooner risen with a burning heat, but it withereth the grass, and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth: so also shall the rich man fade away in his ways.

12 Blessed is the man that (thus) endureth temptation (for the sake of Christ): for when he is tried (Gr. δόκιμος γενόμενος, being approved), he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him (i. e. being, by his patient enduring of these afflictions for the sake of Christ, approved as one that loves him more than the world, he shall receive the reward promised to them that do so.

13 As for the other sorts of temptations unto sin,) Let no man say when he is (thus) tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man (to it):

14 [11] But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed (Gr. being drawn and enticed by his own lust).

15 Then when lust hath conceived (i. e. obtained any consent to, or approbation and good-liking to the desire of the sensual appetite), it bringeth forth (and engageth the soul in) sin: and sin, when it is finished (in the deliberate outward action, or such endeavours to perform and execute it, as want nothing on the part of the will to the completion of it, and much more when by a customary practice it becomes habitual), [12] bringeth forth death (the wages of sin).

16 Do not err, my beloved brethren (by ascribing your sin, or your temptations to it, unto God).

17 Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights (i. e. the light of nature and of grace), with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning (from good to evil; he therefore never will deny those gifts to them that duly ask him, nor will he ever be wanting in his grace and favour to them that love him, and much less will he tempt any one to depart from him.

double-minded, who shall receive none of their requests." See the whole mandate to the same effect. And from that of Barnabas,* touching him that walketh in the way of light that οὐ μὴ διψυχήσῃ, "he will not be doubtful whether a thing will be so, or not." From the like precept of the Apostolical Constitutions,† μὴ γίνου δίψυχος, "Be not doubtful in thy prayer whether thy petition will be heard, or not:" and from Clement,‡ with whom οἱ δίψυχοι, "the doubtful!" are οἱ διστάζοντες περὶ τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ δυνάμεως, "the distrusters of the power of God." This faith therefore relates to prayer, and is a firm belief that God will afford to his sincere servants, under all their sufferings for his sake, such aid as will enable them to bear them with true Christian patience (1 Cor. x. 13), and such wisdom as will direct them to improve these sufferings to his glory, and their good. He that doubts of this will be now hoping, and anon desponding, apt to quit his dependence on God, and lean on his own wisdom, and ready to cast off that religion which subjects him to these temptations from which he expects no good issue: and therefore, wanting that faith in God which he has here made the condition of an acceptable prayer, &c., he cannot hope to obtain any thing of him.

[9] Ver. 9. Ὁ ταπεινὸς, The man of low degree,] In the Old Testament, is the poor and afflicted man. So עני is, in the Septuagint, πένης, ταπεινὸς, "the poor, the afflicted," ענוי, πενία, ταπείνωσις, "poverty or lowness of state." And this sense here is confirmed from the opposition of the rich to him.

[10] Ver. 10. Ὁ πλούσιος, The rich.] "Let God," saith Philo,§ "be the matter of thy chief joy, not riches, honour, strength, or beauty, these being μαραινόμενα τρόπον τινὰ πρὶν ἀνθῆσαι βεβαίως, things which wither before they are fully grown up." Let then the Christian consider, that the things he loseth for the sake of Christ, are only things of such a fading nature; whereas he doth secure, by his perseverance, an everlasting treasure reserved for him in the heavens; and then he may rejoice in his humiliation. Note also an ellipsis of the verb καυχάσθω, "let him rejoice," ver. 10, to be taken from ver. 9: so, John xv. 4, 1 Cor. iv. 15, Gal. ii. 7, Eph. i. 12.

[11] Ver. 14.] Note here, that the desires, or lustings of the sensual appetite, put us only under a state of temptation, not of actual sin: they are indeed the root of sin, but so is temptation to sin, and the suggestions of Satan; but they are not our sins, till we consent to them: they are not a transgression of the law, for there is no law given to the sensual appetite alone, but to the whole man, who cannot hinder sensual appetites from arising in him before he perceives them; but he can restrain the will from consenting to them as soon as he perceives them; and can refuse to admit of them, or suffer them to make stay in, or gain upon his mind, to contemplate them with delight, or assent to them: and this being all he can do, must be all he is obliged by the law to do. There be many scriptures urged against this opinion in the Synopsis, but they are too impertinent to be insisted on.

[12] Ver. 15. Ἀποκύει θάνατον, Bringeth forth death:] i. e. Not only deserveth death, for so doth the consent of the will; but it renders us obnoxious to death, and will end in it, without repentance. Hence therefore note, that not only the soul hardened in sin, and given up to the frequent practice of the same sin, is guilty of mortal sin, but every deliberate sinful action done against the convictions and checks of conscience, till by repentance it is retracted, puts us under that state, as being a breach of the gospel-covenant of sincere and impartial obedience, a departing of the heart from God, and a wilful and presumptuous sin: and therefore David after his adultery and murder prays, that God would "create in him a clean heart, and renew in him a right spirit." Though therefore God in mercy may and will deal with such men, not according to their particular failures, but according to the general tenor of their lives; yet can they claim no covenant right to such a favour, till they have thoroughly repented of such wilful sins, and returned to the sincere performance of their duty.

[13] Ver. 18. Λόγῳ ἀληθείας, By the word of truth.] Here is a plain evidence, that the word of God is the ordinary means of our regeneration, it being "the word preached," the word we are to hear (ver. 19. 22), and to "receive with meekness," by which the new birth is by God wrought in us, and which, saith the apostle, is able to save the soul. And it is surely a great disparagement to the word of God, to think that his persuasions, admonitions, exhortations, and threats, should be all insufficient to prevail with us to turn from our sinful courses, and to turn to him; when all men who do use these methods towards their children, servants, friends, or relations, do it in hopes they shall be successful by these means: only this is not so to be understood, as to exclude the blessing and co-operation of God with the word preached, or the cause to think he will do any thing to destroy that life, or deny us any thing which he sees necessary to preserve that life, which he so freely gave).

19 Wherefore, my beloved brethren (being regenerated by this word of truth), let every man be swift to hear (it), [14] slow to speak (ver. 26, or be a teacher of it, iii. 1), [15] slow to wrath (or contention about it):

20 For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God (i. e. tends not to beget or to improve that faith by which we are righteous before God, but rather to hinder it in ourselves and others).

21 Wherefore lay apart all filthiness (all evil lustings, ver. 14) and superfluity of naughtiness, (all the distempers of your tongue, and of your angry passions, ver. 19,) and receive with meekness the [16] engrafted word, which (being thus received) is able to save your souls.

22 But (that it may have this effect upon you) be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves (by thinking that sufficient to procure favour with God).

23 [17] For if any (man) be a hearer of the word assistance of his Holy Spirit, setting it home upon our hearts; provided this be not by way of physical but moral operation, by that illumination of the understanding from the word, which produceth that renovation in the spirit of the mind, by which we are enabled to discern and to approve "the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God" (Rom. xii. 2, Eph. iv. 23), to "discern what is acceptable to the Lord" (Eph. v. 10), to "understand what the will of the Lord is" (ver. 17), the things that are most excellent. And if the word of God be a perfect rule, able to make us wise unto salvation, and furnish us for every good work, sure the good Spirit may, by his suggestion of the truths delivered in it, by "bringing them to our remembrance," and "opening our understanding to perceive the scriptures," remove that darkness which is in our minds, either by natural corruption, or by the mists which Satan casts upon them; whence the apostle doth inform us, 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4, that if the gospel be hidden from any to whom it is preached, it is "because the god of this world hath blinded the conceptions of their minds, that the light of the glorious gospel should not shine into them." And, secondly, by making deep impressions on the mind, of the advantages and rewards promised to our conversion, and sincere obedience, and the tremendous evils threatened to the disobedient; and bringing these things oft to our remembrance, which, in the scripture phrase, is "putting these laws in our minds, and writing them upon our hearts, that we may not depart from him," Heb. viii. 10 (see note on that place). For what reason can be given, why the Spirit of wisdom, having enlightened the eyes of our understanding, to "know what is the hope of our calling, and the glorious riches of the inheritance of the saints" (Eph. i. 18), and these things being as firmly believed, and made thus present to our minds, should not have greater prevalence upon our wills to obedience, than any temporal concerns to yield obedience to the laws of sin? It is certain Satan can tempt us no other way, than by suggesting some temporal allurements and advantages, or some temporal losses and affrightments to us. Since then the scripture doth assure us, "this is our victory over the world, even our faith" (1 John v. 4), even that faith which is "the firm expectation of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen" (Heb. xi. 1), why should not these objects of our faith, presented to us,) and impressed on us by the Holy Spirit, be more powerful to baffle all the temptations of sin, Satan, and the world? If beyond this there be some physical and irresistible operation on God's part, requisite to make men know the things which belong to their peace, and knowing, to choose the good, and refuse the evil, this being not wrought in them who are not "born anew;" why is the want of this new birth, and this spiritual renovation, so oft imputed to men's want of consideration, and of laying to heart the things propounded to them; their not "inclining their ear to wisdom," and "applying their heart to understanding;" their "hatred of knowledge," their "rejecting the counsel of God," and "not choosing the fear of the Lord?" (Prov. i. 24, 25. 29, 30.) Why is it said, that they continue thus unreformed, because "they would have none of God's counsel, but despised all his reproofs;" because "they would not frame their doings to turn unto the Lord?" To omit innumerable expressions of the like import, see note on Rom. x. 17, 1 Pet. i. 23.

[14] Ver. 19. Βραδὺς εἰς τὸ λαλῆσαι, Slow to speak.] It was the imputation which the heathens cast upon the Christians, that they were in publico muti, not being inclined palàm loqui, "to speak openly" of their religion: and this is confessed by Christians* to be true of the laity, who were not by office engaged to preach it to the world, that it was not their custom to assert and defend their religion publicly, but only to give an answer to them who required a reason of the hope that was in them: and in this sense good commentators do expound these words, viz. as an admonition to be slow to speak of divine things, and much more to be teachers of them; but in the usual sense it agrees with that of Bias;† μίσει τὸ τάχυ λαλεῖν, μὴ ἁμαρτῇ, μετάνοια γὰρ ἀκολουθεῖ, "Be averse from rash speaking, lest thou offend, for thou wilt repent of it;" as θυμοῦ κρατεῖν, "to curb our angry passions," agrees with the following words, "Be slow to wrath."

[15] Βραδὺς εἰς ὀργὴν, Slow to wrath.] This was an admonition needful for the Jewish zealots, who were ἐξ ἐριθείας, "of contentious spirits" (see note on Rom. ii. 8); filled with wrath against the teachers of Christianity, and especially against those who denied the necessity of circumcising the gentiles, or requiring them to observe the law of Moses (Acts xiii. 45, xvii. 5): "they† compelling all men to be circumcised, if they would abide with them; and looking upon this as a thing of absolute necessity," without which nothing else would satisfy them.

Now these disputes naturally tended to obstruct that faith, by which men were justified, and not by circumcision, or the works of the law, and which in the epistles of Paul is still styled "the righteousness of God" (see note on Rom. i. 17). (2.) They were very prone to set up for teachers of the law, though they understood not aright those things of which they spake (1 Tim. i. 7, Rom. ii. 18); and this might give occasion to the other admonition here, to be "slow to speak," and iii. 1: they also were incontinent, and very prone to lustings and to fornications (see note on Rom. ii. 22, 2 Tim. iii. 5, Heb. xii. 16); and therefore fitly are admonished to "lay aside all filthiness, and superfluity of naughtiness."

[16] Ver. 21. Τὸν ἔμφυτον λόγον, The ingrafted word,] Saith Œcumenius, is that principle of reason by which we are enabled to discern good from evil; but of that the apostle would not say, that it "is able to save our souls." But the apostles, or preachers of the Christian faith, being said, φυτεύειν, "to plant the word" among their hearers (1 Cor. iii. 6—8), "the ingrafted word" seems to be the word planted in the heart of believers by the ministers of Christ, which Barnabas styles, τὴν ἔμφυτον δωρεὰν τῆς διδαχῆς αὐτοῦ, "the ingrafted gift of his doctrine" (§. 9, p. 6) So they who made the Jews understand the law read to them, are said, ἐμφρισοῦν ἅμα τὴν ἀνάγνωσιν, "to imprint upon them the knowledge or remembrance of what they read," Esd. ix. 48. 55. Against this sense it is objected, that the word thus planted in us is not properly λόγος ἔμφυτος, but ἐμφυτευθείς· but since νόμος ἔμφυτος is "the law planted" in the heart by God, I think this criticism not sufficient to destroy the sense of the words here given, especially if we consider that "all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness" must be first laid aside, that we may be fitted to receive with meekness this λόγος ἔμφυτος, "ingrafted word;" which shows it cannot import any thing which is by nature always in us.

[17] Ver. 23.] That many of the Jews had conceived an opinion, that even the study and knowledge of the law would procure them a reward in heaven, see note on Rom. ii. 13.

25 But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty (i. e. the gospel, which gives the spirit of liberty, and freedom from the power of sin and death, and from the spirit of bondage, Rom. viii. 2. 15, 2 Cor. iii. 17), and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed.

26 If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, (from bitter zeal, contentions, and imprecations, iii. 10. 14,) [18] but deceiveth (Gr. deceiving) his own heart (thinks his zeal for God will bear him out in all this), this man's religion is vain (iii. 14, 15).

27 Pure religion and undefiled before God and (i. e. who is) the Father is (visible in) this, (that it engages the Christian) [19] to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

[18] Ver. 26. Ἀπατῶν, &c. Deceiving his own heart.] That the unbelieving Jews had a zeal for God, the apostle bears them record, Rom. x. 2, but then that zeal wrought so great a bitterness of spirit in them, that in those very synagogues, in which they met to bless God, they imprecated a curse upon the Christians, created anew after his image (iii. 10); "I being zealous for God, as all you are this day," saith Paul, "persecuted this way unto the death," Acts xxii. 3, 4; and in thus doing, they thought "they did God service," John xvi. 2. "The zealots among them," saith their own Josephus,* "who gave themselves that name, from their zeal to what was good, committed all manner of wickedness, and accounted the worst of evils good:" and yet Eleazar,† the ringleader of them, represents them as "persons who had cause to hope they should be by God preserved, as having not offended against him, and being guilty of no fault, and being teachers of others." That the believing Jews, who urged upon the gentiles the necessity of circumcision, had a zeal for God, we learn from Gal. iv. 17, 18: yet that they had the spirit of contention and envy (Phil. i. 15, 16), and were deceitful workers, the apostle doth inform us: so that neither of them were truly religious; and to those latter the apostle seems chiefly to speak in these words, "If ye have bitter zeal and strife in your hearts, glory not, and lie not against the truth," &c.

[19] Ver. 27. Ἐπισκέπτεσθαι, To visit the fatherless and widows.] It is very true, that Ignatius* saith of some who maintained opinions contrary to the grace of God come unto us, that "they had no regard to charity, to the widow, and to the orphan, to the oppressed, to those that were in bonds, to the hungry and thirsty:" but then, as it is not manifest from his words that these were the Gnostics, nothing hinders, but what the apostle here speaks of may be also true of the Jews, who, as Josephus notes,† were great enemies one to another, and wanted mercy most of all, or to those zealots who spared none who would not be of their opinion, and their bitter zeal.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Τὴν πίστιν τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τῆς δόξης, The faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory.] This version seems obnoxious to this exception, that the pronoun ἡμῶν will not suffer the word "Lord" to be joined with "glory;" therefore that which renders the words thus, "The faith of the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ," or, "Hold not the glorious faith of the Lord Jesus Christ with respect of persons," seems to be the better version, and more agreeable to the design of the apostle, as giving the best reason against the accepting persons on the account of their riches, or their gay attire; because their faith hath clothed them with a greater and more valuable glory, which renders them more honourable than any riches or gay clothing could do. For this faith, saith the apostle, is "the ministration of glory," and by it "we all beholding the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord," 2 Cor. iii. 3. 18 (see the note there): and whom God hath justified by faith, "he hath also glorified," by giving them this Spirit of glory, Rom. viii. 30 (see the note there).

[2] Ἐν προσωποληψίαις, With respect of persons.] Προσωποληψία is the respect of persons in judgment, not purely according to the merits of the case, but according to external respects, which relate not to it. As for instance, the dread of any man's power, or the fear of what he may do to us, if we judge against him. So, Lev. xix. 14, "Thou shalt not honour the person of the great, or respect the person of the poor; in justice shalt thou judge thy neighbour." And, Deut. i. 17, "Ye shall not respect persons in judgment, ye shall hear alike the small and the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man, for the judgment is the Lord's." Or, (2.) the poverty of any man, which renders him less able to suffer the punishment of his injustice; "Thou shalt not respect a poor man in his cause" (Exod. xxiii. 3). (3.) It is the respecting persons in judgment, by reason of any gift, or hope of gain, by favouring any cause; "Thou shalt not wrest judgment, thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift" (Deut. xvi. 19). Or, (4.) by reason of relation, affinity, friendship, or affection. In spiritual or evangelical matters, it is to have regard to men, in reference to things, which render them neither better nor worse, more or less acceptable in the sight of God. As for instance, to regard them, (1.) in respect to their nation, and their offspring; "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him" (Acts x. 31): he will have no respect to nations, or external professions, in his future recompenses (Rom. ii. 6. 10). Or, (2.) with regard to their condition, as being masters, or servants; hence masters are bid to deal with their servants, as "knowing they have a Master in heaven, with whom is no respect of persons" (Eph. vi. 9): and servants to be just to their masters; because "he that is unjust shall receive for the wrong that he hath done, and there is no respect of persons with God" (Col. iii. 25, 1 Pet. i. 17). Or, (3.) to their quality; for "God accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor; for they are all the works of his hands" (Job xxxiv. 19). And this is the thing here censured.

[3] Ver. 2. Εἰς τὴν συναγωγήν, Into your assembly.] That goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment;

3 And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool:

4 [4] Are ye not then partial in yourselves? (Do you not both put a difference among yourselves on these accounts,) and (also) are become [5] judges of evil thoughts (in thinking that the rich is to be preferred in judgment, and the poor despised, ver. 6, on these accounts)?

5 Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him (and are they fit to be despised by you, who are so highly honoured and enriched by him)?

6 But (so it is, that) ye have despised the poor (and had a partial respect to the rich: and yet) do not (these) rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment seats (on the account of your Christian profession)?

7 Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called?

8 If (in this matter) ye fulfil the royal law (which is) according to [6] the scripture, (saying,) Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well (for then ye be not guilty of this respect of persons; for you would not be despised, because you are poor, or have a rich man preferred before you in judgment):

9 But if ye have (such) respect to persons (as to honour the rich and despise the poor, in judicial causes), ye commit sin, and are convinced of (or, by) the law (now mentioned) as transgressors (of God's law in the general; this law comprehending all the duties of the second table; Rom. xiii. 9, Matt. xxii. 39).

10 For whosoever shall keep the whole law (in other matters), and yet (knowingly) offend in one point, he is guilty of all.

11 For he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become [7] a transgressor of the law (of love, mentioned ver. 8, which comprehends all the duties of the second table, in which here the apostle instanceth).

12 So (therefore) speak ye, and so do, as they that (know they) shall be judged [8] by the law of liberty.

13 [9] For he shall have judgment without mercy, that hath shewed no mercy (and so hath highly thwarted the great law of love); and mercy rejoiceth against (or triumpheth over) judgment (i. e. enables the here the apostle speaketh of consistories for civil judicatures, is argued, (1.) from the accepting of persons, mentioned ver. 1, which in the Old Testament and the New, as often as it is applied to men, respecteth human judicatures. (2.) From the "footstool," mentioned ver. 3, which obtained a place in their judicial consistories, and which was proper to princes on their thrones, and judges on their tribunals. (3.) From the "judges," mentioned ver. 4, and the κριτήρια, or "judgment-seats," ver. 6. (4.) From the "law" violated by this respect of persons, ver. 8, 9; and, lastly, from the canon of the Jews, by which it is provided, "that when the rich and poor have a suit together in their consistories, either both must sit, or both stand, to avoid all marks of partiality" (R. Levi Barcinon, lib. cxlii. Juris Hebraici).

Yet, because the Jewish Christians then had no distinct churches of their own, much less any with such distinct seats for men of rank, or such πρωτοκαθεδρίαι, "chief places" as the Jews had (Matt. xxiii. 6), both in Judea, Alexandria, and other places (Campeg. Vitringa de Synag. Vet. lib. i. cap. 9); but rather assembled still in the Jewish synagogues, where there was a בית דין, or house of judgment, where the head of the synagogue, and the seniors that assisted him, sat to give judgment on offenders, and where they were brought before them, and scourged for their offences (Matt. x. 17, xxiii. 34, Acts xxii. 19, xxvi. 11, see the notes there), the assembly here mentioned might be a Jewish synagogue. Moreover, the Jews, living among the gentiles, retained still a jurisdiction over men of their own nation and religion, even as to matrimonial and pecuniary, as well as religious causes, and so the Jewish Christians might be drawn before their judgment-seats on those accounts (ver. 6): this being long after forbidden by a law of Honorius and Theodosius (Theod. Cod. 16, tit. 8, leg. 22, vid. not. Gothofr. p. 240).

[4] Ver. 4. Καὶ οὐ διεκρίθητε ἐν ἑαυτοῖς;] "Do ye not put a difference or discrimination among yourselves" on those accounts which are alien from the cause? That this is the frequent sense of the word διακρινόμενοι and διακρίνεσθαι, see Acts xv. 9, where οὐδὲν διέκρινε is rendered, "He put no difference betwixt us and them." And Jude 22, where we read thus, "Of some have compassion, διακρινόμενοι, making a difference" (see note on Rom. xiv. 23).

[5] Κριταὶ διαλογισμῶν πονηρῶν, Judges of evil thoughts.] i. e. Who pass judgment from your own evil thoughts, as judging the rich worthy of respect in judgment, for his gorgeous attire and outward appearance, and the poor fit to be despised for his outward meanness.

[6] Ver. 8. Νόμον βασιλικόν, The royal law.] Not so much because it is the law of Christ, our king, it being a law of the Old Testament, as because it is the law which, of all laws which concern our neighbour, is most excellent, and which governs and moderates other laws, especially the ceremonial and positive laws, which are to give place to that of charity and mercy. Moreover, the Jews themselves so interpret this law, as to forbid the contempt of our brother, as you may see in Dr. Cartwright's Mellificium on this place.

[7] Ver. 11. Παραβάτης νόμου, A transgressor of the law.] Or, because the authority of the lawgiver is as much despised by the breaking any one of his laws, as by the violation of them all; and he that by it will not be restrained from the violation of it in one point, under the like temptations, will do it in another.

Note farther, that these words seem to be directly levelled against that loose doctrine of the Jewish doctors, mentioned by Dr. Pocock,* "that God gave so many commandments to them, that by doing any of them they might be saved." So Kimchi expounds these words of Hosea, "Take away iniquity, וקח טוב, and receive good;" i. e. saith he, "Receive in lieu of them any good, אמשה מצוה, any commandment that we have done." It was a vulgar rule among them, saith Dr. Smith,† that men should "single out some one commandment of God's law, and therein especially exercise themselves, that so they might make God their friend by that, lest in others they should too much displease him." And he cites from them this rule,‡ "He that observes any one precept, it shall be well with him, and his days shall be prolonged, and he shall possess the earth." And this precept was with them usually that of the sabbath, of sacrifices, or of tithes, for these they looked upon as the great commandments of the law, not those of mercy and judgment, which in our Saviour's account were so.

[8] Ver. 12. Διὰ νόμου ἐλευθερίας, By the law of liberty.] By that law of love, which makes all men our neighbours, and frees us from those restraints which the ceremonial law and the traditions of the Jewish doctors lay upon them, of confining their love, and freedom of converse, to those that were of their own nation, or were circumcised. The Jews had great need of these instructions; for as they held it unlawful to converse with "publicans and sinners" (Luke xv. 1, 2), though it were to instruct them in the way of life: so much more "to come to, or converse with, one of another nation" (Acts x. 28): yea, they would not suffer them to be among them who would not be circumcised (Vid. Joseph. in Vitâ suâ, p. 1007, B).

[9] Ver. 13.] Of this mercy the Jews were so unmindful, that Josephus§ having said, "they violated the laws of nature, and polluted the Divinity with their injustice towards merciful man to rejoice, as being free from the judgment of condemnation from that God, who to the merciful will show himself merciful, Ps. xviii. 27.

14 And let not any Jew or Christian think his faith sufficient to justify and save him, without these works of charity and mercy; for) What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith (in God, ver. 19, or in Christ), and hath not works (to evidence his faith)? can (such a naked, fruitless) faith save him?

15 If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food,

16 And one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled (wishing only that they may be so); notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to (the clothing or feeding) the body; what doth it profit (them to hear your kind wishes)?

17 Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead (fruitless and lifeless as these words), being alone (without works showing the truth of it).

18 [10] Yea, a man may say (to such a solifidian), Thou hast (in thy pretensions) faith, and I have (real) works: shew me thy faith (of which thou boastest) without thy works (which thou canst never do; since faith being seated in the heart can only be discovered by its effects), and I will shew thee my faith by my works (as the cause is demonstrated by the effect).

19 Thou (being a Jew) believest that there is one God; thou (in that) doest well, (but doest no more than the very devils: for) the* devils also believe, and tremble (and if thou hast no better faith than they, thou hast the same reason to tremble which they have).

* Gigantes contremiscunt, Targ. in Job xxvi. 4.

20 But wilt thou know, O vain man (who boastest of a faith destitute of works), that faith without works is dead, (and so unable to justify and save thee? see it in the example of that very Abraham, in thy relation to whom thou so confidest.)

21 (For) Was not Abraham (whom we style) our father justified by works (proceeding from his faith), [11] when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar, (counting that God was able to raise him from the dead? Heb. xi. 17. 19.)

22 Seest thou how (Gr. Thou seest (by this example) that) faith wrought with his works (to produce them), and by works was faith made perfect (in him)?

23 And the scripture was (again) fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God, and it (viz. that faith which produced these works) [12] was imputed unto him for righteousness: and (upon that account) he was called the Friend of God.

24 Ye see then how that by works (proceeding from faith) a man is justified, and not by faith only (alone without them).

25 Likewise also was not [13] Rahab the harlot justified by works (proceeding from her faith), when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?

26 (And so it must be in all other persons who would be saved, they must show their faith by their works:) [14] For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also (and therefore cannot save us, or give life unto us).

men," he adds, "that no good affection was so entirely lost among them, ὡς ἔλεος, as that of mercy."

[10] Ver. 18.] The Greek in most copies runs thus, δεῖξόν μοι τὴν πίστιν σου ἐκ τῶν ἔργων σου, κἀγὼ δείξω σοι ἐκ τῶν ἔργων μου τὴν πίστιν μου, i. e. "Show me thy faith by thy works, and I will show thee by my works my faith:" i. e. Show me, by the proper fruits of it, the faith of which thou boastest, and I, by the same effects, will show I have that faith also, though I boast not of it. But it is farther to be observed, that ἐκ τῶν ἔργων σου is left out in Œcumenius and one Greek copy; and, (2.) that the Alexandrian MSS. and those perused by Curcellæus, read χωρὶς τῶν ἔργων σου, "without thy works:" so did the Vulgar, the Syriac, and the Ethiopic versions; and so the following words, ver. 20, "Know, O vain man, that faith, χωρὶς ἔργων, without works is dead," seems to require; and this reading our translation follows.

[11] Ver. 21. Ἀνενέγκας, &c. When he offered his son Isaac.] This being a greater act of faith than that by which he was at first justified; for that was only faith in God's promise, that he would raise up seed from his dead body, and the dead womb of Sarah (Rom. iv. 20). This was a belief, that he would raise up this very seed, consumed to ashes, from the dead; and therefore by this work was "his faith made perfect," i. e. advanced to the greatest height; there being no more noble act of faith, than this of the resurrection of the dead consumed to ashes, and none by which we give more glory to God (see Ecclus. xliv. 20).

[12] Ver. 23. Ἐλογίσθη αὐτῷ εἰς δικαιοσύνην, Was accounted to him for righteousness.] That is, it engaged God to own him as a truly religious person, or one that did sincerely fear him, by saying, "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy only son from me" (Gen. xxii. 15); or as one who upon trial had been found faithful: so Matthias, "Was not Abraham found faithful in temptation, and that was accounted to him for righteousness?" (1 Macc. ii. 52) and also to deal with him as a righteous person, so as to renew the covenant made with him, and to establish it with an oath (Gen. xxii. 16—18), and to give him the high title, not only of his servant, but his friend (2 Chron. xx. 7, Isa. xli. 8).

[13] Ver. 25. Ῥαὰβ ἡ πόρνη, Rahab the harlot.] That Rahab had a strong faith in God, the apostle testifies, by saying, "By faith Rahab the harlot perished not with those that believed not, receiving the spies in peace" (Heb. xi. 31); and this she showed, by saying, "The Lord your God he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath" (Josh. ii. 11); and this she testified, by being so industrious to preserve the messengers, and to do all things agreed on betwixt them and her, for her safety.

[14] Ver. 26.] There have been many ways invented how to reconcile these words of James with the apostle Paul, asserting, that "a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law," Rom. iii. 28. As,

First, That when Paul saith, "We are justified by faith, without the works of the law;" and that "to him that worketh not, but believeth, faith is imputed unto him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 5), or "to justification:" justification, there ascribed to faith alone, imports only our absolution from condemnation, by reason of our past offences committed before faith, and our reconciliation to God, by the pardon, or not imputing them to believers. It consists, saith the apostle, "in the remission of sins that are past," Rom. iii. 25. It is, saith Peter, "the purgation of us from our old sins," 2 Pet. i. 9. It is effected by the death of Christ, procuring "redemption for sins committed under the old covenant" (Heb. ix. 15). This is apparent from the chief argument the apostle useth to prove the necessity, that both Jew and gentile should be justified freely by his grace, and not by the works of the law; because they were "all under sin," all become "guilty before God," all having "sinned and come short of the glory of God" (Rom. iii. 9, xix. 23). Whereas, saith he, "being justified by faith, we have peace with God, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 1, 2); therefore, chapter the third, he must be speaking of the condition of Jew and gentile before faith. So again, when the apostle saith, "The scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise (of justification) by (the) faith of Jesus Christ, might be given to them that believe (in him)," Gal. iii. 22—24; "Wherefore the law was (then) our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith (in him);" ver. 25, "But now, after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster (i. e. under the pedagogy of the law);" ver. 26, "For ye are all the children of God, through faith in Christ Jesus;" he plainly insinuates, that we cannot be justified by the works of the law; because the law leads us to Christ for justification, and ceaseth, now the way of justification by faith in Christ is made known. And again, "We are justified by grace, not of works: for we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to good works" (Eph. ii. 8—10): where the argument seems plainly to run thus; We cannot be justified by works preceding faith, because we do no good works, till by faith we are interested in Christ Jesus: whereas James speaks plainly of those works which follow faith, are wrought by it, and are the fruits of it, and of their necessity, in order to our continuance in a state of justification and freedom from our final condemnation.

Secondly, That Paul excludes from justification, only those works which are opposed to justification by an act of grace, and make it to be of debt, and so give occasion to our glorying in our being righteous in the sight of God, purely by reason of our works, as in these words, "If it be of grace, it is no more of works, otherwise grace is no more grace; but if it be of works, then it is no more of grace, otherwise work is no more work" (Rom. xi. 6). And again, "To him that worketh, the reward is reckoned, not of grace, but of debt: but to him that worketh not, but believeth, faith is accounted unto him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 4, 5). And again, "Where then is glorying? it is excluded. By what law? by that of works? No: but by the law of faith" (Rom. iii. 27). Whereas James requires only those works to our salvation, and our continuance in a state of justification, which proceed from, and are accepted through grace, and so can never render our justification of debt, or give us a just ground of boasting.

Thirdly, That Paul is arguing against the Jews, who sought for justification by virtue of the law of Moses, and sought it not by faith (Rom. ix. 32), nor ever conceived that sufficient for that end, declaring against that way of justification, because it would confine the blessing of Abraham to the circumcision only (Rom. iv. 9), and because the law of Moses was four hundred and thirty years after the promise made to Abraham; speaking of that law which said, "Do this, and live" (Gal. iii. 17); which was "our schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ," and which was then to cease, as to the obligation of it: whereas James speaks of justification by works performed under the covenant of grace, and as conditions even of that new covenant. Now I except not against any of these ways of reconciling these two apostles in their discourse upon this subject; but then I also think we may add this other to them.

Fourthly, That Paul plainly speaks to Christians only, concerning their justification from their past offences by faith in the blood of Jesus; but James speaks as well to the unbelieving as believing Jews, touching faith in God, such as Abraham had when he believed God's promise (ver. 23), and such as Rahab the harlot had (ver. 25), saying, "Thou believest there is one God" (ver. 19), without the least mention of faith in Christ; and who, perhaps, thought it sufficient to keep them in the favour of God, and render them his friends, that they had cast off all idolatry, and owned the true God; proving this not to be sufficient to procure the divine favour, unless by the obedience of their lives they glorified him as God, since otherwise they only did in words profess to own him, but in works deny him, being disobedient.

CHAPTER III.

1 My brethren, [1] be not many masters, (i. e. διδάσκαλοι, teachers of the law), knowing that (thereby) we shall receive the greater condemnation (for our offences against that law we teach to others.

2 And this we ought the rather to beware of;) For in many things we offend all (against the law, and more especially in that member that we employ in teaching of others: for) if any man offend not in word, the same is [2] a perfect man, and able also to bridle (curb and direct the motions of) the whole body.

3 (I use the metaphor of a bridle as apposite in this case; for) Behold, we put bits (or bridles) in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us; and (with those bits) we turn about their whole body, (even so, if we by any means can bridle, and thereby govern the tongue, by the like means we may govern the whole man.)

4 Behold also the ships, which though they be so great (in bulk), and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor (or pilot of the ship) listeth.

5 Even so (is it with) the tongue (as with this bit and helm: it) is a little member, [3] and boasteth great things (καὶ μεγαλαυχεῖ, but it mightily exalts itself by its great performances). Behold, how great a matter (how much wood) a little fire kindleth!

6 [4] And the tongue is (as) a fire, a world of iniquity (is kindled by it): so is the tongue among our members (as fire among wood), that it defileth (Gr. spotting or blackening) the whole body, and setteth (Gr. inflaming or setting) on fire the course of nature (or the succession of men in the world); and it is set on fire of hell (Gr. being set on fire by hell.

7 And it resembles fire in this also, that when it hath once got the mastery it cannot easily be subdued and extinguished:) For every kind of beasts, and of birds,

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. Μὴ πολλοὶ διδάσκαλοι γίνεσθε, Be not many teachers.] The Jews had, not only in Judea, but in their several dispersions, their מוריים, or "doctors of the law," who being created doctors, masters, or rabbins, by imposition of hands, were authorized to teach the law to others. This office the Jews much affected, θέλοντες εἶναι νομοδιδάσκαλοι, "affecting to be teachers of the law" (1 Tim. i. 7), and being confident of their abilities to be "guides to the blind, a light to them that sat in darkness, instructors of the foolish, and, διδάσκαλοι νηπίων, teachers of babes" (Rom. ii. 19, 20). And such especially were the zealots among them. Whence Eleazar* the chief of them saith, "They had especial reason to expect a share in the divine favour, as being blameless as to the observation of the law, and also teachers of it to others." This affectation of that office, the apostle here warns them to avoid, as that which would expose them to greater condemnation, for their offences against that law they taught to others, and so confessed they knew themselves.

[2] Ver. 2. Τέλειος ἀνὴρ, A perfect man,] Is a person fully instructed in his duty (see note on 1 Cor. ii. 6).

[3] Ver. 5. Καὶ μεγαλαυχεῖ, And boasteth great things.] This word signifies not only to vaunt of, but also to do great things; μέγαλα ἐργάζεται καλὰ καὶ κακὰ, "It works great good and evil," saith Œcumenius: Magnificatrix est, "It is a doer of great things," so Faber; it answers to the Hebrew גדר, which signifies to be valid, and move itself violently, to be haughty, and exalt itself (Ps. ix. 19, Ezek. xvi. 50, Zeph. iii. 11, Ecclus. xlviii. 18). And this signification, both the text, and the resemblance of the tongue to fire, seem plainly to require (see Examen Millii).

[4] Ver. 6. Ἡ γλῶσσα πῦρ, The tongue is a fire.] The comparison of the tongue to fire, first blackening, and then wasting the whole world (or wood), is taken from the scripture, and from the sayings of the Hebrew doctors: "The froward man bringeth destruction, in his mouth there is a burning fire," Prov. xvi. 27. And ver. 28, λαμπτῆρα and of serpents, and things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed [5] by mankind:

* Ὥσπερ ἀναμάρτητοι πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν γενόμενοι, καὶ μηδεμιᾶς μετασχόντες, οἱ καὶ τοὺς ἄλλους ἐδιδάξαμεν. Apud Joseph. de Bello Jud. lib. vii. cap. 34, p. 990, C.

8 But the tongue (of others) can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, (and, like the serpents, mentioned ver. 7,) full of deadly poison.

9 Therewith bless we God, even the Father (of us all); and therewith [6] curse we men, which are made [7] after the similitude of God (and upon that account are to be reverenced by us).

10 Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be. (For)

11 Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter?

12 Can the fig tree, my brethren, bear olive berries? either a vine, figs? (surely no: even) so can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh (and if nature produceth no such contrary fruits, much less should grace produce things so extremely opposite as our blessing and cursing).

13 Who (then) is [8] a wise man and endued with knowledge among you (to which you are great pretenders)? let him shew out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom (or the works of wisdom with meekness; i. e. let him, by his charity and meekness towards his brethren, show forth his wisdom).

14 But if ye have [9] bitter envying and strife in your hearts, glory not (of your wisdom), and lie not against the truth (in pretending to be wise as to it).

15 This wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly (from the love of earthly things), sensual, (proceeding from the lust of the flesh, among which strife and envy are reckoned, Gal. v. 20), devilish, (coming from Satan, the promoter of strife and envy, and from pride and ambition, by which he fell, 1 Tim. iii. 6.)

16 For where envying and strife is (as the root), there is [10] confusion and every evil work (as the fruit).

17 But the wisdom that is from above is first pure (from sensuality and earthly-mindedness, ver. 15), then peaceable, (and) gentle (in opposition to contention, ver. 14), and easy to be intreated (or persuaded, in opposition to the inflexibility of the Jews), [11] full of mercy and good fruits, (wanting in them, ver. 13,) [12] without partiality, and [13] without hypocrisy (of which things the Jews were highly guilty).

18 And [14] the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of (for, or to) them that make peace.

δόλου πυροσβέτ κακοῖς, "He kindles a firebrand of deceit to the wicked." "As the matter of fire, κατὰ τὴν ὕλην πυρὸς, according to the wood of the fire, so it burneth; and the stronger they are that contend, the more they will be inflamed," Ecclus. xxviii. 10. "A hasty contention kindleth a fire, the fire burning kindles great heaps," saith Ben Syra; which is thus explained, "As a little fire consumes great heaps of wood, so nothing more wastes the world than an evil tongue."

Note, Secondly, If the original was as our translation hath it, "A world of iniquity," something must be added to it to make the sense complete, as I have done in the paraphrase, or as the Ethiopic, "A world of iniquity is contained in it." But the Syriac reads thus, "And the wicked world is as the wood;" and this makes both the sense and the similitude run clear.

[5] Ver. 7. Τῇ φύσει τῇ ἀνθρωπίνῃ, By mankind,] Is the Hebrew phrase for man, as ἀνθρωπίνη κτίσις is "a man," 1 Pet. ii. 13.

[6] Ver. 9. Καταρώμεθα, Curse we men.] This the unbelieving Jews did towards the Christians, cursing and anathematizing them in their synagogues; as Justin Martyr* often testifieth to the face of Trypho the Jew.

[7] Καθ' ὁμοίωσιν Θεοῦ, After the similitude of God.] From this ninth verse it appears, that man lost not the image of God by the fall, and thence it is probable that it consists not primarily in holiness, but in dominion (Gen. i. 26).

[8] Ver. 13. Ἐπιστήμων ἐν ὑμῖν, A wise man among you.] That the Jews were great pretenders to knowledge, see Rom. ii. 18. That they gloried in the title of חכמים or "wise men," see note on 1 Cor. i. 20, iii. 18. Hence their divines are still חכמי האמת, "wise men as to the truth," saith Buxtorf.

[9] Ver. 14. Ζῆλον πικρὸν καὶ ἐριθείαν, Bitter envy and strife.] The unbelieving Jews are represented still as οἱ ἐξ ἐριθείας, "men of contention, who obeyed not the truth" (Rom. ii. 8): men who were filled with bitter zeal against the preachers of the gospel (Acts xiii. 45, xvii. 5), and very "mad against them." And some of them who owned the gospel, did yet preach Christ, ἐξ ἐριθείας, "out of contention," and envy against Paul (Phil. i. 15), and the effects of their disputes were, saith the apostle, φθόνοι καὶ ἔριδες, "envy and strife," 1 Tim. vi. 4, ἔριδες καὶ μάχαι νομικαὶ, "contentions and fightings about the law:" and where they were mixed with the converted gentiles, we find especial cautions against strife and envy, as at Rome, Rom. xiii. 13; against "provoking one another, and envying one another," Gal. v. 26; against doing things "through strife and vain glory," Phil. ii. 3, or complaints of the abounding of these vices, 1 Cor. i. 11, iii. 3, see especially, 2 Cor. xii. 20.

[10] Ver. 16. Ἀκαταστασία, Confusion.] i. e. Tumult, sedition, and disturbance of peace and order; for contention naturally tends to fighting, and envy to the destruction of him we hate. Φθονεῖτε καὶ ζηλοῦτε, "Ye are envious and zealous against one another," iv. 2; and then it follows, μάχεσθε καὶ πολεμεῖτε, "Ye fight and war."

[11] Ver. 17. Μεστὴ ἐλέους, Full of mercy.] Which, saith Josephus,* "of all good passions, was most of all lost among the Jews."

[12] Ἀδιάκριτος, Without partiality.] Or, as the word signifies, without putting a difference betwixt men of their own and other nations, as the Jews did, accounting all other nations dogs, unclean, not fit to be conversed with; and dealing with them accordingly, for as Tacitus† hath observed of them, Apud ipsos fides obstinata, misericordia in promptû, adversùs omnes alios hostile odium; i. e. "They would be merciful to men of their own religion and country, but hated all mankind besides:" confining brotherly love to men of their own nation, as we learn from our Saviour's parable of the good Samaritan. When they broke into sects and parties, they had the same hatred to those of their own nation who would not think and do as they did. The zealots, and those that were for war, set themselves against, and even threatened death to them who were for peace, looking upon them as no better than heathens, saith Josephus:‡ whereas true Christian wisdom requires us to live peaceably with, and to do good to all.

[13] Ἀνυπόκριτος, And without hypocrisy.] For which our Saviour so severely inveighs against the scribes and pharisees, the leaders of the Jews.

[14] Ver. 18. Καρπὸς τῆς δικαιοσύνης, The fruit of righteousness,] i. e. The reward of the righteousness to them, who make it their business to live peaceably themselves, and incline others to it, is here sown happily and quietly, by the preachers of the gospel of peace declaring it to the world, and shall hereafter assuredly be reaped by them. Or thus, These fruits of righteousness, now sown by the Christian endued with this heavenly wisdom, will yield a plentiful and happy crop to them who are promoters of peace.

CHAPTER IV.

1 From [1] whence come wars and fightings among you (Jews)? come they not hence, even of your lusts (or pleasures) that war in your members (against the soul? 1 Pet. ii. 11.)

2 [2] Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war, yet ye have not, because ye ask not.

3 Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts.

4 Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that [3] the friendship of the world (which stands in competition with, and indisposeth you to believe and obey God's will) is enmity with God (and so idolatry, which in the language of scripture is adultery)? whosoever therefore will be (thus) a friend of the world is the enemy of God (having renounced him to have mammon for his Lord, Matt. vi. 24).

5 [4] Do ye think that the scripture saith (Gr. speaks) in vain (against this worldly-mindedness), The spirit that dwelleth in us (Christians) lusteth (he) to envy (as yours doth? ver. 2. Is he not rather the Spirit of love and goodness, engaging us to love all men, and especially our Christian brethren? 1 Pet. i. 22.)

6 But (so far is he from this envy, that where he dwells) [5] he giveth more grace (or favour). Wherefore he (or it, the scripture) saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace (or showeth favour) unto the humble (Prov. iii. 34).

7 (Be ye then humble, and) Submit yourselves therefore to (that) God (who giveth grace to the humble). Resist the devil, (the author of those wars, envyings, and lustings which are among you,) and (then) he will flee from you.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. Πόθεν πόλεμοι; Whence come wars?] This epistle seems to have been writ about the eighth year of Nero, and the sixty-second of Christ, the year before the death of James; before which time the Jews had great wars and fightings, not only with their neighbours (see note on Matt. xxiv. 6), but even among themselves in every city and family, saith Josephus;* not only in Judea, but in Alexandria, Syria, and many other places (see the preface, §. 5, 6).

[2] Ver. 2. Ἐπιθυμεῖτε, &c. Ye lust, &c.] For explication of these words we are to note, that the Jews were then vehemently lusting after two things:

First, Liberty and freedom from tribute; which was, say they, the token of subjection. Josephus saith,† they were "continually clamouring to have the tributes took away," and that upon this very account; and‡ that "the zealots, the band of thieves, and their magicians, were still pressing the people to fight for their liberty against the Roman yoke."

Secondly, Dominion over other nations; for having got this fancy into their heads, that their Messiah‖ was to be a temporal prince, who should enable them to lord it over the heathens, they were zealous to have these pretended prophecies accomplished; and‖ "the hopes of it encouraged them to fight." Whence we may paraphrase on these two verses thus; "Ye lust (for liberty and dominion), and ye have it not; ye (in pursuit and desire of them) kill, and (yet) ye cannot obtain (them), because ye ask not (whether that be according to the will of God which ye so greedily desire). Ye ask these things, and receive them not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume them upon your lusts; (viz. that having this liberty and empire, ye may possess the good things of this world ye lust after, and may lord it over the heathen world.)"

[3] Ver. 4. Φιλία τοῦ κόσμου, ἔχθρα τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐστιν, The friendship of this world is enmity to God.] This, one mentioned here by Œcumenius explains thus; κόσμον ἐνταῦθα πᾶσαν τὴν ὑλικὴν ἀποκαλεῖ, "He here styles the whole sensual life, the world, ὡς μητέρα τῆς φθορᾶς, ἧς ὁ μετασχεῖν σπεύδων ὀλιγώρως ἔχει τῶν θείων, καὶ ὑπεροπτικῶς, as being the mother of corruption, which he that is hasty to enjoy overlooks and despiseth divine things." (See the text defended here, Examen Millii.)

[4] Ver. 5. Ἢ δοκεῖτε ὅτι κενῶς ἡ γραφὴ γέγει; Or do ye think that the scripture saith in vain? &c.] They who make this whole verse one sentence, are obliged to show where the scripture hath these words, "The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy;" which no interpreter hath yet successfully attempted. But in this exposition given in the paraphrase, which makes the whole to consist of two questions, this is needless. Now in favour of this exposition, let it be noted,

First, That nothing is more ordinary than for particles to be repeated from the precedent member. So Ps. ix. 19, "The needy shall not always be forgotten, the expectation of the poor shall (not) perish for ever" (see Ps. xxxviii. 1, xliv. 19, 1 Sam. ii. 3, Job xxx. 25, xxxi. 20, Prov. xxv. 27, xxx. 3). So ם, if, Ps. cxxxix. 8, Prov. vi. 1, ix. 12 (see Glassius de Ellipsi Partic. lib. iv. tr. 2, observ. 10, p. 721). So here the particle ἢ may be repeated thus, "Or, doth the spirit that is in you lust to envy?" though the sense be full only by reading the words by way of interrogation. Note, Secondly, That "not to speak in vain," is not to do it without cause or just reason, as Ezek. vi. 10. And God, or the scripture, is said to "speak in vain" to them who attend not to, or receive no benefit by, his words, Jer. viii. 8. So then the sense runs thus, Doth the scripture speak without cause against this worldly-mindedness? Would it not have you attend to, and receive advantage by, what it saith against it?

[5] Ver. 6. Μείζονα δὲ δίδωσι χάριν, But he giveth more grace.] That חן and χάρις throughout the scripture signifies favour, and good will, see note on 2 Cor. vi. 1. And this sense the opposition here requires; God being displeased with, and opposing himself to, the proud, but showing favour to the humble, and causing them to find favour among men (Prov. iii. 34). What Mons. Le Clerc here saith, "That in those times the Jews used to produce, as out of scripture, not only the sense of places without regarding the words, but also a Jewish tradition, or interpretation of scripture, and so we are not to look for what is here said, in the Old Testament," is intolerable: for is it fit to make an apostle, giving us those scriptures which are to be our rule of faith, speak thus, Do you think the scripture speaks in vain, what it speaks not at all? and to call a Jewish tradition the scripture?

[6] Ver. 8. Ἐγγίσατε τῷ Θεῷ, Draw nigh to God.] The way of drawing nigh to God being now, under the gospel dispensation, through faith in Christ, and in his blood shed for the propitiation of our sins, we being "made nigh to him through the blood of Christ" (Eph. ii. 13), and through the introduction of that better hope, by which ἐγγίζομεν τῷ Θεῷ, "we patience, and obedience), and he will draw nigh to you (in mercy). 7 Cleanse your hands (from rapine and injustice), ye sinners; and purify your hearts (from the love of the world), ye double minded (whose hearts are divided betwixt God and mammon).

9 Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned into mourning, and your joy to [8] heaviness.

10 Humble yourselves (therefore) in the sight of the Lord (and under his mighty hand that is upon you, 1 Pet. v. 6), and he shall lift you up (that he may exalt you, ἐν καιρῷ, in that season of his visitation, as he did then his faithful servants, by a wonderful deliverance, according to his promise, see note on Matt. xxiv. 31).

11 [9] Speak not evil one of (or against) another, brethren. He that speaketh evil of (or against) his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and [10] judgeth the law (or speaketh against the law, as being evil or imperfect, in that it doth not command or condemn those things which thou dost command or condemn): but if thou (take upon thee to) judge the law, thou art not (in thy behaviour as) a doer of the law, but a judge (of it.

draw nigh to God" (Heb. vii. 19); it being Christ alone by whom we have an introduction to the Father through faith in him (Eph. ii. 18, iii. 12), and who "hath suffered for us, that he might bring us to God" (1 Pet. iii. 18): this may be looked on as an exhortation to the ἁμαρτωλοί, the unbelieving Jews, to believe in Christ, and to the δίψυχοι, the wavering Jews (see note on i. 8), to cleave steadfastly to the faith.

7 Καθαρίσατε χεῖρας, Cleanse your hands.] That the hands of the Jews, and especially of the zealots among them, were "full of blood and rapine," we learn from Josephus,* who makes very often sad complaints of the murders and rapines committed by them (see v. 4. 6); and so this exhortation must be very properly directed to them. True also is the note of Esthius here, Porrò si jubentur homines emundare manus, et purificare corda, nec jubetur quid impossibile: consequens est eos posse hæc præstare.

8 Ver. 9. Εἰς κατήφειαν, Into heaviness.] For now the day of vengeance upon the unbelieving and backsliding Jews approacheth (Luke xxi. 22). Now the coming of the Lord to execute vengeance on them draweth near (v. 8), when "wrath shall come upon them to the uttermost" (2 Thess. ii. 16).

9 Ver. 11. Μὴ καταλαλεῖτε, Speak not evil.] For explication of these words, let it be noted, that the great exception which both the unbelieving Jews and the Judaizing Christians among them had against the believing gentiles, was this, that† "they observed not their feasts or sabbaths, and that they were not circumcised," whence they concluded they differed little from the heathens. This was the thing for which the Christian fathers‡ did contend against them; viz. that the ancient patriarchs of old were acceptable to God, and consequently the Christians, and especially the converted gentiles, might be acceptable to God without the observation of these feasts and sabbaths, or of circumcision. Hence the apostle is so concerned that they should not judge one another "on the account of days or meats" (Rom. xiv. 4. 6). Hence he inveighs against the Galatians, as being brought in bondage by the Judaizers, to the observation of circumcision (v. 5), and of "days, months, times, and years" (iv. 10): and warns his Colossians not to be induced to follow those rudiments of the world, as being circumcised in Christ (Col. ii. 11); and saith "Let no man judge you in respect of feasts, or new moons, or of the sabbaths" (ver. 16): so that the argument of the apostle here seems to run thus, Let no man speak against his Christian brethren the gentiles, for not observing these things; for the law itself requiring these things, not of the gentiles that even dwelt among them, but only of the Jews, he that speaks against them, and judgeth them for the non-observation of these things, he in effect speaks against and judgeth that law as deficient, which required not these things. And thou who takest upon thee to say they cannot be saved (Acts xv. 1), and so judgest them to destruction, without the observation of them, thou even takest upon thee the office of the great Lawgiver, who alone is able to save and to destroy, and who by not requiring those things of the gentiles, shows he will save them without them, and not destroy them for neglect of them. So the Targum on Ezek. xiii. 18 brings in God speaking to the false prophets thus, "Can you kill or make alive the souls of my people?" Others indeed refer this to the law of Christian love, but that is still styled "the law of Christ," Gal. vi. 2, or "the law of liberty," ii. 12; but never absolutely "the law," as here; and therefore I prefer the former interpretation.

10 Κρίνει νόμον, Judgeth the law.] That is, saith Œcumenius, κατακρίνει, καταφρονεῖ, "he condemns and despiseth the law, forbidding him to condemn and to speak evil of his brother, and so will not be a doer of it, οὗ γάρ τις καταφρονεῖ, πῶς ἀνέξεται ὑπ' αὐτὸν ἔτι ζῆν; for how will a man be induced to live by that law which he despiseth?"

11 Ver. 15. Ἐὰν ὁ Κύριος θελήσῃ, If the Lord will.] It was a rule of Ben Syra (Buxt. Flor. p. 4), "Let no man say he will do any thing, unless he first say, If the Lord will:" who also adds, that "one died before night, for refusing to add this." And when Alcibiades had said to Socrates, "I will do so, if you will," Socrates* tells him he ought to have said, ἐὰν ὁ Θεὸς ἐθέλῃ, "If God will." Not that we are obliged always to say thus (Rom. xv. 28), but only still to own our dependence on divine providence (ver. 17). Εἰδότι οὖν, "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, it is sin:" so Menander saith, εὐηθέα μοι φαίνεται ὀηλουμένη τὸ νοεῖν μὲν ὅσα δεῖ, μὴ φυλάττεσθαι δ' ἃ δεῖ, "It is manifest folly to know what we ought to do, and not to do it" (Apud Stob. serm. 4, p. 53).

CHAPTER V.

1 [1] Go to now, ye rich men (of the Jewish nation, ye will have cause to) weep and howl for your miseries that shall come (Gr. are coming) upon you.

2 Your riches are corrupted (or, are as things putrefied by being kept too long), and your garments are (become) motheaten (they being laid up in your wardrobes, and not used to clothe your naked brother, shall be as useless to you as if they were devoured by the moth).

3 Your gold and silver is cankered (or eaten out with rust); and the rust of them shall be a witness against you (of your covetous and worldly minds), [2] and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days (Gr. It shall eat your flesh as fire, ye have treasured it up for the last days).

4 Behold, the [3] hire of the labourers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped (and are thus defrauded of their wages by you) are entered into the ears of the Lord of sabaoth.

5 [4] Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nourished your hearts, as in (or for) [5] a day of slaughter.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἄγε νῦν, Go to now.] This is only a form of transition (iv. 13), and converting of speech to any person; as if he should have said, And now to speak to you that are rich, I call upon you to weep, &c.

That this prediction was exactly fulfilled by the slaughter and spoiling of the rich Jews throughout Galilee and Judea, Josephus* will not suffer us to doubt: for he informs us, that "the zealots spared none but those who were ταπεινοὶ διὰ τυχὴν, poor and low in fortune;" and that they were so insatiably rapacious, that they searched all the houses of the rich, killing the men, and abusing the women: and that it also was fulfilled touching those of the dispersion, see the preface, §. 5, 6.

[2] Ver. 3. It shall eat your flesh as fire, ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις, in the last days.] As the rust eats into the gold and silver, so shall your flesh and substance be eaten up as with fire, as if you had treasured up fire in the midst of it. For,

First, This is a frequent metaphor among the prophets, who often speak of the fire eating up the wicked, and devouring their flesh; "Thou shalt make them as a fiery oven in the time of thy wrath, καὶ καταφάγεται αὐτοὺς πῦρ, and the fire shall eat them up," Ps. xxi. 9; "The light of Israel shall be for a fire, and his Holy One for a flame, and it shall burn, καὶ φάγεται, and eat up his thorns and briers in one day, καὶ καταφάγεται ἀπὸ ψυχῆς ἕως σαρκῶν, and it shall eat up from the soul to the flesh," Isa. x. 16, 17; πῦρ τοὺς ἐναντίους ἕξεται, "The fire shall eat up the adversaries," xxvii. 11; "Behold, the name of the Lord cometh forth from far, burning with anger, καὶ ἡ ὀργὴ τοῦ θυμοῦ ὡς πῦρ ἔδεται, and the anger of his fury shall eat as the fire," xxx. 11; "Behold, I will make my word in thy mouth fire, and this people wood, καὶ καταφάγεται αὐτοὺς, and it shall eat them up," Jer. v. 14; "They shall go out from one fire, καὶ πῦρ αὐτοὺς καταφάγεται, and another fire shall eat them up," Ezek. xv. 7; "I will bring forth a fire from the midst of thee, and the fire, καταφάγεταί σε, shall eat thee up," see Amos v. 6.

Secondly, This was punctually fulfilled in the destruction of that nation by their own seditions and the Roman wars: for, amongst the sicarii and the zealots, the ringleaders of all their seditions, it was a crime enough to be rich; and their insatiable avarice induced them still to make, τῶν πλουσίων οἴκων ἔρευναν, "a search into the houses of the rich." For them to remain among these tyrants was destruction; "for by false accusations they were slain as deserters,"* for their substance. Yea, both their substance and their flesh were devoured by the flames,† which burnt up the city and the temple, "and so consumed both their dead bodies, and their substance, and their wardrobes;" and that which remained became a prey to the army of the Romans. See the like done in their dispersions, preface, §. 6.

[3] Ver. 4. Ὁ μισθὸς, The hire.] The precept in the law touching this matter running thus, "Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour—the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning," Lev. xix. 13, this keeping of it back is truly styled fraud and oppression; and all sins of that nature cry to heaven for vengeance on the fraudulent oppressor. So "the cry" of the Israelites under their oppression in the land of Egypt, "came up" to God, Exod. ii. 23, iii. 7; "The cry of the afflicted widow and the fatherless," Exod. xxii. 27; "The cry of the poor and the afflicted," Job xxxiv. 28, Ps. ix. 12; "The cry of him that wants his pledge to cover him," Exod. xxii. 27; and the cry of him whose wages is kept back. "Thou shalt not oppress a hired servant that is poor and needy; at his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it—lest he cry against thee to the Lord, and it be a sin unto thee," Deut. xxiv. 14, 15.

[4] Ver. 5. Ἐτρυφήσατε καὶ ἐσπαταλήσατε, Ye have lived in pleasure, and been wanton.] The first word, ἐτρυφήσατε, say critics, refers to their luxurious eating; the second, ἐσπαταλήσατε, to their carnal lustings and lasciviousnesss (1 Tim. v. 6, Ezek. xvi. 49), both which were vices the Jews then were very subject to, eating and drinking to excess in their feasts (see note on 1 Cor. xi. 21); and were, saith Tacitus,‡ projectissima ad libidinem gens, "a nation very prone to lust."

[5] As for a day of slaughter.] i. e. As the sacrifices, which are first fattened and then slaughtered, saith the Chaldee paraphrase on those words, "The enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs," Ps. xxxvii. 20 (see Examen Millii).

‡ Hist. lib. v. ab initio.

6 Ye have condemned [6] and killed the just; and he doth not resist you.

7 Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord (to avenge you of these murderers). Behold, the [7] husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain (the first to make the corn sown swell and grow up, the latter to make the ear plump before harvest).

8 Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts (in expectation of this advent): for [8] the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.

9 [9] Grudge not (Gr. groan not) one against another, brethren (as men impatient, and desiring vengeance, use to do), lest ye be condemned (as wanting in that patience, which ought to have its perfect work in you; and in that Christian charity, which requires you to pray for mercy, and not to cry for vengeance on your enemies): behold, the judge (who will plead your cause against your persecuting brethren) standeth before the door.

10 Take, my brethren, the prophets, who have spoken (to you Jews) in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and of patience (i. e. of patient suffering; for they had experience of cruel mockings, and of death, and yet they suffered these things patiently).

11 Behold, we count them happy which endure (afflictions for righteousness' sake, and for the trial of their faith, Matt. v. 12, 1 Pet. iv. 14). Ye have heard of the [10] patience of Job, and have seen (i. e. known) the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy (as then he was to him a deliverer, and a rewarder of his patience, so will he be to you).

12 [11] But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay

[6] Ver. 6. Ἐφονεύσατε, Ye have killed, &c.] Here Œcumenius saith, ἀναντιῤῥήτως τὸ ἐφονεύσατε δίκαιον ἐπὶ τὸν Χριστὸν ἀναφέρεται, "This is undoubtedly to be referred to Christ, who is emphatically styled the Just One," Acts iii. 14, vii. 52, xxii. 14. So Justin Martyr,* ἀπεκτείνατε τὸν δίκαιον, "Ye have killed the Just One, and before him the prophets." But against this interpretation it is objected by Esthius, (1.) That the apostle here speaks by way of distinction to the rich, who dragged the Christians before the tribunals; whereas the death of Christ is imputed to the princes and rulers of the Jews, and to the people in general, Acts iii. 14, vii. 52, xiii. 27, 28. (2.) It is said in the present tense, "And he doth not resist you;" whereas, had this been spoken of Christ, it should have been said, "He did not resist you:" and therefore Œcumenius doth acknowledge this is to be extended also to all those just men, Stephen, and others who suffered in like manner from the Jews, according to our Lord's prediction, Matt. xxiv. 9, and Paul's confession, that before his conversion he "persecuted this way unto the death," Acts xxii. 4. Hence this passage is connected to the ensuing words directed to the Christians in general, by this particle, "therefore."

[7] Ver. 7. The husbandman waiteth, &c.] So the Targum of Jonathan on 2 Sam. xxiii. 4 compareth those who expect "the years of consolation" to the husbandman, who in a year of drought waiteth for rain upon the earth (see the text defended, Examen Millii).

[8] Ver. 8. Ἡ παρουσία τοῦ Κυρίου ἤγγικε, The coming of the Lord is at hand.] He speaks, saith Œcumenius,† "of the coming of the Romans to captivate the Jews, which he calls The coming of our Lord;" as John does, ch. xxi. xxii. And this exposition is confirmed, (1.) from the constant use of the like phrase, ἐγγὺς ἡμέρα Κυρίου, "The day of the Lord is at hand," Isa. xiii. 6, Ezek. xxx. 3, Joel i. 15, ii. 1, iii. 14, Obad. ver. 15, Zeph. i. 7. 14. From the evils which he saith are coming on the rich, ver. 1, and which then especially came upon them. (2.) From his saying, This coming "is at hand," and "The Judge standeth at the door" (ver. 9), or in Peter's phrase, τὸ τέλος ἤγγικε, "The end is at hand" (1 Pet. iv. 7), which answers exactly to the words of Christ, touching the destruction of Jerusalem, "Then shall τὸ τέλος, the end come" (Matt. xxiv. 14); "It is near, ἐπὶ θύραις, even at the door" (ver. 33); "Her desolation, ἤγγικε, draweth nigh" (Luke xxi. 20, see note on Phil. iv. 5). And this was a true ground for patience, and answers the objection of Esthius against this exposition.

[9] Ver. 9. Μὴ στενάζετε, Groan not.] These groanings in the scripture have a voice and cry; and God is said to hear them. Thus "the children of Israel groaned, by reason of their hard bondage, κατεστέναξαν· and their cry came up to God" (Exod. ii. 23): and the Spirit is said to intercede in Christ's suffering members, "with groans unuttered" (Rom. viii. 26). Thus David prays that God would "hear the voice of his groanings," and "the groanings of the prisoners" (Ps. cii. 5. 20). These groanings, when they are only the natural issues of an afflicted soul, move God to pity (Judg. ii. 18), and to remember us in mercy (Exod. vi. 5); but when they are the fruits of impatience under troubles, and a desire of revenge upon our enemies, they tend to our condemnation; and the persecuting Jews, being of the same stock with the converted Jews, their groaning against them is styled "groaning against one another."

It is the observation of Justin,* that the converts among the gentiles were not only more than those among the Jews and the Samaritans, but also that they were better Christians, and more truly so; for these Jewish converts were still leavened with an expectation of a temporal kingdom, and of liberty from the Roman yoke, and the dominion over all heathen governors. Whence the apostles do so frequently enjoin them to be "subject to the higher powers" (Rom. xiii. 1), to be "subject to principalities and powers" (Tit. iii. 1), to be "subject to every human ordinance," and "not use the liberty to which they were called as a cloak of maliciousness (1 Pet. ii. 13. 16. Now these, as Dr. Hammond well observes, lived intermixed with the unconverted Jews and zealots, who were still grudging and contending against all that would not stand up for liberty and fight for this temporal kingdom, "accounting them no better than the very heathens,"† on that account: and these may be the grudgers here intended.

[10] Ver. 11. The patience of Job.] Hence may we very probably conclude, that what is written in the book of Job is truly a history of what happened to him: and not, as some conceive, a parable or fiction of a thing not truly done: for feigned things contain no serious motives to, nor just examples of patience. (2.) We find this holy man numbered with Noah and Daniel, as persons very prevalent in prayer, Ezek. xiv. 14. 20. As therefore Noah and Daniel were persons truly prevalent in their supplications, Gen. viii. 21, Dan. ix. 23, so also Job must be, as he is represented, xliii. 8. 10.

[11] Ver. 12. Μὴ ὀμνύετε, Swear not.] i. e. Let not your afflictions move you to use rash oaths, as men are wont to do when much provoked. That rash oaths only are forbidden here, and Matt. v. 34, see the note there: the oaths here forbidden being such as our impatience under sufferings and our unbridled passions do produce; or else the oaths forbidden here may be illusive oaths, viz. such as the Jews were free to use, because they thought they did not bind (see note on Matt. ix. 34), and so were free to make, to purchase their deliverance.

[12] "Ινα μὴ ὑπὸ κρίσιν πέσητε, That ye fall not into condemnation.] Some copies read εἰς ὑπόκρισιν, "into hypocrisy:" but, (1.) this reading is not found in many copies. (2.) The apostle, ver. 9, puts them in mind of "the Judge standing at the door," requiring them not to "grudge against one another, lest they be condemned" by him; it is therefore far more probable he speaketh also here of condemnation by the judge. (3.) To be false to the oath of God is perjury in the proper sense, for which God threatens he "will not hold the offender guiltless," but is not properly hypocrisy. If therefore this had been the meaning of James, Swear not, lest you be tempted to the violation of your oaths; he should have called that perjury, not hypocrisy.

[13] Ver. 14. Προσκαλεσάσθω τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους τῆς ἐκκλησίας, The elders of the church.] That it was the office of the presbyters, ἐπισκέπτεσθαι πάντας ἀσθενεῖς, "to visit all the sick," we learn from the Epistle of Polycarp, ad Philip. §. 6. But that these presbyters should be bishops properly so called, as some conceive, seems not very probable; for then it must not only be the office of the bishop personally to visit the sick, but the duty of every sick person to send to him, and to no other. Yea, there must be more than one bishop in the church of which the sick man is a member, and he must be obliged to send to more; for the text runs wholly in the plural, "Let him call for the elders of the church, καὶ προσευξάσθωσαν, and let them" (not one of them) "pray over him;" and therefore the sick man must be obliged, by this text, to call for more than one of them, where more were to be had, as we know there were in the primitive constitution of the church.

[14] Anointing him with oil.] This was agreeable to the practice of the Jews,* who anointed the sick, pro more, customarily, saith their tradition: hence, though our Lord only commissionated his disciples to "heal the sick," Matt. x. 8, Luke ix. 2, yet Mark informs us that they added their usual ceremonies in doing this, for they "anointed many that were sick with oil, and healed them" (Mark vi. 13); and James, speaking to the elders of the Jews, bids them use this unction "in the name of the Lord," as doubtless the apostles did; as in casting out of devils, Luke x. 17, so in healing the sick, Acts iii. 16, iv. 10. 30, and this addition made the cure miraculous.

[15] Ver. 15. Ἡ εὐχὴ τῆς πίστεως, And the prayer of faith shall save the sick.] Among the χαρίσματα, or the miraculous and extraordinary gifts, vouchsafed at first to the preachers of the gospel, and to the rulers or elders of the churches, was "the gift of faith," as in these words, "To another is given faith by the same Spirit," 1 Cor. xii. 9, i. e. by a strong impulse of the Spirit, fully persuading them that God would enable them to do this or that. This seems to be that faith which is styled πίστις Θεοῦ, "the faith of God," to which even the removing of mountains, or the performing things most difficult and extraordinary, is promised, Mark xi. 22, 23, Matt. xxi. 21, and of which the apostle speaks, saying, "If I had all faith so as to remove mountains," 1 Cor. xiii. 2; and by which they healed the sick, "even by faith in his name," Acts iii. 16: and therefore this is here promised, that where the prayer of the elders was attended with such a faith, it should still be successful for the healing of the sick, or the raising him up again from the bed of sickness; for σώσει, "will save," is ἐγερεῖ, "he will raise him up."

[16] And if he hath committed sins.] i. e. Such sins for which God was pleased to inflict this bodily disease upon him, as he did on the members of the church of Corinth, for their disorderly celebrating the Lord's supper; "for which cause," saith the apostle, "many are weak and sickly among you" (1 Cor. xi. 30), they being thus "chastened of the Lord" (ver. 32); and where the sickness is by way of chastisement, the healing it is a testimony of God's forgiveness of it. Hence, "Thy sins be forgiven," is our Lord's usual expression when he healed the sick (Matt. ix. 2. 6, 7; see the note there), according to those words of the prophet Isaiah, "The inhabitants shall not say they are sick, the people shall be forgiven their iniquity" (xxxiii. 24). Hence it is evident that here is no foundation for the sacrament of extreme unction, called by the Romish church "the sacrament of the dying," and administered for the purgation of their sins when they seem past hopes of recovery; for how can they gather a sacrament of extreme unction from an unction that is not extreme, or a perpetual ordinance from an action that was extraordinary and miraculous, and is long since ceased? how can they prove a sacrament that is proper to dying persons, from a rite used only upon persons who were not to die, but to be raised up from sickness? or promise to him forgiveness of his sins, to whom they cannot promise that recovery which was the token of it? Moreover, the things already observed afford us a sufficient answer to the objections of Esthius against our exposition, which are these:

Obj. 1. First, That the grace of miracles extended not to spiritual effects, as the forgiveness of sins, but to temporal.

Ans. This is said in flat contradiction to our Lord, who doth so often preface his miraculous cures of the sick with this expression, "Thy sins are forgiven thee," Matt. ix. 2. Nor was this forgiveness so much a spiritual effect as temporal, it being only the remission of a temporal punishment of sin, viz. sickness inflicted for it.

Obj. 2. Had the apostle spoke of miraculous cures, he would only have advised them to call those who had the gift of healing, whether presbyters or not; not the presbyters, and them only.

Ans. He reasonably adviseth to call them, and them only, to pray over the sick, who were by office appointed for that work, and doth here only tell them what they might expect from it, when that miraculous faith was raised in them which often, in those times of miracles, accompanied their prayers.

Obj. 3. The apostle speaks of a sick Christian brother to be anointed by a faithful presbyter, whereas the use of miracles was chiefly for converting infidels: and hence this unction was not used towards Trophimus, left at Miletum sick (2 Tim. iv. 20), or to Epaphroditus, sick near unto death (Phil. ii. 27).

Ans. If it were not used by Paul to them, and especially to Epaphroditus, it is certain that he knew nothing of this sacrament. (2.) Esthius has no cause to assert that of miracles in general, which the apostle saith only of the gift of tongues, that they were only for unbelievers; the gift of healing, for aught he knows to the contrary, might be still exercised upon believers, but only under the conduct of the Spirit raising up this miraculous faith, which assured them of it in respect to some, and not to others, as he saw fit (see note on Phil. ii. 27).

Obj. 4. That had the apostle intended miraculous healing, oil had not been prescribed; Christ having said they should "lay their hands on the sick" only, Mark xvi. 18.

Ans. One ceremony excludes not the other; moreover, laying on of hands is there prescribed in preaching to the gentiles, anointing with oil here to the Jews, as being customary in case of sickness.

Obj. 5. All the other things delivered in this epistle belong to the Christians of all ages; this therefore must do so too.

Ans. As if this hindered the apostles, as they had occasion, to give rules touching the spiritual gifts proper to their own times; that, when they spake of other matters not to cease, their precepts reach unto all times. Peter, in his following epistle, hath one direction concerning those spiritual and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The [17] effectual fervent (Gr. the inspired) prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

17 Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain: and it rained not on the earth by the space of [18] three years and six months.

18 And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit.

gifts, 1 Pet. iv. 10, 11, though the other precepts contained in that epistle do concern all ages.

[17] Ver. 16. Δέησις ἐνεργουμένη, The inspired prayer.] As they who were inwardly acted by an evil spirit were styled ἐνεργούμενοι, so they that were acted by the Holy Spirit, and inwardly moved by his impulses, were also ἐνεργούμενοι, in the good sense; and therefore it seems most proper to apply these words, not to the prayer of every righteous person, but to the prayer offered by such an extraordinary impulse: not only from the force of this expression, but, (2.) from the same thing here mentioned as the subject of this prayer, that our sick brother may be healed, which was to be done by the prayer of faith (ver. 15). (3.) From the example of Elias, for his prayer was the prayer of faith in the sense now mentioned; for he absolutely foretold, and confirmed it with an oath, that there "should be no rain those years, but according to his word," 1 Kings xvii. 1. And his prayer for rain was upon God's promise to "send rain upon the earth," xviii. 1.

[18] Ver. 17. Three years and six months.] So Luke iv. 35. When therefore it is said, that "Elijah came to Ahab the third year, and the Lord said, I will send rain upon the earth;" note, that Elias tarried before a year at the brook Kerith, and then in the middle of the third year came to Ahab.

[19] Ver. 20. Shall hide, &c.] This seemeth to be meant, not of the sins of the person thus converted (for the saving of his soul includes the remission of his sins), but of the sins of him that converts him; i. e. this charitable work shall be so pleasing to God, as to prevail with him to cover many of his own sins.

THE FIRST

EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. PETER,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

Concerning this epistle, allowed by the church of all ages to be the genuine work of the apostle Peter, it may be inquired, 1. When? 2. Whence? 3. To whom? 4. On what account, it was written? And,

Quest. 1. First, Whereas it is ordinarily affirmed by the Romanists, that this epistle was written in the forty-fourth year of Christ; as that opinion seems to have been taken up by them in favour of their avowed tenet, that Peter was twenty-five years in that see; and therefore, he dying in the year of our Lord 69, must have come thither in the year 44; so is it easily confuted, both from this epistle, and by many other cogent arguments.

1. From these words of this epistle, iv. 8, τὸ τέλος πάντων ἤγγικε, "The end of all things is at hand:" that is, saith Dr. Hammond, who also follows this opinion, "The great and fatal destruction to the obdurate Jews, so often spoken of by Christ and his apostles, is now near at hand." Which could not have been said in the forty-fourth year of Christ, that is, about twenty-six years before it happened; seeing the apostle Paul, in his Second Epistle to the Thessalonians (writ, saith the reverend Dr. Hammond, A. D. 51), warneth the Thessalonians "not to be shaken by any word or epistle, as coming from" the apostles, which intimated that "the coming of the Lord was at hand;" and so he must have contradicted Peter, had he delivered this positively seven years before. (2.) The apostle James hath the like expressions, saying, ἡ παρουσία τοῦ Κυρίου ἤγγικε, "The coming of the Lord draweth near," v. 8, "Behold the Judge stands πρὸ τῶν θυρῶν, before the door." Whence Dr. Hammond and Dr. Lightfoot well conclude, that this epistle could not be written long before the death of James, which happened in the year 63. And this argument concludes as strongly for this epistle's being indited after the same time. Add to this, that these expressions, τέλος, ἡ παρουσία τοῦ Κυρίου ἤγγικε, "The end, the coming of the Lord is at hand," and, πρὸ τῶν θυρῶν, "before the door," are plainly taken from our Saviour's words, in his prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem; where also the time is fixed by two remarkable characters: (1.) "When you shall see Jerusalem compassed about with armies, then know ye, ὅτι ἤγγικεν ἐρήμωσις αὐτῆς, that her desolation draweth near," Luke xxi. 20: that is, saith Dr. Hammond, "When you see Jerusalem besieged by the Romans, then know the destruction of the city is near." Now this happened not at all till the twelfth of Nero, and the sixty-sixth year of our Lord, when Cestius* besieged Jerusalem: it happened not, say the best interpreters, according to the words of the evangelist, till the year 68, when Vespasian coming thither, his army† compassed the city round about. "These," saith Luke, "are the days of vengeance, when all things which are written shall be fulfilled," ver. 22; and "then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds," ver. 27. Again, our Lord having foretold all the signs of his coming, καὶ τῆς συντελείας, and of the end of the Jewish age, adds, "When you shall see all these things come to pass, then know that this desolation, ἐγγύς ἐστιν ἐπὶ θύραις, is nigh, even at the door," Matt. xxiv. 33, Mark xiii. 29, clearly showing that phrase importeth still a nearer approach of that great desolation.

Secondly, That Peter was not at Rome, nor departed from Judea, till a long time after the forty-fourth year of Christ, is so evident from the history of the Acts, and the epistles of Paul, that he that runs may read it. For, that Luke, in a history designed especially to record the acts of Peter and Paul, should omit a matter of such vast moment and importance to the whole Christian world, happening within that very time in which he speaketh of Peter: that, saying of him, xii. 17, "He departed, and went to another place;" he should not say, as Bellarmine and Baronius, that place was Rome, but, in flat contradiction to them, that "he went down from Judea to Cæsarea, and there abode;" ver. 19; that he should tell us how Aquila and Priscilla came from Italy, because Claudius had commanded that all the Jews should depart from Rome; but should not tell us, as they do, that Peter came thence to Jerusalem on the same account, and therefore was found present at the council of Jerusalem about six years after; but speak of him there, as if he never had left Jerusalem: that in this council he should urge, against the necessity of imposing circumcision on the gentiles, only the example of Cornelius and his kinsmen, converted and not circumcised; and say not one word of the church of Rome, the seat of all spiritual power and infallibility, and to which all other churches were to veil, and do homage, converted by him in like manner, and free also from the yoke of circumcision: nay, that he should not mention that ever he was there, in a history continued till the fifth of Nero, though he mentions his travels to, his preaching and abode at, several other places: these, sure, are things sufficient to convince all unprejudiced persons, that Peter was not then at Rome.

Thirdly, The same may strongly be concluded from the epistles of Paul. For about the year 57, saith Bishop Pearson, he writ his Epistle to the Romans, in which he spends the greatest part of one chapter in saluting particular persons that were there: but yet we find no salutation to Peter, who, had he been then at Rome, would doubtless have been mentioned in the first place; and yet, in so large an epistle, he neither is directly nor indirectly taken notice of. Moreover, Paul himself, in the beginning, intimates his earnest desire to come thither, that he might "impart unto them some spiritual gifts, to the end they might be established" in the faith; for which there could be no apparent cause, had the apostle Peter been there so long before him. Paul himself soon after comes to Rome; which, when the brethren heard of, they "came to meet him, as far as Appii Forum," Acts xxviii. 15; but not a word of Peter either coming or sending to him. When he is come, he goes not to sojourn with, or so much as to salute Peter (which sure he would have done, if he had been there), but dwells in his own hired house. Being come, he calls the chief of the Jews together, who desire to hear of him what he thought of the sect of the Christians, they knowing this only of it, that "it was every where spoken against," ver. 22. What then had Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, been doing all this while among them? And how unlikely is it that there should be then, as Dr. Hammond* saith, a church consisting much of the Jews residing there? And how reflecting on the supposed labours of Peter, among the Jews there, are the following words, ver. 26—28, that "because they would not hear, or be converted, he would not leave them to St. Peter, but turn unto the gentiles," who would hear? After his coming to Rome, he writes epistles to several churches, to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and one to Philemon; in which two last we have sent from Rome the salutation of Aristarchus, Marcus, Justus, Epaphras, Luke, and Demas, Col. iv. 10. 14, Philem. ver. 23, 24, but not a word from Peter. In that to the Colossians, he tells them, he had no other helpers, or fellow-workers, unto the kingdom of God, among the Jews, which had been a comfort to him, but Aristarchus, Marcus, and Justus, iv. 10, 11, which evidently excludes Peter. In his Epistle to Timothy, he saith, that at his first answer to Rome, "all men forsook him," 2 Tim. iv. 16, which we can hardly believe, had Peter been there. He adds, that "only Luke was with him;" that Crescens was gone to this place, Titus to that, and Tychicus was left at another. Strange therefore it is, that if Peter was then gone from Rome, Paul should take no notice of it. Was he a person so inconsiderable, as not to deserve to be remembered? Or was he gone upon a sleeveless errand, not worthy of the notice of Paul? Or was he not rather one who, being not at Rome, could give Paul no reason to take notice of him, when he writ from thence? But this subject is so fully handled, and the hypothesis of Baronius so learnedly confuted by Dr. Cave,* that it is superfluous to insist longer on this subject.

Quest. 2. To the second inquiry, Whence this epistle was indited? I have returned a sufficient answer in the note upon these words, v. 13, "The church which is at Babylon saluteth you;" by showing that by Babylon Rome is to be understood; whence this epistle must be therefore written: and then it must be written after the persecution in the tenth of Nero, at which time neither Paul nor Peter was at Rome.

Quest. 3. That it was written to the Jews dispersed through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia (Minor), and Bithynia, the inscription† shows; but that it must be also written either to the gentiles proselyted to the Jewish religion, of whom see the note on 1 Pet. i. 1, or to the converts of the twelve tribes scattered among the heathens, and there serving their gods, according to the threat denounced upon them, Deut. xxviii. 36. 64, that they "should serve other gods, which neither they nor their fathers had known," seems evident from these words, that they were "delivered from their vain conversation, delivered to them from their fathers," i. 18 (see the note there): that, "in times past they were not the people, but now are the people of God: that they had not obtained mercy, but now had obtained mercy," ii. 10; which words were spoken of the ten tribes, Hos. i. 10, ii. 23, and that the time past might suffice them to have done the will of the gentiles, when they "walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries," iv. 3.

To imagine that the apostle is here speaking of "the dispersion," mentioned Acts viii. 1, is to speak what is very improbable, they being dispersed only into the countries of Judea and Samaria, saith the text there: nor is it said that any travelled farther than Phœnice, Cyprus, and Antioch, xi. 19. Nor is it likely that many of them travelled so far, for the churches of Judea and Samaria having peace soon after this dispersion, Acts ix. 31, that any of them went to all or any of the places here mentioned by Peter, we have no reason to imagine; but that there was long before a great dispersion of the Jews throughout these parts of Asia, see the note on James i. 1.

Lastly, Upon what account this epistle was written, we may best learn from the epistle itself; which informs us, first, that it was written to encourage them to persevere, and to continue constant under these "manifold temptations," i. 6, those "fiery trials," iv. 12, and "persecutions," ii. 3—5, they were then subject to. Secondly, to preserve them from being concerned in the Jewish wars, or bearing any part in that rebellion against Cæsar and his officers, which was then beginning among the Jews, ch. ii. from ver. 12 to 23, and iii. 16—18. And, thirdly, to engage them to lead a Christian conversation, that so they might bring over others to the Christian faith, ii. 12, iii. 1, and might stop the mouths of those who spake against them as evil-doers," iii. 16.

CHAPTER I.

1 PETER, an apostle of Jesus Christ, (writeth) to the [1] strangers [2] scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia (Minor), and Bithynia,

2 (That is, to those of them who are) [3] Elect [4] according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, [5] through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and (to the) [6] sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ: (wishing that) grace unto you, and peace, (may) be multiplied.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, [7] which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a [8] lively (Gr. living) hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead,

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Παρεπιδήμοις, To the strangers.] He writes especially to the dispersion of the Jews, to whom the word "strangers," or foreigners, here chiefly doth belong; but not to them only, for he speaks to them also who in time past had "walked according to the will of the gentiles, in abominable idolatries" (iv. 3), and of them who "formerly were not the people of God, and had not found mercy:" we therefore are to understand, that among them were many devout Greeks and proselytes of the gentiles, converted with them to the Christian faith. Thus, when Paul and Barnabas preached in the synagogue of the Jews at Iconium, "a great multitude both of Jews and Greeks believed" (Acts xiv. 1): and Paul preaching at Ephesus, and thereabouts, two years, prevailed so, "that all that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks" (Acts xix. 10, see xvii. 4. 12, xviii. 4). In the Acts of the Apostles, we read of proselytes of all nations. They were reckoned, in the days of David and Solomon, one hundred and fifty-three thousand six hundred persons (2 Chron. ii. 17). In the days of Artaxerxes, we are told, that πολλοὶ τῶν ἐθνῶν περιετέμνοντο, καὶ Ἰουδάϊζον, "many of the heathens were circumcised, and turned Jews" (Esth. viii. 17). And so it was also in the succeeding ages; for Josephus* informs us, that after the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, "the Jews, in Antioch and other places, always converting to their worship a great many Greeks, made them, as it were, a part of themselves:" and at Damascus,† he saith, "They would have destroyed the Jews among them, but that they feared their own wives, who all, except some few, were converts to the religion of the Jews."

[2] Διασπορᾶς, Of the dispersion,] i. e. Dispersed through Pontus, &c. The apostle speaks not of the dispersion made by the persecution, mentioned Acts viii. 1; for that scattered the Christians only through Judea and Samaria (ibid): nor were they afterward dispersed farther, by the malice of the Jews, but went themselves to preach the word, not in Asia, but in the parts of Syria, in Phœnice, Cyprus, and Antioch (Acts xi. 19). Of their dispersion thence into Asia we read not one word; but that there were great dispersions before of the Jews through the places here mentioned, from the time of the captivity under Shalmaneser, we learn from Agrippa's‡ address to Caius, where he informs him, that "they possessed most parts of Asia, to the utmost borders of Bithynia and Pontus."

[3] Ver. 2. Ἐκλεκτοῖς, Elect.] i. e. To the converted Jews, styled "the elect," Matt. xxiv. 22 (see the note on ii. 9). So also Œcumenius interprets these words, "to the elect," that is, τοῖς ἀφωρισμένοις ἐκ τῶν ἄλλων ἐθνῶν εἶναι λαὸν περιούσιον, "to them that are separated from other nations, to be his holy and peculiar people."

[4] Κατὰ πρόγνωσιν, According to the foreknowledge of God,] Discovered in the prophetical writings, which foretold of these blessings to be conveyed to them by the Messiah, who also is said to be foreknown before the foundation of the world; i. e. prophesied of from the beginning (Gen. iii. 15), but manifested in the last times for them (ver. 20).

[5] Ἐν ἁγιασμῷ, Through sanctification of the Spirit,] The great principle of all true obedience: so, ver. 22, "Having sanctified your souls, or lives, to the obedience of the truth through the Spirit.

[6] Καὶ ῥαντισμόν, And sprinkling of the blood of Jesus.] By way of obsignation of that covenant, by which we are engaged to that obedience: for so it was in the delivery of the old law; for upon the reading of that covenant in the audience of all the people, and upon their professing, "All that the Lord hath said, we will do, and be obedient," Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it upon the people, and said, "Behold the blood of the covenant which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words," Exod. xxiv. 7, 8 (so Dr. Hammond). Or to that sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ which "cleanseth us from all sin" (1 John i. 7); i. e. from all the sinful imperfections which cleave to our obedience, and by which the full pardon of our past sins is procured, and we obtain an entrance into the holy of holies (Heb. x. 19, 20), and which procures for us, not only acceptance upon earth, but "an inheritance in heaven" (Heb. ix. 15, xii. 24); whence this blood is styled, αἷμα ῥαντισμοῦ, "the blood of sprinkling," Heb. xii. 24. And of Christ it is said, "He shall sprinkle many nations," Isa. lii. 15.

[7] Ver. 3. Ὁ Θεὸς καὶ πατὴρ, The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.] Here, saith Schlictingius, as formerly the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, distinguisheth the one true God from any other; so now this phrase distinguisheth him who is called his "God and Father," from Jesus Christ. But yet the primitive fathers* thought otherwise; for they stiffly maintained, against the Gnostics, who held there was another God above the God of Abraham, &c. or the God of the Jews, that "he was the God and Father of all," supra quem non est alius; and yet, that Jesus Christ was God, as being "in the Father from all eternity, and receiving the divine nature from him."

[8] Εἰς ἐλπίδα ζῶσαν, To a living hope.] Either a hope that giveth life, as ὕδωρ ζῶν, "living water," John iv. 10, 11. 14; ὁ ἄρτος ὁ ζῶν, "the living bread which came down from heaven; of which if a man eat, he shall live for ever," John vi. 51, vii. 38; λόγια ζῶντα, "the living oracles," Acts vii. 38, which if a man observe, saith Moses, "he shall live by them," Lev. xviii. 4; ὁδὸς ζῶσα, "a living way," Heb. x. 20, as leading to life eternal; and ζωῆς πηγαί, "living fountains of waters," Rev. vii. 17; for "by hope we are saved," Rom. viii. 24: or a hope that makes us active and lively, joyful and comfortable in our lives, "rejoicing in hope of the glory of God," Rom. v. 2; in which sense it is said of the word of God, that it is ζῶν καὶ ἐνεργὴς, "living and active," Heb. iv. 12; of the members of Christ's spiritual house that they are λίθοι ζῶντες, i. e. "living stones," 1 Pet. ii. 5; and we are bid to offer our bodies, θυσίαν ζῶσαν, "a living sacrifice," Rom. xii. 1. Hence it seems to follow, that the Jews before had not this "lively hope" which our Lord's resurrection ministers.

[9] Ver. 4. Ἀμίαντον, Undefiled.] The land, in which men who are sinners dwell on earth, is said to be defiled by their sins, Lev. xviii. 28, Numb. v. 3, xxxv. 34, Deut. xxi. 23, Isa. xxiv. 5, Jer. ii. 7, xvi. 18; heaven, into which no unclean thing can enter, being the only inheritance undefiled. Œcumenius hence observes, first, that this therefore was not such a hope as that which was contained in the law of Moses, ἥτις ⸀σκηνῇ, ⸀σκηνοῖς ἐπαγγέλεται ⸀σκηνῇ, "a dying hope, which promised dying things to mortal men:" secondly, that if this inheritance be in heaven, μυθώδης ἡ χιλιοέτης ἀποκατάστασις, "the opinion of the millenaries must be fabulous."

[10] Ver. 5. Ἐν δυνάμει Θεοῦ φρουρουμένους διὰ πίστεως, Who are kept by the power of God through faith.] Not that all who have true faith are kept by the power of God, so as that they shall certainly continue in the faith; but that they shall be thus preserved, "if they continue in the faith, rooted and settled, and are not removed from the hope of the gospel" (Col. i. 23): "if they hold the beginning of their confidence firm unto the end" (Heb. iii. 4). This place therefore only proves, first, that all who are preserved to salvation are preserved by God, but not that all true believers will be certainly so kept. Secondly, this place proves only, that they who are thus preserved, are kept through faith, i. e. "if they hold the beginning of their confidence firm to the end" (Heb. v. 14). For this faith, thus continued in them, will render them victorious over the world (1 John v. 4). It will enable them to "resist the devil" so effectually, that "he shall fly from them" (1 Pet. v. 9), and to "quench all the fiery darts of Satan" (Eph. vi. 16), and to "suffer death, not accepting a deliverance, that they may obtain a better resurrection." But this place does not prove that all, who are once true believers, shall certainly continue in the faith, and never make shipwreck of the faith, as did Hymenæus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 19); never have their faith overturned, as some had, 2 Tim. ii. 10, never "draw back to perdition," as the apostle supposeth some might do, Heb. x. 38, 39.

[11] Εἰς σωτηρίαν ἑτοίμην ἀποκαλυφθῆναι ἐν καιρῷ ⸀ἐσχάτῳ, The salvation ready to be revealed in the last time.] i. e. Say some, the deliverance ready to be vouchsafed to the Christians, at the destruction of the church and polity of Jerusalem; this being the salvation then ready to be revealed. But this seems not very probable: first, because in this salvation Christians are said to "rejoice greatly," or, to "exult for joy" (ver. 6); which it becomes not them to do for temporal, but for spiritual blessings. Secondly, because it is the salvation, not of our bodies, but our souls, even that salvation which is "the end of our faith," ver. 9 (see the note there). To the argument produced for the other sense from the words,

I answer, First, That though "the last times" and "days," in the plural, do mostly signify the times of the gospel dispensation, concurring with the last times of the Jewish state; yet "the last time," or "day," in the singular, often signifies the time of the resurrection, or the last judgment, especially when it is joined with the resurrection of the body, mentioned here, ver. 3. So, John vi. 39, "I will raise him up, ἐν τῇ ⸀ἐσχάτῃ ἡμέρᾳ, in the last day" (see ver. 40. 44, 45); xi. 24, "I know that he shall rise in the last day;" and, xii. 48, "The word that I have spoken shall judge him in the last day."

Secondly, As there is mention of a double revelation of Jesus Christ; one, when he appeared as a prophet to the world, styled usually φανέρωσις, "the manifestation of Jesus Christ;" another at the day of judgment, styled ἀποκάλυψις, "the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. i. 7; "the revelation of Jesus Christ from heaven," 2 Thess. i. 7; his "glorious revelation," 1 Pet. iv. 13; and here emphatically, "the revelation of Christ," ver. 7. 13; so is there a double revelation of the salvation promised in the gospel; one by the preaching of the gospel, which "brought life and salvation to light," 2 Tim. i. 10, and a farther revelation of it to be made hereafter, "when Christ who is our life shall appear," Col. iii. 3, 4, 1 John iii. 2; styled, "the glory ready to be revealed, when the great Shepherd shall appear," 1 Pet. v. 4; "the glory ready to be revealed at the redemption of our bodies," Rom. viii. 18. 23; to which this passage may refer.

[12] Ver. 6. Εἰ δέον ἐστὶ, If need be.] This is great consolation under all the afflictions of God's servants, that they then only shall befall them, when God sees them needful for the promotion of his glory, or for the furtherance of our salvation; as when they tend to make us partakers of his holiness, and to work in us the comfortable fruits of righteousness (Heb. xii. 10, 11), or "work for us an exceeding and eternal weight of glory" (2 Cor. iv. 17), by conforming us to him in sufferings, to whom we shall be like in glory (1 Pet. iv. 13, Rom. viii. 17, 2 Tim. ii. 11).

[13] Ver. 7. Διὰ πυρὸς ⸀δοκιμαζομένου.] Proved to be genuine by the fire it endures; as your faith is, by patiently enduring fiery trials (see note on iv. 12).

[14] Ver. 8. Ὃν οὐκ εἰδότες.] If this reading be true, it is most proper to translate the words thus, "Whom having not known;" if ὃν οὐκ ἰδόντες, as other copies have it, and all the versions do translate it, be the true reading, then our translation is right.

[15] Ver. 9. Σωτηρίαν ψυχῶν.] "The preservation of your lives;" so Dr. Hammond. But there is no ὑμῶν in the Greek, to answer to the word "your," in the English; and the salvation of lives seems not so properly assigned as the end of our faith, as the salvation of souls; as we may learn also from the following words:

[16] Ver. 11. Εἰς τίνα ἢ ποῖον καιρὸν, What, or what manner of time.] The particle εἰς is oft redundant (see Nold. p. 66, 67, 464). Or it may be here rendered de, "of what time?" as 2 Cor. xii. 6, "Let no man think, εἰς ἐμὲ, of me more than he ought to think;" Eph. v. 32, "I speak, εἰς Χριστὸν, καὶ εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, of Christ and the church;" Acts ii. 25, "David spake εἰς αὐτὸν, of him." So Acts xxv. 20, Heb. vii. 14, εἰς ἣν φυλὴν, "Of which tribe." They testified of his sufferings, saith Œcumenius, in those words of Isaiah, "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter."

[17] Τὸ ἐν αὐτοῖς Πνεῦμα Χριστοῦ, The Spirit of Christ which was in them.] That is, say the Socinians, the Spirit in them, which spake of Christ as the word of life and salvation, is the word which speaks of life and of salvation. But in this sense he might as well have been styled the spirit of antichrist or the false prophets, because he also spake of them. All the ancients agree in the other sense, That Christ* spake by his to what time he did relate), when it testified beforehand [18] the sufferings of Christ (in himself and his members), and the glory that should follow (them, Dan. ix. 21).

12 Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister the (same) things, which are now reported (or have been declared) unto you by them that have preached the gospel unto you [19] with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; which things the [20] angels desire to look into.

13 [21] Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober (Gr. vigilant), and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought (Gr. that is brought) unto you at (by) the revelation of Jesus Christ (who hath brought life and immortality to light by the gospel, 2 Tim. i. 10);

14 As (it becometh) obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts (ye practised) in your ignorance:

15 But as he (God the Father, ver. 17) which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation;

16 Because it is written (thus), Be ye holy; for [22] I (the Lord your God) am holy (Lev. xi. 44, xix. 2).

17 [23] And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear (of condemnation from this impartial Judge at that day):

18 Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, (such) as (are) silver and gold (such as the Jews brought up to Jerusalem to buy their offerings), [24] from (the demerit of) your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers;

19 But with the precious blood of Christ (who was delivered up to death for you), as of [25] a lamb without blemish and without spot:

Spirit in the prophets, "they being inspired with his grace, and taught by his Spirit, their words proceeded from the divine word moving them, and by him they prophesied; he spake in Isaiah, in Elias, and in the mouth of the prophets." So the fathers.

[18] Τὰ εἰς Χριστὸν παθήματα, The sufferings of Christ.] Not only in himself, but in his members, and the glories which should be after, as well to them, as to their Saviour (Rom. viii. 18, 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12, 1 Pet. iv. 13), as appears from i. 13, where this glory is styled, "the grace to be brought to us at the revelation of Jesus Christ."

[19] Ver. 12. Ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ, By the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven.] Hence it is evident, that the apostles, in all those writings in which they declared the gospel of Christ, were Θεόπνευστοι, "men assisted by the Holy Ghost;" and that they, in preaching and inditing the gospel, were acted by the same Spirit who moved formerly the prophets (see the general preface).

[20] Παρακύψαι, Angels desire to look into.] And shall holy prophets be so desirous to know the time when these things should happen, and holy angels so diligent to look into these glorious revelations; and shall we, to whom, and for whose happiness, this gospel was revealed, neglect not only to obtain, but even to know this great salvation? Some refer this to Dan. viii. 13.

[21] Ver. 13.] Note, that from this and the foregoing verse, we have several arguments to prove these things relate not to the temporal deliverance of Christians from the persecution of the Jews, but to their deliverance from the guilt of sin by the blood of Christ (ver. 19), and that eternal deliverance which is the object of the Christian's hope. For, (1.) that cannot properly be styled "the grace which is to come to us by the revelation of Jesus Christ," that being "the grace which brings salvation," Tit. ii. 11. 13. (2.) That was not the thing which they, who preached the gospel, did ἀναγγέλλειν ἡμῖν, "declare unto us;" but, as John informs us, they did, ἀναγγέλλειν ζωὴν αἰώνιον, "show unto us eternal life," 1 John i. 2. (3.) They could not be the things the angels did desire to look into. (4.) The motive to perseverance to the end, is not a temporal deliverance from the Jews, but a spiritual and eternal deliverance (Rom. viii. 18, 2 Cor. iv. 17, Heb. x. 35, 36).

[22] Ver. 16. Ἐγὼ ἅγιός εἰμι.] The holiness of God, in scripture, hath respect to a double object, viz. sin; and so it doth import his perfect freedom from, his hatred of, and opposition to, all impiety. (1.) His entire freedom from all impurity; for "God is light," saith the apostle, "and in him is no darkness at all," 1 John i. 5; "He is a just God, and without iniquity," Deut. xxxii. 4; a God "of purer eyes than to behold evil," Hab. i. 13, i. e. without the greatest detestation. (2.) His perfect hatred of it; whence he is said to loathe, detest, and to abhor it, and the workers of it; and it is styled, "the abominable thing which his soul hateth," Jer. xliv. 4. And since God's nature is immutable, his holiness unchangeable, he must for ever hate, with a most perfect hatred, whatsoever is unholy and impure; and to suppose an interruption in his hatred of evil-doers, is to suppose he can cease to be a pure and holy God. And, (3.) from this hatred naturally flows a just assurance of his opposition to all impiety and unholiness, that he "by no means will clear the guilty," Exod. xxxiv. 7, or "let the sinner always go unpunished," Nahum i. 3. And this seems to be the import of the holiness of God we are here called to imitate, because it stands in opposition to "the former lusts of their ignorance:" or, (2.) God's holiness respects such persons as are by consecration, or by resemblance of him, holy; and so it intimates his great affection to them, and concernment for them.

[23] Ver. 17. Ἀπροσωπολήπτως.] i. e. Without difference of nations, whether Jew or gentile, or without respect had to any man's progenitors, in the great day of his account (Acts x. 34, 35, Rom. ii. 58: see note on James ii. 1).

[24] Ver. 18. Ἐκ τῆς ματαίας ὑμῶν ἀναστροφῆς, From your vain conversation.] Two expressions in this chapter seem to intimate, that the apostle speaks here, not only to the native Jews, but also to the converted gentiles. (1.) His exhortation to them, "not to fashion themselves according to their former lusts, ἐν τῇ ἀγνοίᾳ ὑμῶν, in their ignorance;" which phrase, in the New Testament, hath still relation to the times of ignorance in which the gentiles lay, before the preaching of the gospel to them. So, Acts xvii. 30, τοὺς χρόνους τῆς ἀγνοίας, "The times of ignorance God winked at;" Eph. iv. 18, "Being darkened in your mind, διὰ τὴν ἄγνοιαν, by the ignorance that is in you." (2.) This of their conversation, "received by tradition from their forefathers:" for though the scribes and pharisees had delivered traditions to the people, which rendered the worship of God vain (Matt. xv. 9); yet a "vain conversation received by tradition from their forefathers," seems rather to respect the conversation of the heathens, ἀναστροφὴ being the word by which "the conversation of the gentiles" is designed, Eph. ii. 3, iv. 22, 2 Pet. ii. 7. 18; and μάταια, here added to it, determining the "conversation" to the worship of "vain" gods (Acts xiv. 15, Eph. iv. 17). Their plea for their religion and vain worship being also this, that they "received it from their fathers," saying, that* they "were not to be moved, by any persuasions, from the religion which they had† received from their forefathers." But yet I confess, these things may relate to the gentile proselytes among the Jews, which were very numerous (see note on ver. 1).

[25] Ver. 19. Ὡς ἀμνοῦ ἀμώμου, A lamb without blemish.] Christ being perfect, and without spot or sin, was typified by the lamb offered daily for their sins; and that lamb being bought with the half shekel every one gave for the buying of the daily sacrifice (Exod. xxx. 12. 15, 16, and which was therefore styled כספ כפורים, "the money of expiations," and was sent up to Jerusalem from every city of Judea, and all the provinces where the Jews lived, in silver and gold), the apostle may here allude to this, when he saith, "Ye were not redeemed with silver and gold, by which the daily sacrifice was bought, which made atonement for your souls, but with the precious blood of Jesus, who shed his blood for your redemption from that death which by your sins ye had contracted." Others refer this to the paschal lamb, by the sprinkling of whose blood they were delivered from destruction, when the first-born of the Egyptians perished (Exod. xii. 11. 17). Both these lambs were to be ἀμνοὶ ἄμωμοι, "perfect, and without spot," that they might be accepted (Exod. xii. 5, Lev. xxii. 21, Numb. xxviii. 3. 9. 11. 19, &c.).

[26] Ver. 20. Προεγνωσμένου, Foreknown.] The Jews say, that* "when God created the world, he held forth his hand under the throne of glory, and created the soul of the Messiah and his company, and said to him, Wilt thou heal and redeem my sons, after six thousand years? He answered, Yes. God said to him, If so, wilt thou bear chastisements, to expiate their iniquity, according to what is written (Isa. liii. 4), Surely, he bore our griefs? He answered, I will endure them with joy." And to this representation of this covenant made with the Messiah, "before the creation of the world," it may be the apostle here refers (see the note on Eph. i. 4). In the style of Philo,† he is ἀΐδιος Λόγος, "the eternal Word, the first-born, and the most ancient Son of the Father, by whom all the species were framed." This therefore is according to the received opinion of the Jews.

[27] Ver. 21. Πιστεύοντας εἰς Θεὸν, By him do believe in God.] Here the Socinians object thus; He by whom we believe in God, is not that God in whom we believe; for the means of faith can never be the object of it: but Christ is he by whom we believe in God; ergo, Christ is not God. To this I answer, That Christ, according to the nature which died for us, and which was raised from the dead, is he by whom we believe in God; i. e. own him to be able to raise us also from the dead; and according to the same nature we acknowledge him not to be God: but that hinders not his being God, according to that nature by which he had power to (and did actually) raise himself from the dead (John x. 18, ii. 19).

But still they object, That "by him, we believe in him that raised him from the dead, that our faith and hope might be in God, to wit, the Father;" faith therefore and hope in Christ, is not faith and hope in God. Ans. First, it only follows hence, that it is not faith and hope in God the Father; but, secondly, the apostle here saith, that by believing in him who raised up Christ from the dead, "we believe in God," because we believe in that divine power which can raise us also from the dead: since therefore the holy scripture expressly and frequently asserts, that we shall be raised up from the dead, "by the voice of the Son of God" (John v. 25. 28), and that because "as the Father hath life in himself," and so is able to give life to the dead; so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself (ver. 26): seeing Christ often saith of him that believeth in him, "I will raise him up at the last day" (John vi. 39, 40. 44, 45), for "I am the resurrection and the life" (John xi. 24, 25): since the apostle saith, he hath "dominion over the dead, and over the living" (Rom. xiv. 9), that "by him all men shall be made alive" (1 Cor. xv. 22), and that "he will change our vile bodies into the likeness of his glorious body, according to the mighty power whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself;"—it rather follows hence, that our faith and hope in Christ, thus raising us from the dead, as his Father did him, is faith and hope in God.

[28] Ver. 23. Ἀλλὰ ἀφθάρτου, Being born again of incorruptible seed.] Here is a farther evidence, that the word of God is the ordinary means of our new birth: for it is τὸ ῥῆμα τὸ εὐαγγελισθὲν, "the word preached" (not any inward word infused), which is here styled, that "incorruptible seed" from which this new birth is derived.

[29] Διὰ λόγου ζῶντος Θεοῦ, The living word of God.] This epithet is ascribed to the word of God, Heb. iv. 12: and that this is not spoken of the living God, is evident; because in the Greek it is not διὰ λόγου Θεοῦ ζῶντος, but ζῶντος Θεοῦ, i. e. not "by the word of the living God," but "by the living word of God." Secondly, that it is to be understood of the word preached, is clear; because the epithet, "living," and "abiding for ever," agrees to the same thing. Now the apostle saith, it is "the word preached" that "abideth for ever;" and so the prophet Isaiah had said before him, xl. 8, τὸ δὲ ῥῆμα τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν μένει εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἀποδεδοκιμασμένον, Disallowed, or rejected, of men.] i. e. Of the Jewish sanhedrin, the "builders" mentioned Ps. cxviii. 22. So R. Solomon Jarchi on those words of Micah, v. 2, "Out of thee shall come a governor that shall rule my people Israel;" i. e. "the Messiah, the Son of David, shall come from thee; as it is written (Ps. cxviii. 22), The stone which the builders refused, is become the head-stone in the corner." And so our Lord expounds these words to the high-priests, scribes, and pharisees, Matt. xxi. 42. 45, Luke xx. 17. 19. So Peter, "full of the Holy Ghost," Acts iv. 11.

[3] Ver. 5. Ὡς λίθοι ζῶντες, A living stone, ver. 4. Living stones.] The Christian church being not a building made up of materials without life, as was the temple of Jerusalem; but a spiritual building, consisting of the members of Christ's body, living by the Spirit communicated from Christ their head, and the fountain of life, to them (Eph. iv. 16, Col. ii. 19); he who communicates this life to them is therefore styled "a living stone;" and they who receive it from him, are also styled "living stones:" and being by this Spirit thus fitly put together, compacted, and edified into one building (Rom. xiv. 19, 1 Thess. v. 11), are said to be "built up a spiritual house."

[4] Ἱεράτευμα ἅγιον, A holy priesthood.] The legal sacrifices were to be offered by the priests alone, and only in the temple: accordingly the Christian church is here represented as God's temple; the praises they offer up to God in their assemblies are styled "spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ," Heb. xiii. 15; the persons who offer them, "a holy priesthood" (see ver. 9).

[5] Πνευματικὰς θυσίας, Spiritual sacrifices.] Thus Philo* having said, agreeably to the psalmist, that God delights not in hecatombs, "since the whole world is his, and he can want nothing," adds, that men, τὴν ἀρίστην ἀνάγουσι θυσίαν ὕμνοις τὸν εὐεργέτην καὶ σωτῆρα γεραίοντες, "then offer the best sacrifice, when they honour their Benefactor and Saviour with hymns:" he adds, that "the altar for burnt-offerings was made of stone, and placed in the court before the tabernacle, but the altar of incense of gold was in the holy place within the veil:" whence he infers, that "as much as gold is better than stone, and the holy place more sacred than the court,† τοσούτῳ κρεῖττον ἡ διὰ τῶν ἐπιθυμιωμένων εὐχαριστία τῆς διὰ τῶν ἐναίμων, so much is the thanksgiving offered up with incense better than that of sacrifices." And, lastly, he saith, that "the fire always burning on the altar, was, τὸ σύμβολον τῆς εὐχαριστίας a symbol of thanksgiving." And this thanksgiving, sent up to God with the oblation of bread and wine in the eucharist, in commemoration of our Saviour's passion, and with prayer for our acceptance through his beloved, is by the primitive Christians styled their "spiritual sacrifice," and that "pure incense," which, according to the prophet Malachi, i. 11, the gentiles were to offer to God throughout the world (see the text defended, Examen Millii).

[6] Ver. 6.] That both these stones relate to the Messiah see Voisin on Rom. ix. 33, and Pug. Fid. par. iii. cap. 5, §. 2, p. 274.

Ver. 7. Λίθον δν ἀπεδοκίμασαν οἱ οἰκοδομοῦντες, οὗτος ἐγενήθη εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας.] See these words vindicated against Grotius and Dr. Mills, Examen Millii, as also the reading of the text, iii. 5. 16.

[7] Ver. 8. Εἰς ὃ καὶ ἐτέθησαν, Whereunto also they were appointed.] That is, saith the reverend Dr. Hammond, they that disobey the gospel, that stand out obstinately against it, were appointed by God to stumble and fall at that stone, i. e. to be bruised, and ruined by that means, to be destroyed among the crucifiers of the Messiah, and condemned with them hereafter; it being just with God, that they who will not reform, and amend, at the preaching of the gospel, and so receive the benefit by it, should, for their obstinacy, be condemned, and so the worse for it; Christ being "set for the falling" as well as "the rising of many in Israel" (Luke ii. 34), and the gospel being "a savour of death to them that perish" (2 Cor. ii. 15, 16), and they being those whom, ἔθετο ὁ Θεὸς εἰς ὀργὴν, "God hath appointed for wrath" (1 Thess. v. 6). And to be sure it cannot signify, that God absolutely ordained the unbelieving Jews εἰς ἀπείθειαν, "to disobedience;" for then this disobedience would be a compliance with the divine ordinance or will, and so could not deserve the name of disobedience: nor could this disobedience be objected to them as their crime, unless compliance with his ordinance and will be so, and it be a fault to be such as God by his immutable counsel and decree hath ordained we should be; or it should render men criminal, and obnoxious to punishment, that they have not made void God's absolute decree, or done what that made it impossible for them to do. Wherefore this passage cannot signify, that the unbelieving Jews were appointed to disobedience: but only, that being disobedient to the gospel so clearly revealed, and by so many miracles and distributions of the Holy Ghost confirmed, they were appointed, as the punishment of that disobedience, to fall and perish: for so the Hebrew כשל, and the Greek πρόσκομμα, and σκάνδαλον, import, viz. the ruin and fall of them who stumble at this stone; as hath been proved on Rom. xiv. 13 (see Prov. xvi. 19, Isa. viii. 14, 15, Jer. vi. 21, Ezek. iii. 20, xxi. 15, Zech. xii. 3, Matt. xxi. 41, Luke xx. 18). So Œcumenius* on this place. Or, secondly, the words may be thus construed, "To them who are disobedient," and through that disobedience stumble at the word, this other character of the stone belongs, of "a stone of stumbling; whereunto those stones were put, one for honour to the believer, the other for a stone of stumbling to the unbeliever and disobedient:" for to both these stones the apostle Paul, Rom. ix. 33, and Peter here, do put this preface, "Behold, I lay in Zion a stone." And this agrees with that of Simeon, "Behold, this child is placed for the fall and rising of many in Israel" (Luke ii. 34).

Ver. 9.] The titles here given to the Christians are the same which formerly were given to the whole Jewish nation, and are accordingly to be interpreted:

[8] Γένος ἐκλεκτὸν, A chosen or elected nation.] Not only the righteous and obedient persons among them, but the whole nation of the Jews, are styled "the elect of God," throughout the Old Testament: thus, Deut. iv. 37, "Because he loved thy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, therefore generation, a [9] royal priesthood, [10] an holy nation, [11] a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth [12] the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light:

10 [13] Which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

11 Dearly beloved, I beseech you [11] as strangers

ἐξελέξατο τὸ σπέρμα αὐτῶν μετ' αὐτοὺς ὑμᾶς, he chose you their seed after them, and brought you out of Egypt by his mighty power." Where it is evident, that their whole seed, "even all that came out of Egypt," were the elect; Deut. vii. 6, 7, "Jehovah thy God hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people to himself, above all people that are on the face of the earth. The Lord did not set his love upon you, because ye were more in number than any people; but because the Lord loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn to your fathers, hath he brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen." Where it is evident, first, that their being chosen, before other nations, to be God's "peculiar people," is their election. Secondly, that all that were brought out of Egypt were thus beloved, and thus elected. Thirdly, that to these elect, and chosen people, God only promiseth to "keep covenant and mercy," provided they would love him and obey him; and that he threateneth to destroy them, and to "repay them to their face," if they neglect so to do. In the tenth chapter, ver. 14—16, he speaks thus, "The Lord had a delight in thy fathers, to love them, καὶ ἐξελέξατο, and he elected you their seed after them above all people; circumcise therefore the foreskin of your hearts, and be no more stiffnecked." Where again evident it is, that the whole seed of Abraham, by Isaac, even the "stiffnecked" of them, were "the beloved" and "elect of God." Ch. xiv., he saith to all to whom the following precepts did belong, and therefore doubtless to all Israel, "Thou art a holy people to the Lord thy God, καί σε ἐξελέξατο ὁ Κύριος, and the Lord hath chosen thee out to be a peculiar people above all nations."

And with this notion of the words, accords the constant use of the same phrase in all the prophets and sacred writers of the Old Testament: thus Solomon saith, 1 Kings iii. 8, "Thy servant is in the midst of thy people, ὃν ἐξελέξω, which thou hast elected; a great people that cannot be numbered, nor counted for multitude." In the book of Psalms, the Jews in general are styled "the seed of Israel his servant, the children of Jacob, ἐκλεκτοὶ αὐτοῦ, his elect," Ps. cv. 6. 43, cxxxv. 4; there doth he say, τὸν Ἰακὼβ ἑαυτῷ ἐξελέξατο ὁ Κύριος, "The Lord hath chosen Jacob to himself, and Israel for his own inheritance," Ps. cvi. 5; there doth he tell us, that "the Lord brought forth his people with joy, καὶ τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς αὐτοῦ, and his elect with gladness;" there he desires of God, χρηστότητα τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν, "the good of his elect, to rejoice in the gladness of his nation:" so that throughout the Psalms, God's "servants," his "people," his "nation," his "inheritance," and his "elect," are the same persons.

In the evangelical prophet we read, God speaking of Jacob, ὃ ἐξελεξάμην, "whom I have elected, and Israel whom I have loved," Isa. xli. 8, 9, and to whom he speaks thus, "Thou art my child, whom I have chosen," xliii. 20, 21. There God declares, "He will make waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the deserts, ποτίσαι τὸ γένος μου τὸ ἐκλεκτόν, to give drink to my chosen generation, my people whom I have chosen to show forth my praise," xlv. 4. There we read of "Jacob my servant," and "Israel mine elect," lxv. 6, and of a mountain which his "elect shall inherit, and in which his servants shall dwell."

In the prophet Jeremy we find God is displeased with them who said, "The two families אשר בחר יהוה בהם, whom the Lord had chosen, he hath even cast them off," Jer. xxxiii. 24. The prophet speaks of the day "when the Lord chose Israel, and lifted up his hand to the seed of the house of Jacob," Ezek. xx. 5. The prophet Zechariah styles God, "the Lord who hath chosen Jerusalem," Zech. iii. 2. And Daniel speaks of a time when οἱ ἐκλεκτοὶ αὐτοῦ, "his elect should not be able to stand before their enemies," Dan. xi. 15.

And to carry on this phrase even to the times of the New Testament; in the book of Esther, we are told of a time in which τὸ γένος ἐκλεκτόν, "the chosen generation should have perished," Esth. xvi. 21, i. e. in which the wicked Haman designed to cut off the Jews. In the book of Ecclesiasticus e are informed, that "Joshua was made great, ἐπὶ σωτηρίᾳ ἐκλεκτῶν αὐτοῦ, for saving the elect of God, and taking vengeance on their enemies that rose up against them (Ecclus. xlvi. 1), that he might set Israel in their inheritance."

Thus have I traced this phrase throughout the whole Old Testament, and shown, that it belongs not to particular persons, but to the whole Jewish church and people in the general; to the bad as well as to the good among them; to them to whom God threateneth the worst of evils, as well as to them to whom he promiseth the greatest blessings.

When in the New Testament this phrase is applied to the Jews, it plainly signifies as many of them as were converted to the Christian faith; though afterward too many of them fell off from it, or brought not forth those fruits of righteousness which Christianity required; and is applied to them all in general, and without distinction. And it is highly reasonable to conceive it should be so; for the apostle writing to that nation, who had been still accustomed to this notion of the word, and were all styled "the elect," they must be supposed to use the words of the Old Testament in that sense in which they always understood them: that the apostle doth here so use the word, is evident from this consideration, that the "holy nation," the "peculiar people," the "royal priesthood," joined with it, are expressions belonging primarily to that nation, and from them derived to the Christians. Secondly, that this epistle is writ to "the elect," that is, the "strangers of the dispersions of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia," they all being styled "the elect," i. e. such as professed Christianity, and so were visible members of the church of Christ; whereas too many of them were not so, according to that meaning of the word elect, which makes it to import men absolutely designed for eternal happiness, as this and the Second Epistle may inform us. Thirdly, that the Second Epistle, sent to the same persons, writes only "to them who had obtained like precious faith with us;" and so informs us, that the "faithful" and "elect" are in Peter's phrase the same. And that this is the notion of the word in all the other places of the New Testament, see proved in the notes upon them; and that it is applied to whole churches, and scarce ever to any individual person, in that sense in which it hath been so generally used by some late divines.

[9] Βασίλειον ἱεράτευμα, A royal priesthood.] Exod. xix. 6 "A kingdom of priests:" "Kings and priests," saith the Chaldee. And so John declares, that Christ hath "made us kings and priests to God," Rev. i. 6, v. 10, kings to "reign with him," xx. 6, and priests to "offer up unto him our spiritual sacrifices" (see here, ver. 5).

[10] Ἔθνος ἅγιον, A holy nation.] i. e. A people separated to God from all other nations, and from their idolatry, or false and antiquated worship, to serve him in an acceptable manner: on which account all Christian churches, being called out of the world, and dedicated to the service of God by Jesus Christ, are, in the prefaces to Paul's epistles, styled "saints" (see note on 1 Cor. i. 2).

[11] Λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν, A peculiar people.] A treasure, as the word סגלה signifies, a people in covenant with God, and so become his peculium, whom he will be careful to protect and preserve, and to whom belong his peculiar favours and privileges.

[12] Τὰς ἀρετὰς, His praises;] Or, glory: תהלתי is so rendered by the Septuagint, Isa. xlii. 8, "I will not give my glory to another, οὐδὲ τὰς ἀρετάς μου, nor my praise to graven images;" and, ver. 12, "Let them give glory to the Lord; τὰς ἀρετὰς αὐτοῦ ἀναγγελοῦσι, let them show forth his praises in the islands:" and, xliii. 21, he styles Israel "my elect;" as here, my peculiar people, τὰς ἀρετάς μου διηγεῖσθαι, to show forth my praise" (see also lxiii. 7, Hab. iii. 3, Zech. vi. 13, Esth. xiv. 10).

[13] Ver. 10. Οἱ ποτὲ οὐ λαὸς, Who in times past were not a people.] These words plainly relate to God's dealing with the ten tribes of Israel, when he had given them a bill of divorce (Jer. iii. 8), and sent his prophet Hosea to say unto them, "Ye are not my people, neither will I be your God" (Hos. i. 6. 9). And again, "I will no more have mercy on 14 Or unto governors, as unto them that are sent [18] by him for the punishment of evildoers, and for the praise of them that do well.

15 For so is the will of God (concerning you), that (so) with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men: (i. e. of those gentiles, which, estimating you by the turbulent Jews, are apt to represent you as ἔθνος δυσαρκτὸν καὶ δυσπειθὲς φύσει πρὸς τοὺς βασιλέας, a people naturally averse from subjection to kings, Jos. de Bell. the house of Israel, but will utterly cast them away:" and indeed, God having so expressly said, that "the children of Judah and Israel should be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head," that he would "have mercy upon her who had not obtained mercy, and would say to them who were not his people, Thou art my people" (Hos. i. 11, ii. 23), and that they should say, "Thou art my God," and that "the house of Judah should walk with the house of Israel;" I doubt not but that there was a considerable return of the ten tribes, or at least a considerable conversion of them in the places where they were: and though they, being mixed with the heathens, did many of them "serve their gods," as he threatened they should, Deut. xxviii. 36. 64, and so may be also said to be "called from darkness to this marvellous light;" yet since the apostle Paul applies this passage to the gentiles (Rom. ix. 25), I doubt not but that, in my mystical sense, it must relate to them also.

[14] Ver. 11. Ὡς παροίκους, As strangers and pilgrims.] They whose "citizenship is in heaven," and whose "names are written in heaven" (Phil. iii. 20, Heb. xii. 23), must be "pilgrims and strangers upon earth" (see note on Heb. xi. 13).

[15] Στρατεύονται, War against the soul.] For whereas the natural motion of that spiritual being is towards spiritual and heavenly things, "these lusts," saith Œcumenius, "draw down and captivate the soul to sensual and worldly things:" as therefore strangers and pilgrims are not wont to be affected much with the objects which they see in their travels; so neither should we who profess to be pilgrims in this world, be much affected with sensual objects.

[16] Ver. 12. Καταλαλοῦσιν ὑμῶν, Speak evil of you as of evil-doers.] Here Œcumenius gives this relation from Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, concerning the martyrs Sanctus and Blandina; "That the heathens apprehending the servants of some Christians, and compelling them to declare what evil* they knew of them, those servants having heard from the Christians that the holy sacrament was the body and blood of Christ, and thinking that it was, τῷ ὄντι, verily and substantially, his flesh and blood, related this to the inquirers, and they thinking, ὡς αὐτόφωρα, that this was done in very deed by Christians, told this to other heathens, and compelled the martyrs Sanctus and Blandina, by torments, to confess it; to which Blandina answered, How can they be guilty of such things, who by exercise (i. e. through temperance) permit not themselves to enjoy lawful flesh?"

[17] Ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐπισκοπῆς, In the day of visitation.] That is, when they afflict and persecute you: so ἐπισκοπὴ and ἡμέρα ἐπισκοπῆς often signify in the Septuagint; Isa. x. 3, "What will ye do, ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς, in the day of visitation, when your affliction shall come from far;" Jer. vi. 15, ἐν καιρῷ ἐπισκοπῆς, "In the time of their visitation they shall perish:" and again, x. 15, Wisd. iii. 7, ἐν καιρῷ ἐπισκοπῆς, "In the time of their visitation they shall shine;" Eccles. ii. 14, "Woe to them who have lost patience, what will they do, ὅταν ἐπισκέπτηται ὁ Κύριος, when the Lord visits?" and xviii. 20, "Before the judgment examine thyself, καὶ ἐν ὥρᾳ ἐπισκοπῆς, and in the hour of visitation thou shalt find propitiation."

[18] Ver. 14. Δι' αὐτοῦ, By him.] That is, by God, saith Esthius, because these governors were not always sent by Cæsar for these good ends; but it is sufficient that this was the general end of punishment, &c., and therefore they, in charity, must be supposed to be sent by kings and emperors for these ends.

[19] Ver. 16. Ὡς ἐλεύθεροι, As free, &c.] That the Gnostics pretended to any such liberty as exempted them from subjection to superiors, I find not in church history: but, that the Jews, to whom Peter writes, and especially the zealots among them, were notorious for this doctrine, and were practising it at the writing of this epistle, is evident: for,

First, They held themselves obliged to own* "God alone as their only Lord and Governor, in opposition to Cæsar, and all kings which were not of their own nation," and did not govern them by their own laws, or his immediate appointment.

Secondly, They, many of them, rebelled against the Romans, and against the governors sent by them, upon this very pretence, that† "they were a free people, and ought to preserve their liberty:" and thus they "used their liberty for a cloak of maliciousness."

[20] Ver. 18. Οἱ οἰκέται, Servants, be subject.] This also was a lesson needful for the Jews, because the Essenes against them, say Philo and Josephus, thought it "against the law of nature to be servants to any;" and their rabbins allowed not "a Jew to be a servant to a heathen" (see note on 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2).

[21] Ver. 19. Τοῦτο γὰρ χάρις.] This will procure the divine favour and reward. So what is, ποία ὑμῖν χάρις; "What thank have ye?" Luke vi. 32, 33, is, τίνα μισθὸν ἔχετε; "What reward have ye?" Matt. v. 46; and in the following verse this phrase is rendered, "This is acceptable."

[22] Ver. 20.] Note, First, From comparing this and the preceding verse, that to suffer (ver. 19), and to take our sufferings patiently (ver. 20), in the scripture import, is the same thing.

Secondly, That to do that which is truly acceptable to God, is also matter of our glory (see note on 1 Cor. ix. 6, Jer. ix. 24, Rom. ii. 7. 10).

[23] Ver. 24. Ἀνήνεγκεν, Bare our sins.] If these words be rendered, "He bare our sins," it is certain that an innocent person can only bear them by bearing the punishment due to them: and that this is the proper import of these words, τας ἁμαρτίας ἡμῶν ἀνήνεγκεν, is evident both from the prophet's exposition of them, when he saith of the same person, αὐτὸς ἁμαρτίας πολλῶν ἀνήνεγκε, "He bare the sins of many" (Isa. liii. 12), and expounds this thus, διὰ τὰς ἀνομίας αὐτῶν παρεδόθη, "He was delivered up to death for their iniquities;" and from the usual import of the phrase in the Old Testament; as, when we read in the book of Leviticus, vii. 18, "He that eateth of the peace-offering in the third day, it shall not be favourably accepted, τὴν ἁμαρτίαν λήψεται, he shall bear his iniquity." And again, "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart, thou shalt in any wise rebuke him, καὶ οὐ λήψῃ δι' αὐτὸν ἁμαρτίαν, and not bear sin for him" (Lev. xix. 17): and in the book of Numbers thus, "Your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years, καὶ ἀνοίσουσι τὴν πορνείαν ὑμῶν, and shall bear your whoredoms"—"Ye shall bear iniquities forty years" (Numb. xiv. 33, 34): when we hear the prophet Jeremy complaining, "Our fathers have sinned, and are not, τὰ ἀνομήματα αὐτῶν ὑπέσχομεν, and we have borne their iniquities" (Lam. v. 7): when we hear God saying to Ezekiel, "Lie thou upon thy left side, and lay the iniquity of the house of Israel upon it; according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon it, λήψῃ τὰς ἀδικίας αὐτῶν, thou shalt bear their iniquities" (Ezek. iv. 4—6): when it is farther said, "The soul that sinneth it shall die; the son οὐ λήψεται, shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son" (Ezek. xxviii. 20): when we read so often in the law of Moses, that such persons have been guilty,* "and shall bear their iniquity, they shall die for it;" and find so many cautions there given to the Jews, that they offend not in such a kind,† "that they bear not iniquity and die;" or, lest they bear iniquity and die: in all these places, neither the Socinians, nor any other persons, do fancy any other import of these words, but that by bearing of iniquity and sin is meant bearing the punishment of sin; and in these latter places, being punished with death for it. When therefore the same Jews found it foretold of their Messiah, by their own prophet, that he should "bear the sins of many," what could they understand by these expressions, but that he was to suffer the punishment, and bear upon him the burden of their sins? When the apostle informs those very Jews who were so well acquainted with the import of this phrase, that "Christ was once offered, or given up to death, to bear the sins of many;" and when Peter, writing to the same Jews, informs them that "he bare our sins in his own body on the tree," how can we think otherwise, than that they both apprehended, and the blessed apostle did design to teach them, that he suffered this death as the punishment of their iniquities? Let Mr. Le Clerc continue, if he please, to be confident that "it is not so much the expiation of sins, as the mortification of them, that is here signified," whilst we poor mortals rather think our sins must be mortified in us than on a tree, and in our own bodies than in Christ's, or in the sufferings of his body; and that it is not very good sense to say, He mortified our sins, that we might die unto them.

[24] Ver. 25.] These and the former words are taken from Isa. liii. 7, where the words are, "We as sheep have gone astray, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." Hence are both Jews and gentiles represented as "lost sheep," and Christ as the "good Shepherd" who goes after them, and brings them home upon his shoulders (see Isa. xl. 11, Ezek. xxxiv. 23). Here then is a farther confutation of the Socinian* gloss upon the former verse, viz. that "Christ took away our sins by his own body crucified upon the cross, procuring our absolution from them by his sufferings; not that he underwent the punishment of our transgressions, but because his voluntary death prevailed with God to give him power to absolve his servants at the last, and to reward them with eternal glory." For were this the whole import of the words, why is it added, in plain allusion to those emphatical words of the prophet Isaiah, "He bare our sins, the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his stripes we are healed?" Why is it so emphatically noted, that he who "did no sin" (ver. 22), yet "bare our sins?" Doth not this lead us to this sense, that he thus suffered not for his own, but for our sins? Why is he said to "take away our sins in his own body?" Doth not that seem to intimate, that the punishment of our sins was laid upon his body? Why is he said to do this "upon the tree?" Must not that intimate, that what he did to take away our sins was done upon the cross? especially if we consider, that the cross was the altar upon which he suffered, and that ἐπιφέρειν, ἀνενεγκεῖν ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον,† "to carry up upon the altar," is the usual phrase for offering the sin-offering or the burnt-offering upon the altar. And so the import of this whole sentence seems to be this; He bare, or took away, our sins in his own body offered upon the altar for us. Moreover, if this be chiefly done after Christ's resurrection, and the great day of recompense, and only by Christ's death, as it prevailed with God to give him power then to absolve us from our sins, why doth the author to the Hebrews make such a plain distinction betwixt Christ's bearing our sins, and his second coming to give a final absolution from them, saying (Heb. ix. 27. 29), "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and to them that look for him he will appear a second time, χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας, without a sacrifice for sin, unto salvation?" Crellius allows that χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας signifies "without a sin-offering;" and doth it not hence follow, that his first coming to bear our sins was his coming with a sin-offering for them? Since then the sin-offering still suffered in the sinner's stead, and bare the punishment of his iniquity, it follows, that he who came to be a sin-offering for us, must come to suffer in our stead, and bear the punishment of our iniquities.

Lastly, Admit the words may be translated thus, "He took away our sins," it is most reasonable so to interpret them as this phrase is used in scripture, when it is applied to the same purpose; now when it is there used of "taking away sin" by a sacrifice offered up to God for sin, it always hath relation to an atonement made by the sacrifice for that iniquity; and that sin-offering is said to "bear away the iniquity," by taking it upon himself. So when it is said that the sin-offering is given, ἵνα ἀφέλητε τὴν ἁμαρτίαν τῆς συναγωγῆς, καὶ ἐξιλάσασθε περὶ αὐτῶν ἔναντι Κυρίου, "to take away the iniquity of the congregation," it is there said to do it, "by making an atonement for them before the Lord," Lev. x. 17. So it is said of the scapegoat, that "he shall bear away all their iniquities;" but then he must be presented before the Lord, τοῦ ἐξιλάσασθαι ἐπ' αὐτοῦ, "to make atonement with," or "upon him," Lev. xvi. 1; i. e. Aaron must "confess their iniquities upon his head, and he shall bear upon him all their iniquities, λήψεται ἐφ' ἑαυτοῦ τὰς ἁμαρτίας αὐτῶν, he shall take their iniquities upon himself, and shall bear them away into the wilderness." So, Deut. xxi. 9, "Thou shalt take away innocent blood from among you;" but this is to be done by making an atonement for the innocent blood shed. When therefore it is said, that "Christ was manifested to take away sin," 1 John iii. 5, and that he "took away our sins in his own body," and was offered to "take away the sins of many," Heb. ix. 28, is it not reasonable to suppose he did this by taking the punishment of them upon himself, and making an atonement for them before God? especially if we consider that he is speaking to those Jews to whom these phrases were familiar.

CHAPTER III.

1 (And to proceed to the other relations, of man and wife;) Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that, if any (be such as) obey not the word, they also may without the word (i. e. without attending to the other demonstrations of the truth of it,) be won (to the faith) by the conversation of the wives;

2 While they behold your chaste [1] conversation coupled with fear.

3 Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of [2] plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold (chains), or of putting on of (gorgeous) apparel;

4 But let it be (that of) the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.

5 For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves (with chastity and subjection), being in subjection unto their own husbands:

6 Even as Sara obeyed Abraham (in token of that subjection), calling him lord: whose daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement (i. e. and be not moved by your fears to deny the truth, as she was, ἐφοβήθη γάρ, for she was afraid, Gen. xviii. 15).

7 [3] Likewise, ye husbands, dwell with them according to (the) knowledge (of your Christian duty, which requires you to love and cleave to your wives, forsaking all others, and to render them due benevolence), giving honour (or conjugal affection) unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel (and so less able to contain, and more liable to temptations), and as being heirs together of the grace of life; that your prayers be not hindered (as they must be if ye refuse to cohabit with them).

8 Finally, be ye all of one mind (minding the same things), having compassion one of another (under all your afflictions), love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous (these being the effects of love):

9 Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing (things contrary to love, as showing rancour in the heart and tongue): but contrariwise blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called (i. e. for this very end),

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 2. Τὴν ἐν φόβῳ ἁγνὴν ἀναστροφὴν ὑμῶν, Your chaste conversation in fear.] i. e. That they observing that the fear and reverence of that God you serve, produceth in you all due subjection and obedience to them, great chastity, and freedom from all suspicion of lust, great meekness and quietness of spirit in the family, sobriety in your apparel, and care of their concerns, you may by these things commend to them, not only your own persons, but that faith which produces in you these good fruits.

[2] Ver. 3. Ἐμπλοκῆς τριχῶν, Not the outward adorning, &c.] These, in the words of Clemens of Alexandria,* are τὸ ἑταιρικὸν καλλώπισμα, "the ornaments of whores;" and such as demonstrate, τὸ σοβαρὸν, καὶ θρυπτικὸν, καὶ ἀβροδίαιτον, "their arrogance, softness, and lasciviousness; the plaiting of the hair was," saith he,† "a sign of corrupt women, καὶ γὰρ αἱ περιπλοκαὶ τριχῶν ἑταιρικαί· and they that use them," he saith, "were ἑταιρικῶς κοσμούμενοι, attired like whores." And in his third book, and fourth chapter, he saith, αἱ χρυσοφορούσαι γυναῖκες, "The women that wear gold, plait their hair, paint their faces, have not the image of God in the inward man, but, in lieu of it, a fornicating and adulterous soul." The Apostolical Constitutions‡ also forbid women to wear τὴν ἐπιτηδευμένην ἐσθῆτα εἰς ἀπάτην, "exquisite garments, or garments fitted to deceive, or gold rings upon their fingers, ὅτι ταῦτα πάντα ἑταιρισμοῦ τεκμήρια ὑπάρχει, because all these things are signs of whoredom." And as for the "wearing of gold," Jamblichus,§ in the life of Pythagoras, saith, τὸ χρυσὸν ἐλευθέραν μηδεμίαν φορεῖν, μόνον δὲ τὰς ἑταίρας, "that no free women wore gold, but whores only." The precious apparel is the thing which all the comedians mention as the attire which such women sought after, and gloried in. These things therefore, when they are used as such marks of distinction, are absolutely forbid chaste women: but when they cease to be so, they may be worn by Christian women, provided they do it without pride, or much concern about them; and still remembering that gravity in apparel is still more honourable and becoming Christian matrons, and that the ornaments of the mind, which are not subject to corruption, are much to be preferred before them.

[3] Ver. 7. Οἱ ἄνδρες ὁμοίως, Likewise, ye husbands.] I am very uncertain what is the true sense of these words. The reverend Dr. Hammond interprets them thus, "Let the husbands in like manner live conjugally with their wives, as Christianity requires of them; giving them maintenance, as persons less able to provide for themselves, and considering that they are by God's appointment co-partners with them of the good things of this life; that so they may not be disturbed in their prayers by their distractions and solicitudes for this world." Which interpretation I should acquiesce in, could I find that the phrase συγκληρονόμοι ζωῆς or ζώσης, "Being heirs together of the grace of life," was ever used only with respect to the good things of this present life; or that ἐγκόπτεσθαι τὰς προσευχὰς signified only "to be distracted in prayers," and not rather to have them only hindered.

Others interpret them thus: Let the husbands live with their wives as Christianity requires, not irritating or provoking them (Col. iv. 19), not despising their company; but giving honour to them as most needing it, and as considering that they are equal to them in respect of spirituals; and that by your discontents, displeasure against and separation from one another, your prayers be not hindered.

Others, as in the paraphrase, refer this to conjugal relation, and to conjugal duties; as all the ancients, who have spoken of these words, interpret them. Œcumenius saith, he thinks they are to be interpreted, ἐπὶ τῆς γαμικῆς χρήσεως, of the conjugal use of one another; and the word συνοικεῖν seems to plead for this sense as being so used by the Septuagint, Gen. xx. 3, Deut. xxiv. 1, xxv. 5, Isa. lxii. 5, Esd. i. 8. 70. 84. 92; but then I find not that the word τιμὴ beareth any such sense. Only to this it may be answered, that Origen* seems to point the words thus: "Let the husband dwell with the wife according to knowledge, as being more infirm, giving honour to them also, as being heirs of the grace of life." And seeing συνοικέω signifies to marry, or that ye should inherit a blessing (and so by blessing others, will imitate your gracious God, and show how willing ye are the same mercies may be conferred on others).

10 For he that will love life (i. e. who is desirous of a quiet, pleasant life), and (would) see good (i. e. prosperous) days, let him refrain his tongue from evil (speaking, so that men may refrain from speaking evil of him again), and his lips that they speak no guile:

11 Let him eschew evil, and do good; let him seek peace, and ensue it (that so men may be disposed to speak uprightly, and do good to you, and live peacably with you, and you may live under the protection of divine providence).

12 For the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous (to protect them from evil), and his ears are open unto their prayers: but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil (to return it upon their own heads).

13 And (this deportment doth also naturally tend to preserve you from evil, for) who is he that will (be so unnatural and ungrateful as to) harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good (and obliging to them)?

14 But and if (it should so happen, that notwithstanding) ye (should) suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye (iv. 14): and (therefore) [4] be not afraid of their terror (i. e. of what they threaten), neither be troubled (for what they can inflict upon you);

15 But [5] sanctify the Lord God in your hearts: and be ready always to give an [6] answer (or account) to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear:

16 Having (or retaining) a good conscience; that, whereas they speak evil of you, as of evildoers (and consequently represent your faith as instigating you to evil practices), they may be ashamed (of such accusations) that falsely accuse your good conversation in (the faith of) Christ.

17 (This care of retaining a good conscience is necessary, that ye may have comfort in your sufferings, and be conformed to Christ by them;) For it is better, if the will of God be so (and he sees fit to permit it), that ye suffer for well doing, than for evil doing.

18 For Christ also hath once [7] suffered for sins, the [8] just for the unjust, [9] that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit:

contract matrimony, the words may be thus paraphrased: Likewise, ye men, be ye joined in marriage with the women, as ye find them endued with the knowledge of Christianity, they being the weaker vessels, and so more subject without this knowledge to miscarry: giving preference in your choice to such as be heirs together with you of the grace of life, that, through difference in religion, your prayers be not cut off.

[4] Ver. 14. Τὸν φόβον αὐτῶν μὴ φοβηθῆτε, Fear not their fear.] These, and the following words, "Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts," are plainly taken from Isa. viii. 12, and they are there an exhortation not to fear the Assyrians, nor to be dismayed, as those Jews were, who out of fear were desirous to confederate with them; and so accordingly they must here signify, that Christians were not so to dread those by whom they suffered for the sake of righteousness, nor any that out of fear conspired with them to avoid persecution, as too many of the Jews did (Gal. vi. 12, 13), as to do any thing contrary to the fear of God, or unbecoming their profession.

[5] Ver. 15. Κύριον ἁγιάσατε, But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts.] This phrase in scripture seems to import these things:

First, That we should always have upon our spirits such a holy fear and reverence of God, as will prevail upon us to dread more his displeasure than any thing which we can suffer from the hand of man (Matt. xx. 28), and so enable us to stick close to our duty, and to endeavour to secure his favour, whatsoever we may suffer for so doing. So, Isa. vii. 12, 13, "Fear not their fear, but sanctify the Lord of hosts himself; and let him be your fear, and let him be your dread:" so, xxix. 23, "They shall sanctify the Holy One of Jacob, and shall fear the God of Israel."

Secondly, To "sanctify the Lord God in our hearts," is from the heart to own and to believe the truth of all that God delivers by his word and promise: as when God saith to Moses and Aaron, "Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them" (Numb. xx. 12). Hence the apostle, having told the Christians, he writeth to them of the engagements God had made, that "his eyes should be over the righteous, and his ears open to their prayers," and minded them of "the hope that was in them," requires them thus to "sanctify the Lord God in their hearts."

Thirdly, This phrase imports a firm belief of his almighty power, which makes him able to protect his people against all their enemies, and an affiance in his goodness and especial providence towards them: "Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, and he shall be for a sanctuary," Isa. viii. 13. So Ezekiel, xxxvi. 22—24.

Fourthly, To "sanctify the Lord," is to acknowledge and believe his justice, and that he is a God who will be sure to execute his judgments on the wicked, and more especially upon the persecutors of his people. So when he executed his judgments on Nadab and Abihu, Moses declares, "This is the thing the Lord had spoken, I will be sanctified in those that come nigh to me." So Numb. xx. 13, "This is the water of Meribah, because the children of Israel contended with the Lord, and he was sanctified in them;" "by punishing their rebellion," saith the Targum. So God declares he would be sanctified upon Sidon, which had been to the house of Israel "a pricking brier, and a grieving thorn" (Ezek. xxviii. 24), and upon Gog, the great enemy of Israel (xxxviii. 3). So the rabbins say, that "when God doth judgment, he sanctifies himself before his creatures;" according to these words of the prophet Isaiah, "The Lord of hosts shall be exalted in judgment, and God that is holy shall be sanctified in righteousness" (v. 16).

[6] Πρὸς ἀπολογίαν.] This apology for "the hope that was in them," seems rather such as should be made by works than words; against them who accuse the professors of it as evildoers, rather than against them who only doubt of the truth of it.

[7] Ver. 18. Περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν ἔπαθε, Hath suffered for sins.] Here note, that Christ is not only said to suffer for us, but to "suffer for our sins." Now was ever any man said to suffer for his own sins, who did not suffer the punishment of his iniquity? Why therefore should our Lord be said to "suffer for sins," if he did not some way suffer the punishment of our iniquity? Again, is not the sin-offering in the Old Testament styled above sixty times, τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, and τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, "the offering for sin!" When therefore the oblation of our Lord is also called, τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, "an offering for sin," Rom. viii. 3, when he is said to suffer περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, "for sins," 2 Cor. v. 21, what could the Jews, to whom the apostle writes, conceive to be the proper import of these words, but that he suffered to make atonement for their sins, as did all their sin-offerings, by suffering in their stead the punishment of their iniquity? (see the notes on Rom. viii. 3, 2 Cor. v. 21.)

[8] Δίκαιος ὑπὲρ ἀδίκων, The just for the unjust.] That is, saith Schlictingius,* "that the unjust might not suffer death, nor bear the punishment of their iniquities; for the victim suffers lest the guilty should be punished."

[9] Ἵνα προσαγάγῃ, That he might bring us to God.] This phrase, in all other places of the New Testament, where it is used with respect to Christ, imports his procuring to us freedom of access to God, who by our sins were formerly excluded from him, and banished from his gracious presence. "By him we have," saith the apostle Paul, προσαγωγὴν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, "admission to the Father;" by him we do obtain

20 Which sometime were disobedient, when once the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water.

21 The like figure whereunto even (Gr. the antitype of which ark is that) baptism (which) doth also now save us (not (merely as it is) the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but (as it is) the [11] answer (or stipulation) of a good conscience toward God,) (and this salvation it works for us,) by (virtue of) [12] the resurrection of Jesus Christ:

22 Who is (Gr. being) gone into heaven, and is on παῤῥησίαν εἰς τὴν προσαγωγὴν, "a freedom of access to God with confidence" (Eph. ii. 18, iii. 12). This is obtained, saith the same apostle, by virtue of his blood; "for we who sometimes were afar off, are by the blood of Christ brought nigh unto him:" we are brought nigh unto him, saith Peter here, by his suffering for our sins. Must not then we, who were excluded and banished from him by our sins, be brought nigh and reconciled to him by the blood of Christ, and by his sufferings for us on the cross?

[10] Ver. 19. Τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασι, To the spirits in prison.] Or, as other copies read, Πνεύματι, by which Spirit going, he preached to those in prison. For explication of which words, note,

First, That by those "in prison" we may understand the gentile world in bondage and captivity to sin and Satan, and held in the chains of their own lusts, and in the bonds of their iniquity. For by this phrase the evangelical prophet doth thrice express the preaching of the gospel by our Lord Jesus Christ: as in those words, "I gave thee for a covenant to the people, for a light to the gentiles, to open the blind eyes, to bring, ἐκ δεσμῶν δεδεμένους, καὶ ἐξ οἴκου φυλακῆς, the prisoners out of prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house," Isa. xlii. 17. And again, "I will give thee for a light to the gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the ends of the earth, that thou mayest say, τοῖς ἐν δεσμοῖς, ἐξέλθετε, to the prisoners, Go forth," xlix. 9. And a third time, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to those that are bound," lxi. 1, 2. To this effect are all these places interpreted by Jerome, Theodoret, and Procopius, upon Isaiah; viz. of those gentiles who were "bound in the chain of their sins," and captivated by Satan. Accordingly Lactantius, having cited the words extant, xlii. 7, saith, Cùm igitur nos anteà tanquam cæci, et tanquam carcere stultitiæ inclusi, sederemus in tenebris, ignorantes Deum et veritatem, illuminati ab eo sumus, qui nos testamento suo adoptavit, et liberatos malis vinculis, atque in lucem sapientiæ productos, in hæreditatem regni cœlestis ascivit (Lib. iv. cap. 20). Accordingly Philo* doth often represent men brought in bondage to their lusts ὡς ἐν δεσμωτηρίῳ καθειργμένην ψυχὴν ἔχοντες, "as persons whose souls are shut up in a prison-house;" and those who have overcome their lusts and sinful pleasures,† ὥσπερ ἐξ εἱρκτῆς προσεληλυθότων, καὶ δεσμοῖς οἷς ἐπεφίγγοντο διαφευγόντων, "as persons who are come out of prison, and have put off their chains:" adding, that God promised liberty to the souls that seek to him for it,‡ οὐ μόνον λύσιν δεσμῶν καὶ ἔξοδον ἐκ τῆς περιφρουρουμένης εἱρκτῆς παρασχόμενος, "not only affording them freedom from their bonds, and an exit from the prison in which they were kept; but giving them provisions for their journey, and safe conduct."

Now the antediluvians, who lived about the time of Noah, were ἐν φυλακῇ, "in prison," upon a double account: (1.) by reason of their bondage to sin: for then "all flesh had corrupted their way," their "wickedness was great upon the earth," and "every imagination of their heart was to do evil, and that continually" (Gen. vi. 5, 6. 13): and, (2.) they were in prison, or ἐν φυλακῇ, as having from God received the sentence of destruction, if they repented not within a hundred and twenty years, according to these words, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he is flesh: yet his days shall be a hundred and twenty years" (Gen. vi. 3): i. e. so long will I expect his reformation before I bring the flood upon them. Thus "the long-suffering of God waited for them in the days of Noah," expecting their repentance, and keeping them, as it were, "in prison" for the day of slaughter, if they did not repent. During this time, and before, God sent unto them his prophets, denouncing by his Spirit his judgments against the wicked; for to them "Enoch, the seventh prophet from Adam, prophesied, saying, The Lord cometh with his thousands of angels to do judgment against all, and to reprove all the ungodly concerning all their ungodly works which they had wickedly committed, and concerning all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners had spoken against him" (Jude 14, 15). And he sent also Noah to them, "a preacher of righteousness" (1 Pet. ii. 5), who, by preparing an ark before them for his own preservation, in obedience to the oracle delivered to him, condemned the old world (Heb. xi. 7). Thus did Christ by his Spirit preach to them in the days of Noah: and therefore the antediluvian age is even by the Jews styled "the age of the Holy Ghost;" according to those words, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man;" that is, say Ainsworth and the Bishop of Ely, My Spirit in my prophets, Enoch and Noah, shall not be always chiding and reproving, and thereby endeavouring to bring men to repentance, but shall proceed to punish them. Now this punishment being the drowning of the old world, their spirits have been ever since kept in prison, or reserved in chains of darkness, to the judgment of the great day: for by the consent of the Jewish nation,* "the generation of the old world have no portion in the world to come, neither shall they stand up in judgment; for it is said, My Spirit shall not always judge with man." The phrase "My Spirit," saith Dr. Fuller, "is never used of any other but the Spirit of God, and therefore must here be interpreted of the same Spirit."

Now from that time to our Saviour's advent, God sent no prophet to the whole heathen world, no person with commission to preach to all nations, or teach the gospel to every creature, but "suffered them to walk in their own ways" (Acts xiv. 16), whence they are said to have been disobedient only once of old time, "in the days of Noah."

[10] Ver. 19. By which he preached to the spirits in prison.] Hence Mr. Dodwell concludes, that our Saviour after his death did, in the interval betwixt that and his resurrection, preach to the separated souls in hades; but to this the reverend Bishop Pearson answers:

First, That those words cannot prove this assertion, unless it were certain, that by the word spirit we were to understand the soul of Christ, whereas indeed the spirit by which he is said to preach, was not the soul of Christ, but that Spirit by which he was quickened; as is evident from the connexion of the words thus, "He was quickened by that Spirit, ἐν ᾧ, by which he went and preached to the spirits in prison," that is, by the eternal Spirit of God, who is the author of the resurrection.

Secondly, He adds, that the persons to whom he preached by the Spirit, were only such as were "disobedient in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing" (ver. 20); i. e. those who were disobedient before the flood, as were the antediluvians, all that time that the long-sufferance of God waited on them, and consequently so long as God gave them time for repentance, which was one hundred and twenty years, striving then with them for that end by his Spirit in the prophets Enoch and Noah, but adding that his Spirit should not "always strive with them:" in vain then, saith he, are we taught to understand Peter of the promulgation of the gospel to the Jews or gentiles then in hades, since the words so evidently relate to the long-suffering of God to men, then living in the days of Noah.

[11] Ver. 21. Ἐπερώτημα, The answer of a good conscience.] Therefore, say the anabaptists, baptism cannot be salutary to those infants who cannot make this answer of a good conscience. To this I answer, that Paul also saith, that "the

the right hand of God (there interceding for us, and invested with all power to give eternal life to those whom God hath given him, and who is able to save us to the uttermost who come unto God by him, Heb. vii. 25); angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him (who therefore will use the good angels as ministering spirits sent forth to minister to them who are heirs of salvation, Heb. i. 14, and will preserve them from those authorities, and powers, and evil spirits, which oppose and persecute them, and seek their ruin).

true circumcision before God is not the outward circumcision of the flesh, but the internal circumcision of the heart and spirit" (Rom. ii. 29). But will any one hence argue, that the Jewish infants, for want of this, were not to be admitted into covenant with God by circumcision? And yet the argument is plainly parallel: "the answer of a good conscience" is required, that the baptism may be salutary; therefore they only are to be baptized who can make this answer: and the inward circumcision of the heart is required as the only acceptable circumcision in the sight of God; therefore they only are to be circumcised who have this inward circumcision of the heart. The Jews did not admit proselytes to circumcision without this answer of a good conscience; but yet they admitted their infants without any such thing: why therefore may we not allow the Christian church, in the administration of baptism, to observe the same custom in admitting the children of their proselytes to baptism, as they admitted them both to circumcision and baptism.

[12] Δι' ἀναστάσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, By the resurrection of Jesus Christ,] "Who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification" (Rom. iv. 25), "and hath by his resurrection begotten us to a lively hope of an inheritance incorruptible" (1 Pet. i. 3, 4), is risen as the first-fruits of them that sleep (1 Cor. xv. 20), and so hath assured us, that they who are Christ's shall also be raised by him to eternal life (ver. 23, 2 Cor. iv. 14, 1 Thess. iv. 14), and who, being risen, is now in heaven promoting our salvation (ver. 22), and preparing mansions for us (John xiv. 2).

CHAPTER IV.

1 Forasmuch then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind (or resolution to be conformed to him in his sufferings, as being buried with him in baptism, Rom. vi. 4, and so planted together with him in the likeness of his death, ver. 5, the old man being crucified with him, that the body of sin might be abolished, that henceforth we might not serve sin): for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin;

2 (Insomuch) That he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh (in obedience) to the lusts of men (ignorant of the truth, 1 Pet. i. 14), but to the will of God (Rom. vi. 10, 11).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 3. Ἀθεμίτοις εἰδωλολατρείαις, Abominable idolatries:] i. e. In idolatries joined with divers abominations (i. e. with drunkenness, uncleanness, unnatural cruelties to their own children, homicide).

Note here, that this is an evidence, that this epistle was directed not only to the Jewish nation, but to the gentile converts.

[2] Ver. 6.] For explication of these words, note,

First, That οἱ νεκροὶ, "the dead," in scripture, doth often signify, not those who in a natural sense are dead by dissolution of the soul and body, but those who are spiritually so, as being alienated from the life of God, and dead in trespasses and sins; as when the apostle saith, the widow "that liveth in pleasure, is dead while she liveth," 1 Tim. v. 6; and Christ unto the church of Sardis, "Thou hast a name to live, and art dead," Rev. iii. 1; and when he speaks to one of his disciples thus, "Follow thou me, and let the dead bury their dead," Matt. viii. 22. This is a phrase so common with the Jews, that, as Maimonides* informs us, they proverbially say, Impii etiam viventes vocantur mortui, "The wicked are dead even while they are alive:" for he, saith Philo,† "who lives a life of sin, τέθνηκε τὸν εὐδαίμονα, is dead, as to a life of happiness;" his soul is dead, and even buried in his lusts and passions. And because the whole gentile world lay more especially under these most unhappy circumstances, whence the apostle styles them "sinners of the gentiles," Gal. ii. 15, it was proverbially said by the Jewish doctors, Populi terrarum, i. e. ethnici non vivunt, "The heathens do not live;" and they in scripture are more peculiarly intended by that phrase. Hence the apostle saith to the Ephesians and Colossians (Eph. ii. 1, Col. ii. 13), that they were νεκροὶ τοῖς ἁμαρτήμασι, "dead in trespasses and sins;" and brings in God thus speaking to the gentiles, "Awake, thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life," Eph. v. 14.

Secondly, The ends for which this gospel was revealed to these gentiles, thus spiritually dead, and buried in sensuality, were these:

1. Ἵνα κριθῶσι κατ' ἀνθρώπους σαρκὶ, That they might condemn, might strive against, might mortify those sensual desires, and carnal appetites, which they had indulged whilst they lived, κατ' ἀνθρώπους, "as natural men," wanting the knowledge of God's will, and the assistance of his grace and Spirit. This I conceive to be the genuine import of the Greek: for, (1.) the word "flesh" being here set in opposition to the "Spirit" not of man, but God, or at the least to the renewed spirit of man, cannot be reasonably thought to signify that fleshly body which we bear about us, but rather that sinful flesh, which lusts against the Spirit (Gal. v. 17), that "law of our members, which wars against the law of our minds" (Rom. vii. 23), that φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς, or "fleshly wisdom," which is "not subject to the law of God" (Rom. viii. 7).

This being so, κριθῆναι τῇ σαρκὶ, cannot be truly rendered, to be condemned, judged, and punished in the flesh, that is, the body, but to strive with, to mortify, and subdue the flesh, with its affections and lusts; which is the common import of the word κριθῆναι, both in the Septuagint and the New Testament: so, Job ix. 3, ἐὰν βούληται κριθῆναι αὐτῷ, "If he will contend with God, he cannot answer him one of a thousand;" and, xiii. 19, τίς ἐστιν ὁ κριθησόμενος, "Who is he that contendeth with me?" Isa. xlii. 26, "Put me in remembrance, καὶ κριθῶμεν, and let us plead together;" l. 8, "He is near that justifieth me, τίς ὁ κρινόμενός μοι, who is he that contendeth with me?" lxvi. 16, ἐν τῷ πυρὶ κριθήσεται ὁ Κύριος, "By fire will the Lord plead with all flesh;" Hos. ii. 22, κρίνετε πρὸς τὴν μητέρα ὑμῶν, κρίνετε, "Plead with your in trespasses and sins), that they might be judged (might judge, condemn, and oppose their former life, led) according to men (not enlightened by the gospel) in the flesh, but (and might) live according to God in the spirit.

7 But the [3] end of all things (belonging to Jewish state, mentioned Matt. xxiv. 6, Mark xiii. 7, Luke xxi. 9,) is at hand: be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer (according to our Lord's advice in that case, Luke xxi. 34. 36).

8 And above all things have fervent charity among yourselves: for charity shall cover the multitude of sins, (which ye may have been guilty of in the time of your enmity to Christ and his servants; or those manifold infirmities ye may have committed, in building hay and stubble on the foundation, to your great hazard, 1 Cor. xiii. 12. 15. Or, it covers the sins of others, preventing them by patience, not taking notice of them when committed, and concealing them from others: to this sense the words of the wise man lead, Prov. x. 12.)

9 Use hospitality one to another without grudging (or murmuring that you bestow your charity on them who are not of your nation, or are not circumcised, and obedient to the law, as ye think yourselves obliged to be).

10 As every man hath received [4] the gift (of the Spirit), even so (let him) minister the same one to another, as (becomes) good stewards of the manifold grace of God (to do).

11 If any man speak (i. e. teach), let him speak as (he is instructed from) the oracles of God; if any man minister (as a deacon), let him do it as of the ability which God giveth: that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion (ascribed) for ever and ever. Amen.

12 Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is (come) to try you (Gr. wonder not at the burning that is among you, and is befallen you for trial), as though some strange (and unexpected) thing (had) happened unto you: (this being only that which was foretold by us, 1 Thess. iii. 4, to which ye were appointed, and to which ye were called, 1 Pet. ii. 21.)

13 But rejoice (in it rather), inasmuch as ye are (thus made) [5] partakers of (sufferings resembling) Christ's sufferings; that (so), when his glory shall be revealed, ye may (resembling him then in glory, as ye do now in sufferings, Rom. viii. 17, 2 Tim. ii. 11, &c.) be glad also with exceeding joy.

14 (And) If (it so happen, that) ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye (in such sufferings); for the [6] spirit of glory and of God resteth mother, plead;" and, Micah vi. 1, "Arise, κρίνητε πρὸς τὰ ὄρη, contend against the mountains:" so also, Matt. v. 40, Θέλοντί σοι κριθῆναι, is, "to him that will contend with thee;" and, Jude 9, τῷ διαβόλῳ διακρινόμενος is, "contending with the devil" (see also Judg. xxi. 22. Jer. ii. 9). And this, I think, is sufficient to justify the rendering these words actively, without referring to Glassius's Canon (lib. iii. tr. 3, can. 24), that verbs passive sometimes signify actively.

Note, thirdly, that the phrase κατ' ἄνθρωπον, in the New Testament, doth always signify to live, speak, or act, after the manner of mere natural men, not yet acquainted with the mind of God, or not assisted by his Spirit: as in those passages of the apostle Paul, "Speak I these things, κατ' ἄνθρωπον, according to the dictates of mere human wisdom? Saith not the law the same also?" (1 Cor. ix. 8.) "My doctrine is not, κατ' ἄνθρωπον, the product of man's wisdom, but I received it from the revelation of Christ Jesus" (Gal. i. 11); κατ' ἄνθρωπον λέγω, "I speak what men would" from the mere strength of reason argue (Rom. iii. 5). And again, κατ' ἄνθρωπον λέγω, "I speak what is acknowledged among men," that a man's testament is accounted sacred, and no man addeth to it, or taketh from it (Gal. iii. 15). "If I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, κατ' ἄνθρωπον, after the heathen manner, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?" (1 Cor. xv. 32.) And, lastly, "Whereas there are contentions among you, are ye not carnal, and walk, κατ' ἄνθρωπον, as natural men" (1 Cor. iii. 3), not as men acted by the Spirit?

So that κριθῆναι κατ' ἄνθρωπον σαρκὶ, is, "to condemn their former life led as natural men," or as mere heathens in the flesh, or to strive against that flesh which they indulged in their heathen state; and to "live unto God in the Spirit," which is the second end for which the gospel was preached unto the gentiles, is, by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, to live according to the will and the example of a holy God.

To this interpretation of this text the context plainly seems to lead; for the apostle's argument runs thus: "Christ having suffered for us in the flesh," it doth become us also, in a spiritual sense, to suffer in the flesh, by the mortification of our fleshly lusts; that though we still live in the flesh, we "may not henceforth live unto the lusts of men, but to the will of God" (ver. 2). I say, the Christian must no longer live "after the will of the gentiles in lasciviousness, lusts," &c. (ver. 3), for which things heathens will be obnoxious to God's just displeasure at the great day of their accounts; since "for this cause the gospel hath been preached unto them," that they might be engaged by it to condemn and strive against that fleshly conversation, in which they lived formerly, according to the lusts of men, not yet acquainted with the mind of God, and might henceforth live according to God in the Spirit.

For this cause was the gospel preached to them that are dead, that they, being judged according to men in the flesh, might live unto God in the Spirit.] That this text can have no relation to the preaching of the apostles to the dead gentiles in hades is evident:

Because the apostle saith this whilst Paul, John, and himself were living, and speaks of it as a thing already past, saying, εὐηγγελίσθη, "The gospel hath been preached to them," not that it shall be preached to them when dead.

[3] Ver. 7. Τὸ τέλος ἤγγικε, The end of all things is at hand.] This phrase, and the advice upon it, so exactly parallel to what our Lord had spoken, will not suffer us to doubt that the apostle is here speaking, not of the end of the world, or of all things in general, which was not then, and seems not yet to be at hand, but only of the end of the Jewish church and state, mentioned in the inquiry of the apostles, thus, "Tell us when πάντα ταῦτα, all these things shall be finished?" (Mark xiii. 14.) And in our Saviour's answer, thus, "This generation shall not pass away, ἕως ἂν πάντα γένηται, till all things be fulfilled," Luke xxi. 32; that is, πάντα ταῦτα, "all these things," Matt. xxiv. 34, Mark xiii. 30. And it is the observation of interpreters upon these words, τοῖς πᾶσι γέγονα τὰ πάντα, "I became all things to all men," 1 Cor. ix. 22, and, πάντα μοι ἔξεστιν, "All things are lawful for me," x. 23, that the word πάντα must be restrained to the subject-matter.

[4] Ver. 10. Χάρισμα, The gift.] That "the gift" should here signify wealth, I cannot think, for though χάρις sometimes bears that sense, yet χάρισμα is never used to signify wealth, but hath always relation to the spiritual gifts vouchsafed then to the church of Christ. (2.) Because the "speaking as the oracles of God" seems plainly to be the same with "prophesying according to the analogy of faith," mentioned Rom. xii. 6, and the "ministering" here, with the διακονία there, both which are mentioned as "spiritual gifts according to the grace given to them;" see note there, and on the "helps," mentioned 1 Cor. xii. 27.

[5] Ver. 13. Τοῖς τοῦ Χριστοῦ παθήμασι, Are partakers of Christ's sufferings.] Because he looks upon the sufferings of his members as his own (Acts ix. 4, Col. i. 14).

[6] Ver. 14. Πνεῦμα τῆς δόξης, The Spirit of glory;] (Or, as some copies read, τῆς δόξης καὶ δυνάμεως, "of glory and power,") is doubtless that Holy Spirit which attended the preaching of the glorious gospel, and made it to be "the ministration of the Spirit, ἐν δόξῃ, in glory;" and by partaking of which Spirit we Christians are said to be "transformed from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord," 2 Cor. iii. 8, 9. 18; and who is also styled Πνεῦμα δυνάμεως, "the Spirit of might," 2 Tim. i. 7; and being promised and given to those who suffered for Christ's sake, to "abide with them for ever," as their Comforter, and to "help their infirmities" (Rom. viii. 26, 2 Tim. i. 7, 8), must make them happy suf upon you: (so that though) on their part (who are unbelievers) he (i. e. Christ) is evil spoken of, but (Gr. yet) on your part he is glorified.

15 But let (especial care be taken that) none of you suffer [7] as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evildoer, or as a busybody in other men's matters.

16 Yet if any man suffer as a Christian (i. e. only on that account), let him not be ashamed; but let him [8] glorify God on this behalf.

17 For the time is come that judgment must (according to our Lord's prediction, Matt. xxiv. 21, 22, Mark xiii. 13, Luke xxi. 16, 17), begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us (believing Jews), what shall the [9] end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?

18 And if (some of) the righteous scarcely be saved (i. e. preserved from this burning, ver. 12, being saved, yet so as by fire, 1 Cor. iii. 15), where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear (in safety from these dreadful judgments which are coming on the Jewish nation, Prov. xi. 31)?

19 Wherefore (seeing the sufferings of Christians then will be so little, in comparison of those which shall befall the unbelievers, ver. 17, 18, seeing the Spirit of glory and power shall support and comfort them under these sufferings, ver. 14, and Christ hath promised them protection in that dreadful day, and said, He that endureth to the end, shall be saved, Matt. xxiv. 12, 13,) let them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls (i. e. their lives) to him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator (who, being their Creator, must be able to deliver them; and being faithful, will not suffer them to be tempted above what they are able, 1 Cor. x. 13).

ferers; and being also that Spirit by which they were enabled to work many miracles, and endued with extraordinary gifts, Christ must be glorified by him, as he foretold he should, John xvi. 14.

[7] Ver. 15. Ὡς φονεὺς, As a murderer, &c.] Whoever reads Josephus, will find there was the greatest reason to give these cautions to the Jewish nation, which then prodigiously abounded with thieves, who were continually employed in murdering not only heathens, but their own brethren; were κακοποιοὶ, or, as some copies read κακουργοὶ, to such a high degree, that he saith, "They practise all manner of injustice and wickedness that was ever thought of or committed;" and ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοποι, men who would have the government of other men's consciences, and overrule their actions, especially the zealots.

[8] Ver. 16. Δοξαζέτω τὸν Θεὸν, Let him glorify God.] i. e. Let him give glory to God, who enables him thus patiently to suffer for his sake, or, let him be so careful to behave himself under his sufferings, that he may glorify God by them, in the day of visitation (ii. 12), which day is now at hand.

CHAPTER V.

1 The [1] elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also (shall be) [2] a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed:

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1. Πρεσβυτέρους τοὺς ἐν ὑμῖν, The elders that are among you.] That is, the bishops, saith Dr. Hammond, here, and wheresoever the word occurs in the New Testament; for the order of presbyters was not yet in being, but only afterward appointed by John: for that the apostle is here speaking of elders, not by age, but office, appeareth by his exhortation directed to them, to "feed the flock" committed to their charge (ver. 2). But this notion seems not well consistent with what others have discoursed upon this subject; for,

First, They who make the bishop, priest, or elder, and deacon, to be appointed, as answering to the high-priest, the priests, and Levites, must suppose that all these three orders were at first appointed, especially in the church of Jerusalem, as being derived from their platform. And so must all those learned men, who say the church was modelled after the manner of the Jewish synagogue; for as to that, the parallel must run between the chief of the synagogue, the elders, and their ministerial officers, and the bishops, priests, or elders, and the deacons: and if the middle order had been wanting so long as is supposed, the government of the church would not have been formed after that platform; which, as Epiphanius* and the Jews inform us, had these several offices in it. The same may be said of those who make the elders or presbyters to be answerable to the seventy, appointed by Christ as inferior officers under the apostles, and make this an argument of an inequality betwixt bishops and presbyters, established in the church of Christ.

Secondly, Hence it must necessarily follow, that not only in the times, but even in the writings of the apostles, the names of the presbyters and bishops were so far confounded, that a presbyter, in their style, did always signify one that was properly a bishop; which yet the learned Bishop Pearson* seems not to allow.

Thirdly, This seems to make the work and office of a bishop too great to be discharged by a single person, especially in such great churches as that of Jerusalem, where there were many myriads of believing Jews (Acts xxi. 20). For it was his office, saith that reverend person, to be the teacher of the whole flock committed to him: Acts xx. 28, "Ye that are bishops of the several churches of Asia, look to the churches committed to your trust, to rule and order all the faithful Christians under you;" so the paraphrase. See the paraphrase and note on Heb. xiii. 7. 17, where he saith, that "to teach, exhort, and confirm and impose hands were all the bishop's office in Judea." He was to exercise the whole discipline of the church, by "hearing all the ecclesiastical causes, inflicting censures, and receiving penitents" (see the paraphrase and note on Titus iii. 10); he was to take the principal care of the poor, "to receive, and distribute to them the church's stock;" so here: the supreme trust and charge of that, saith he, "being always reserved to the apostles and bishops of the church" (note on 1 Cor. xii. 28); he was to visit the sick, and pray with them; that being, saith he, "one branch of the office of bishops" (note on James v. 14): and how one bishop could perform all this to a church consisting of many myriads of persons, it is not easy to conceive. I therefore think it better to admit of the ordinary acceptation of the word presbyter here; that is, to think they also may be included in the term.

[2] Κοινωνὸς δόξης, And also a partaker of the glory which shall be revealed.] i. e. Saith one, present at the discourse, concerning the glory that should be consequent to his death, the remarkable destruction of his crucifiers, and the deliverance of his faithful disciples. But, first, it is certain, that the scripture mentions nothing of any such discourse: but only that Moses and Elias then "spake of his decease which he was to accomplish at Jerusalem" (Luke ix. 31). And though Peter was then present, he heard not a word of that discourse; being then fast asleep (ver. 32). This glory therefore is doubtless the glory which we shall enjoy at the resurrection, or the redemption of our bodies from corruption (Rom. viii. 18. 23); styled the "glory of God," Rom. v. 2; the glory we shall enjoy when Christ appears, Col. iii. 4, when "our vile bodies shall be made like unto Christ's glorious body," Phil. iii. 21, and shall be "raised up in glory," 1 Cor. xv. 43; "eternal glory," 1 Pet. v. 10; this being that we shall enjoy at the revelation of Christ Jesus, ver. 4, i. 7. 13, iv. 13. Of this Peter was partaker then in the promise, and in the earnest of it, the first-fruits of the Spirit.

Yea, all of you be subject one to another (i. e. be as ready to do kind offices to others, as if ye were subject to them, see note on Phil. ii. 3), and [6] be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

[3] Ver. 2. Not by constraint, but willingly; μὴ ἀναγκαστῶς ἀλλ' ἑκουσίως.] Not as it were constrained to it by the dread of what ye may suffer, the woe impendent if ye do not perform this office; but voluntarily, and as a free-will-offering to that God who hath loved you so much, and from a ready mind to serve the interests of souls; as in those words of Paul, ἀνάγκη, "A necessity is laid upon me, and woe unto me, if I preach not the gospel; but if, ἑκών, willingly I do this, I have a reward" (1 Cor. ix. 16, 17).

[4] Μηδὲ αἰσχροκερδῶς, Not for filthy lucre.] As did the false apostles and Judaizers, "teaching things they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake," Tit. i. 11; "thinking gain godliness," 1 Tim. vi. 5.

[5] Ver. 3. Μηδὲ ὡς κατακυριεύοντες τῶν κλήρων, Not as lords over God's heritage:] Or, as it might be rendered, "of the possessions of the church." It was the custom then of many to sell their heritages, and give the money to the governors and bishops of the church, to be distributed to the use of poor Christians; and these inheritances and moneys were styled κλῆροι, both the scriptures and the best Greek authors using it for a patrimony or heritage obtained by lot, as the inheritance of the Jews was (Josh. xii. 8); whence the word κλῆρος is so often used in this sense through the books of Joshua and Judges. And so the bishops, to whose hands it was committed, are here required not to act as if they were lords, but only as stewards of it; and so as to be examples (to others) of freedom from avarice, and diligence in relieving the poor, sick, and needy. But seeing what is here κλῆρος, is in the same sentence styled τὸ ποίμνιον, the flock of God, the common interpretation of the word for heritage seems to be established by this latter word.

[6] Ver. 5. Ἐγκομβώσασθε, Be ye clothed with humility.] The word hath two significations; it signifies a frock put over the rest of our clothes, and so imports, that this humility should be visible in us, above all other Christian virtues, in our whole conversation, our words, and actions. Secondly, it signifies a belt which girds about our garments, and so imports we should tie it fast unto us, and have those considerations always fixed upon our spirits, which may still keep us in an humble frame of soul.

[7] Ver. 6. Ταπεινώθητε.] i. e. Submit with patience to the chastisements sent by his powerful hand upon you; that being truly sensible of the divine displeasure, being afflicted, and mourning for those sins which brought these evils down upon you, and turning unto him that smites you, he may draw nigh to you, and in due season work for you a deliverance from this afflicted state. See this in the place parallel to this, James iv. 7. 10.

[8] Ver. 12. Ὡς λογίζω, As I suppose.] From these and many like expressions used in the epistles of the apostles it is evident, that the divine afflatus, by which the Holy Ghost assisted them to write, did not dictate the very words, but only presided over them to preserve them from error in writing, seeing the Holy Ghost could not say, "As I suppose;" nor could Peter have used this phrase, if the divine illumination had influenced and instructed him in this matter.

[9] Ver. 13. Ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι, The church in Babylon.] That Babylon is figuratively here put for Rome, is an opinion so early delivered by Papias,* and which afterward so generally obtained (as we learn from Eusebius, Jerome,† and Œcumenius, on this place), that I subscribe to the note at the end of this epistle, that ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Ῥώμης, "it was written from Rome," styled also Babylon by the author‡ of the Revelation, ch. xvii. xviii. For the apostle must, at the writing of it, be at Rome, figuratively, or at some city properly called Babylon: now, as it is uncertain whether Peter ever was at Babylon in Chaldea, or in Egypt, and improbable that he ever made any considerable stay there; so is it very improbable he should do it so near his end. At Rome and Antioch, where he confessedly resided, church history is copious in giving an account of his successors in those sees: but who can show any thing of this nature, with reference to either of these Babylons? As to the reason why Rome is covertly thus represented by the name of Babylon, I cannot think, with Œcumenius, it was so styled διὰ τὸ ἐπιφανές, "because advanced to as great eminency" as Babylon ever had been; for then why should Peter have disguised the matter? I rather think it was so styled, either because it did resemble that city in its idolatries, and opposition to the church of God; or because it was to be destroyed for ever, as the prophets had foretold of Babylon; which, though the primitive Christians§ did believe, it was their wisdom to conceal. Thus Jerome‖ saith, that the prophet Jeremiah covertly spake of Babylon, under the name of Sesach, that he might not incense the Babylonians against him, who besieged Jerusalem; and that the apostle speaks of the Roman empire under the name of τὸ κατέχον, "that which letteth," that he might not provoke them to persecute the Christians for speaking of the Roman empire, which was by them esteemed imperium sine fine,* or eternal.

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. PETER,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

That this epistle also was written by the apostle Peter, is evident beyond all exception: (1.) From the inscription of it, in which the writer styles himself, "Simon Peter a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ;" there being no other apostle of that name. Moreover, of this apostle it is particularly noted in the scripture that he was Σίμων ὁ λεγόμενος Πέτρος, "Simon called Peter;" Matt. iv. 18 and x. 2, Σίμων ὁ ἐπικαλούμενος Πέτρος, "Simon which was surnamed Peter," Acts x. 18, xi. 13. He is styled Simon Peter once by Luke, v. 8, and by John the evangelist seventeen times, i. 41, vi. 8. 68, xiii. 6. 9. 24. 36, xviii. 10. 15. 25, xx. 2. 6, xxi. 2, 3. 7. 11. 15. Whereas Simeon bishop of Jerusalem, to whom Grotius ascribes the writing of this epistle, was neither Peter, nor apostle. (2.) From a concurrence of circumstances in it relating to Peter and no other: as, First, When he says, he "shortly must put off this tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ had shown him," i. 14. This well agrees to Simon Peter, to whom our Lord signified "what death he should die," John xxi. 18, 19. And that this death should befall him before his coming to the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 22, which was then at hand when Peter writ this, see note on 1 Pet. iv. 7. Secondly, He adds, that he was "with him in the holy mount," when our Lord Jesus was transfigured, and was an "eye-witness of his majesty," and heard these words, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well-pleased," 2 Pet. i. 16—18; which he could hear only then, no such words being spoken John xii. 28, to which Grotius would refer this passage. Now at our Lord's transfiguration, besides Peter, were only present the two sons of Zebedee, James and John, neither of which was ever thought to be the author of this epistle. Thirdly, This also may be gathered from these words, iii. 1, 2, "This second epistle, beloved, I write unto you; in which I stir up your sincere minds, by way of remembrance: that ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour." Whence it is manifest, First, That this epistle was writ by an apostle, and therefore not by Simeon bishop of Jerusalem. Secondly, That this was writ by an apostle, who had before directed an epistle to the same persons. Now though some of the ancients doubted whether this Second Epistle were canonical; yet they all owned,* that it bore his name and was ascribed to him, and never, that we find, was ascribed to any other apostle: we therefore have just reason to conclude, according to the title of it, that it was also the epistle of Simon Peter the apostle of our Lord, to whom both these epistles expressly are ascribed by Origen;† who also adds, that "Paul is called his brother, by Peter the apostle," which he is only in this epistle. Being therefore written by an apostle assisted by "the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven," 1 Pet. i. 12, we cannot doubt of the authority of this epistle: for whereas Grotius, to avoid the strength of this argument, imagines that this chapter contains a Second Epistle; and that the First Epistle referred to, ended at the close of the second chapter of that which is now called the Second Epistle; he not only doth this without all authority of any ancient versions or authors to countenance his opinion, but against the frame and the contexture of epistles, which usually begin with an inscription, which is not to be found in the third chapter.

As for the time when this epistle was indited, I lay down this as certain, against Grotius, from what hath been discoursed already, that it could not be written after the destruction of Jerusalem: for Peter here saith, that he was "shortly to put off this tabernacle," or, to die; whereas, he was actually dead in the fourteenth year of Nero, that is, three years before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. But that it was written but a little before his death, may justly be concluded from this declaration, that he knew, either by revelation or by our Lord's discourse, that the time of his death was "suddenly to follow,"* or was nigh at hand.

Of the persons to whom it was written, we are assured also from these words, "This second epistle, beloved, I write unto you;" they being a demonstration that it was written to the very same persons to whom the first had been directed, viz. to the converted Jews, dispersed through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, 1 Pet. i. 1.

And, lastly, as for the occasion of his writing, that plainly seems to have been double. (1.) To arm the Jews converted, against the fiery trial which was then come upon them; and against that apostasy from the faith, that "turning away from the holy commandment," ii. 21, that "falling from their own steadfastness," iii. 17, to which they of that nation were so prone. And evident it is, that the chief design of the Epistle to the Hebrews was to put a stop to it: and many passages in all the catholic epistles, not excepting the Second and Third Epistles of John, are evidently writ for the same purpose; and to warn them of, and to preserve them from, the destructive doctrines of those Jewish solifidians, who held it unnecessary to "add unto their faith, virtue." (2.) To arm them against those impure Nicolaitans and Simonians, who "turned the grace of God into lasciviousness:" of whom see the notes on the second chapter. And (3.) Against those scoffers at the promise of Christ's coming, as it were a promise which never would be verified.

But then I am constrained to dissent from the opinion of the reverend and judicious Dr. Hammond and Dr. Lightfoot, who conceive, that the apostle doth not discourse of our Lord's coming to the general judgment, in his third chapter, but only of his coming to execute his judgments on the Jews, by the destruction of Jerusalem. For not to insist upon this consideration, that this opinion is wholly new, and contrary to the judgment of all the ancients who own this epistle, and have occasion to make mention of these words, they all agreeing in this, (with Œcumenius) that the apostle speaketh, ἐπὶ συντελείᾳ τοῦ αἰῶνος, "of the end of the world;" it is extremely evident,

1. From these very words, iii. 7, "But the heavens and earth which now are, by the same word are kept in store, reserved to fire against the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men;" and, ver. 10, "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up." To interpret all these words only of the destruction of Jerusalem, is to turn them into metaphor and allegory; whereas Peter plainly says, that as the old world was destroyed by water, so shall the world that now is be destroyed by fire. "Here then," as one says truly, "is no room for allegories, or allegorical expositions; for, as the heavens and earth were destroyed by water, so are they to be destroyed by fire: and if in the first place you understand the natural material world, you must also understand it in the second; they are both allegories, or neither."

2. Were the apostle speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, which happened thirty-seven years after the death of Christ, and was, according to our Lord's prediction, to fall out whilst some of them whom he spake to were yet living, what need was there of saying, "One day with the Lord is as a thousand years," &c., when he was speaking, it seems, of that which he knew was to happen before four years were expired? And, lastly, the solemn exhortation, "Seeing then all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be, in all holy conversations and godlinesses, looking for and hastening to the coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, that we may be found of him without spot and blameless?"—this, I say, sounds too high for the destruction of Jerusalem, in which they of Pontus and Galatia could not be much concerned; but it is an exhortation very proper for those who had the lively idea of the conflagration of the world, and the tremendous "judgment and perdition of ungodly men," then set before them.

There is, I confess, a middle opinion betwixt both these, which interprets the words of Peter, in the third chapter, of the judgment of the great whore, or the antichristian church, mentioned Rev. xvii. 1; after which is to follow the new heaven and new earth, promised to the Jews, and to be accomplished in the calling of them to the Christian faith, and the flowing in of all nations to them. Concerning which, note,

First, That the judgment, according to the predictions both of the prophets in the Old and of John in the New Testament, is to be executed upon her by fire. So Dan. vii. 11, "The beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame:" and, ver. 26, "The judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it to the end." Accordingly, in the judgment of the whore, "She shall be utterly burnt with fire; for strong is the Lord that judgeth her," Rev. xviii. 8—10.

Note, Secondly, That it is usual with the prophets to represent God's judgments on the enemies of his church and people, by the tragical expressions of "burning up the earth," "dissolving the heavens." Thus of the destruction of Babylon, which name was writ upon the forehead of the great whore, God speaks thus: "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel, and with fierce wrath, to lay the land desolate: for the stars of heaven and the constellations shall not give their light: and the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not give her light: and I will make the heavens to shake (or, move away), and the earth shall remove out of its place," Isa. xiii. 9, 10. 13. The indignation of the Lord against the Idumeans is represented in these dreadful words:* "The mountains shall be melted with their blood, and all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and all their host shall fall down as a leaf falleth from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree." Of the destruction of Sennacherib and his people, God speaketh thus: "The heavens shall vanish away like smoke; the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner," Isa. li. 6 (see Deut. xxxii. 22, Jer. iv. 23, 24, Joel ii. 30, iii. 15). Here then we see all the expressions used in the third chapter of Peter used also by the prophets, when they speak of the desolation of a nation and people, and especially of the enemies of the church: which is sufficient to evince that the apostle, being himself a Jew, and writing to those Jews who were accustomed to these expressions, might thus set forth the great destruction of the beast, mentioned Rev. xvii. xviii., and by the "new heavens and new earth," that glorious state of the church, which was to ensue by the conversion of the Jewish nation, and the flowing in of all nations to them.

CHAPTER I.

1 SIMON Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, (writing) to them that have obtained like precious faith with us [1] through the righteousness of God (by faith, Rom. i. 17,) and (the sufferings of) our Saviour Jesus Christ:

2 (Wisheth that) Grace and peace (may) be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus (Christ) our Lord,

3 According as (it hath been with us already, for) his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness (or, to the life of godliness), through the knowledge of him that hath called us to (Gr. by) [2] glory and virtue:

4 [3] Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be [4] partakers of the divine nature, having escaped

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ, By the righteousness of God.] That this phrase signifies our justification through faith in the death and sufferings of Christ, the meritorious cause of it, see the note on Rom. i. 17. Or, since the Hebrew word צדקה in the Old, and the Greek δικαιοσύνη, both in the Old and New Testament, do often signify kindness and mercy, it may here also bear that sense.

[2] Ver. 3. Διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀρετῆς, By glory and virtue.] i. e. Who hath called us with a glorious calling, as being attended with the glorious effusion of the Holy Ghost; by reason of which the revelation of the gospel is said to be ἐν δόξῃ, or διὰ δόξης, "in" or "with glory" (2 Cor. iii. 7. 11); and showed his power, might, and virtue, by the miraculous operations with which it was confirmed. For though Mr. Le Clerc is positive, that ἀρετὴ nowhere signifies δύναμις, "power;" yet in Hesychius we read thus, ἀρετὴ, Σεία δύναμις, "virtue, i. e. divine power, ἡ κατὰ πόλεμον δύναμις, strength for war, fortitude, dexterity in wrestling."

[3] Ver. 4. Δι' ὧν, By which.] If the reading of other manuscripts, δι' ὃν, obtain, the sense runs plain and easy, thus, By whom, thus calling you, are given great and precious promises, Christ having brought life and immortality to light (2 Tim. i. 10), and established the new covenant in better promises (Heb. viii. 6). But if we retain the common reading δι' ὧν, "by which" the sense seems to run thus; By which two, the effusion of the Holy Ghost upon us, as the earnest of them, and his miraculous operations, as the confirmation of them and of that gospel which contains them, the corruption that is in the world through lust.

5 [5] And beside this (Gr. Καὶ αὐτὸ τοῦτο, And for this cause), giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue (or courage in the profession of it, and sincerity in the practice of those things this faith requires); and to virtue (an exact) knowledge (of your duty);

6 And to knowledge temperance (in carefully abstaining from those sensual affections and disorderly passions which obstruct the performance of your duty); and to temperance patience (under all the sufferings which may affright you from it); and to patience godliness (that fear of God which will restrain you from sin; that love of him which will constrain you to your duty; that conformity of will which will cause your mind to approve of, your heart to affect and choose, what is according to his will, and your whole man to be exercising itself to godliness);

7 And to godliness brotherly kindness (i. e. fervent love to Christians, as being children of our heavenly Father, and fellow-members of Christ's body); and to brotherly kindness charity (to all men, as proceeding from the same stock, having the same nature, and being subject to the same necessities).

8 For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be [6] barren (Gr. slothful) nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9 But (on the other hand) he that lacketh these things is [7] blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins (by that baptism in which he, being washed from the guilt of them, engaged to die to sin, Rom. vi. 4).

10 Wherefore (being called to this faith) the rather, brethren, give diligence (Gr. give the more diligence by practising these things) [8] to make your calling and election sure (i. e. to secure to yourselves the blessings of Christianity, to which God hath called you, and for which end he hath chosen you to be his people): for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall (or, miscarry eternally):

11 For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly [9] into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

12 Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always [10] in remembrance of these things, though ye know them (before), and be established in the present truth (viz. that the practice of these Christian virtues is necessary to the making your calling and election sure, and to your entrance into Christ's heavenly kingdom).

13 Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle (of the body), to stir you up (to the performance of your duty) by putting you (still) in remembrance (of these things);

14 Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle (by martyrdom), even as our Lord Jesus Christ [11] hath shewed me (John xxi. 20).

15 Moreover I will endeavour (by leaving these epistles, designed for that end,) that ye may be able after my decease [12] to have these things always in remembrance.

are given to us great and precious promises; or, rather, By which God, and our Lord Jesus Christ, mentioned ver. 1 and ver. 3, are given great and precious promises, they being the promises made by God the Father (2 Cor. vii. 1), and by the Son (1 John ii. 25), and confirmed to us in and through Christ Jesus (2 Cor. i. 20, 21).

[4] Θείας φύσεως κοινωνοί, Partakers of the divine nature.] Both Philo* and Josephus represent them who had the gift of prophecy as having τὴν ψυχὴν θειάζουσαν, "a soul inspired by the Deity," and, by the Holy Spirit dwelling in them, made divine. Thus Josephus† saith of one Papius, renowned for his wisdom and foreknowledge of things to come, that he did, θείας μετασχηκέναι φύσεως, "partake of the divine nature."

[5] Ver. 5. Καὶ αὐτὸ τοῦτο, And for this cause.] Or, as other manuscripts read, καὶ αὐτοὶ, "So ye." Esthius here probably conjectures, that the sense hitherto is pendent, thus: As ye have received from the gift of God all things necessary to life and godliness, so do ye add, or, for this cause add, to your faith virtue, &c.

[6] Ver. 8. Οὐκ ἀργοὺς, Ye will not be slothful,] Or negligent, in the concerns of God's glory and your soul's welfare; for sloth proceeds from want of faith, or courage, or love: nor unfruitful, i. e. unprofitable to others; for that proceedeth from want of brotherly kindness, or charity.

[7] Ver. 9. Τυφλός ἐστι, He is blind.] For want of knowledge, and blinded by his passions and sensual affections, and cannot see to the end and design of Christianity, and the rewards of faith and patience; nor considers he the obligations which lie upon him to depart from iniquity. The word μυωπάζων following, is by our translators rendered "one that cannot see afar off;" agreeably to these words of Aristotle, "They are said, μυωπάζειν, who from their birth are, τὰ μὲν ἐγγὺς βλέποντες, τὰ δὲ ἐξ ἀποστάσεως οὐχ ὁρῶντες, men who can only see things near, not those that are remote;" and it is ordinary to say, that such a one is blind, as being comparatively so, and to many things: and to this sense the following words, "They cannot look back to their purgation of old," seem to lead; though the great Bochart saith, the word here signifies "to close the eyes against the light" (Hieroz. lib. i. cap. 4, p. 31, 32).

[8] Ver. 10. Βεβαίαν ὑμῶν κλῆσιν ποιεῖσθαι, To make your calling and election sure.] Many manuscripts, and many of the ancients, add, διὰ τῶν καλῶν ἔργων, "by good works:" and this the text seems to require; for it immediately follows, "If ye do these things, ye shall never fall;" plainly declaring, that the making of their calling and election sure depended on the doing those works of virtue, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity (mentioned before), and so was only a conditional election, upon their perseverance in a life of holiness. And from the following words, "He that doth these things shall never fall," it plainly seems to follow, that even the elect, by their neglect to do these things, may fail of an entrance into this heavenly kingdom.

[9] Ver. 11. Εἰς τὴν αἰώνιον βασιλείαν, Into the everlasting kingdom.] As ζωὴ αἰώνιος is "everlasting life," Luke x. 25, αἰώνιος κληρονομία, "an everlasting inheritance," Heb. ix. 15, αἰώνιοι σκηναὶ, "everlasting tabernacles," Luke xvi. 9, οἰκία αἰώνιος, "an everlasting house," 2 Cor. v. 1, δόξα αἰώνιος, "everlasting glory," 2 Tim. ii. 10, σωτηρία αἰώνιος, "everlasting salvation," Heb. v. 2; so αἰώνιος βασιλεία is doubtless the "everlasting kingdom" prepared for Christ's faithful servants, and not his vindictive kingdom over the Jews; nor yet the kingdom of saints, mentioned by Daniel, as never to give place to any other kingdom, they to whom the apostle writ being to die long before the coming of that kingdom.

[10] Ver. 12. Ἐν ὑπομνήσει, In remembrance.] For could we be established in the belief of heavenly things, and have them still in remembrance, we should not flag in the performance of our duty. Moreover, from these verses, and from ch. iii., it seems reasonable to conceive, that they, who were so concerned to write those things the Christians had "already heard," and in which they were "established," would not neglect to write whatever else was necessary to be known to salvation.

[11] Ver. 14. Ἐδήλωσέ μοι, Hath shown me.] Declaring to him, in a vision, say Hegesippus* and Ambrose,† that he must go again to Rome, to be crucified. Thus Polycarp,‡ in a vision, saw his pillow, or nightcap, burning with fire, a little before he was consumed by the flames: and Cyprian, by a vision, was admonished of his death, and of the kind of martyrdom he was to suffer (Pontius in Vitâ Cypr. ed. Ox. p. 7).

[12] Ver. 15. Τὴν τούτων μνήμην ποιεῖσθαι, To make a remembrance of these things.] Peter therefore was not of the ‡ Προσευχόμενος ἐν ὁπτασίᾳ γέγονε, καὶ εἶδεν προσκεφάλαιον αὐτοῦ ὑπὸ πυρὸς κατακαιόμενον. Martyr. §. 5.

16 For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power (given to our Lord Christ over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to them that believe, John xvii. 2) and (the) coming of our Lord Jesus Christ (to crown them with glory), but were eyewitnesses of his majesty.

17 For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the [13] excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

18 And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount.

19 We have also [14] a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the [15] day star arise in your hearts:

20 Knowing this first (as the foundation of all you opinion, that oral tradition was a better way than writing, to preserve the memory of these things; and that without writing they might be able so to do. Accordingly Ignatius,* advising the churches to stand fast in the traditions of the apostles, thought it necessary, "for the greater security, to commit them to writing." For, saith Origen,† "that which is delivered only by mouth, quickly vanisheth, as having no certainty."

[13] Ver. 17. Ὑπὸ τῆς μεγαλοπρεποῦς δόξης, From the magnificent glory.] Some considering, that in all the three evangelists, the transfiguration of our Lord is mentioned, after he had spoken of the coming of the Son of man in glory, or in the glory of the Father, think this transfiguration was an image of that glorious kingdom he was to erect at the calling of the Jews; and that Peter here refers to this, when he saith, "We made known to you the power and coming (or the illustrious coming) of our Lord Jesus Christ;" whence Moses and Elias are here seen with him in glory, and, according to some manuscripts, are said to speak of the δόξα, i. e. "his glory," which was to be hereafter in Jerusalem. But that glory being not yet come, to what purpose should the apostle write to them of that age, to give all diligence to obtain an entrance into that kingdom? Or why doth he so generally promise an entrance into it, to them who were to die so long before, and were not at all, unless they died martyrs, to enter into it? Nor was it to be an everlasting, but only a millenary kingdom. Wherefore, for explication of the words, observe, concerning the transfiguration of our Lord, First, That when he was transfigured, "his face did shine as the sun, and his garments were splendent" (Matt. xvii. 2). And this, saith Nazianzen, God did, τὸ μέλλον μυσταγωγῶν, "showing what he was to be hereafter," and as an introduction to that glory in which he was to shine "at the right hand of Majesty in the heavens:" for, to "shine as the sun," is a phrase expressing something belonging to celestial Majesty, Matt. xiii. 43; the white and splendid garments being also proper to kings and the royal ministers of the heavenly court, Rev. iii. 4. And hence, when Christ is represented as "the first-born from the dead," and "the prince of the kings of the earth," to whom power and glory belonged, he appears in splendour, as the sun shining in his power, Rev. i. 14, 15. And this is the majesty of Christ, of which Peter, James, and John, were eye-witnesses on the mount.

Secondly, Of the testimony given to him, observe, (1.) that it was, "This is my beloved Son;" i. e. This is he who is "heir of all things," Heb. i. 2, and is "sat down at the right hand of Majesty and glory," ver. 3. And therefore this is made a proof of our Lord's resurrection and exaltation to the highest glory, that the Father said to him, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee" (Acts xiii. 33, Heb. i. 5, v. 5). This is he to whom the Father hath "given to have life himself" (John v. 26), and so to raise the dead (ver. 24), and "give eternal life" to them (John xvii. 1, 2). Now all this being comprehended in this testimony, shows the truth of what Peter said he had declared to them. Note, (2.) that this voice was given "from the magnificent glory," or bright cloud, which then appeared, and was the constant symbol of the divine presence (see note on Phil. ii. 6); and so assured them, this testimony was given by the God of truth. Note, (3.) that this testimony is delivered in the very words spoken of that Prophet which should come after Moses, viz. "A Prophet will the Lord your God raise unto you, like to me, to him shall ye hearken" (Deut. xviii. 15); and so assured them, that this "beloved Son" was that prophet of whom Moses spake. Note (lastly), that these words were directed not to Christ, but to those that attended him, and bade them observe, that God the Father here owned him as his "only Son," "in whom he is well pleased," and as the only prophet whom they ought to hearken to.

[14] Ver. 19. Βεβαιότερον τὸν προφητικὸν λόγον, A more sure word of prophecy.] This is spoken in comparison of the apostle's testimony of what he heard; which to the Jews was not so certain and convincing, as was the record of their own prophets: whence the apostles, both in disputing with the unbelieving Jews, and writing to the believers among them, confirm their doctrines from the writings of the Old Testament.

[15] Καὶ φωσφόρος ἀνατείλῃ, &c. And the day-star arise in your hearts.] Some, considering that Balaam prophesies of the Messiah, as a "star" that was to "come out of Jacob;" by which star, say the three Targums, Bereschith Rabba, R. Moses Haddarson, and R. Isaac, is meant the Messiah, "compared to a star, because of the splendour of his dominion and kingdom," and who is styled by John, ὁ ἀστὴρ λαμπρὸς, ὁ ὀρθρινὸς, "the bright and morning star" (Rev. xxii. 16), refer this to Christ's second coming to convert the Jews, and set up the kingdom of the saints (Dan. vii. 27), saying, that the apostle compares the intermediate time, in which antichrist was to reign, to the night and darkness, according as the scripture useth to express the times of ignorance and idolatry (Eph. v. 8, 1 Thess. v. 4, see note on Rom. xiii. 12), and the time of Christ's advent to call all Israel, and to bring in with them "the fullness of the gentiles," to the light dissipating that darkness; and doth here bid the Jewish nation to attend to the prophecies in the Old Testament, touching this glorious time, till it should be accomplished upon them. But the apostle writes not here to the unbelieving Jews, who are to be the only subjects of that calling, but "to them who had obtained like precious faith" with him. Moreover, that the time from writing this epistle to the conversion of the Jews, which is not yet accomplished, should be accounted as darkness, or a time in which the light, or day, appeared not, seems not suitable to that expression of Paul, "The night is far spent, and the day is at hand" (see note on Rom. xiii. 12): nor could he bid those of that age to expect, till that day-star should arise in their hearts, which to this very day is not yet risen. It therefore seems plain to me from these words, though Dr. Hammond and others would interpret them to another sense, that the apostle speaketh this concerning some other light that was to enlighten and affect their hearts, and give them full assurance, that our Jesus was the Son of God, the Prophet God had sent into the world. Now this was done by the internal gifts and illuminations of the holy Spirit vouchsafed to believers; by which, saith the apostle Paul, "the testimony of Christ," or which the apostles gave of him, ἐβεβαιώθη ἐν ὑμῖν, "was confirmed in" or "upon them" (1 Cor. i. 6), by which God did βεβαιοῦν ἡμᾶς σὺν ὑμῖν εἰς Χριστὸν, "confirm both the apostles and those that believed, in the faith of Christ" (2 Cor. i. 21, 22, v. 5). So that the import of the words seems to be this; Till ye yourselves have those prophetic gifts, by which ye may be able, from what ye find in yourselves, to know by the Spirit, that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (1 Cor. xii. 13), and have "the unction of the Holy Ghost," by which ye know all things (1 John ii. 27), and have also the scriptures of the New Testament committed to you, which contain a more perfect light (Rom. xiii. 14), and are indited also by "the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven" (1 Pet. i. 12). Like to this is that expression of Philo,* "What reason is in us, that is the sun in the world, ἐπειδὴ φωσφορεῖ ἑκάτερος, both being unto us a phosphorous; the sun giveth light to our senses, and reason intellectual rays to our conceptions: and when φῶς ἐπιλάμπει τὸ θεῖον, the divine light shines upon us, that of our reason sets; and when that sets, this ariseth, τῷ δὲ προφητικῷ γένει φιλεῖ τοῦτο συμβαίνειν, and so it was with the prophets."

[16] Ver. 20. Ἰδίας ἐπιλύσεως οὐ γίνεται, No prophecy is of private interpretation.] i. e. Prophesy comes not from the prophet's own suggestions, but from the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. That this is the true sense of these words, appears, (1.) from the apostle's own interpretation; for, not to be of the prophet's own incitation or suggestion (ver. 20), is, "not to come by the will of man" (ver. 21), i. e. not by human reason, "but by the will of God" (John i. 13). (2.) From the use of the phrase; for ἐπίλυσις, according to Phavorinus and Suidas, is ἔφοδος, "accession, or incitation, or insult; and the word ἰδία, added to it, must, therefore, signify, that "prophecy is not of private impulse or incitation:" whence the expression, used by the true prophets, is generally this, ἐπῆλθεν ἐπ' ἐμὲ, "The Spirit came upon me" (Numb. xxiv. 2, 1 Sam. x. 10, 2 Chron. xv. 1, xxiv. 20), and, (3.) from the nature of the thing itself, and the constant opinion of the Jews about it; which was, as Philo saith,* that "a prophet speaketh nothing of himself, but he is the organ of God in what he speaks, God speaking in and by him." Whence, to "speak of himself," or, "of his own heart or mind," is always made the sign of a false prophet, whom God had not sent (Numb. xvi. 28, xxii. 18, xxiv. 13, Jer. xxiii. 16. 26, Ezek. xxiii. 17). Ridiculous therefore, and full of ignorance, is the inference of Esthius hence, that the reformed, and their pastors, must not interpret the scriptures according to their own sense or judgments, which surely they may do, as well as he, or any other Romish commentator, who have nothing but their own private sense for many interpretations of the scriptures they discourse upon.

CHAPTER II.

1 But there were false prophets also among the people (in the former ages of the Jewish church), even as there shall be (hereafter) [1] false teachers [2] among you, who privily shall bring in [3] damnable heresies, (i. e. doctrines tending to the destruction of them that hold them, and) even [4] denying the Lord that bought them, and (shall) bring upon themselves [5] swift destruction.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι, False teachers.] Concerning the persons chiefly concerned in this chapter, and in the parallel Epistle of Jude, I find three opinions;

1. That of Dr. Lightfoot, who thinks these chapters speak chiefly of the Jews, i. e. of the false teachers of that nation. The second is,

2. That of the ancients, who say expressly, ἄρχεται ἐντεῦθεν τῆς κατὰ τῶν Νικολαϊτῶν αἱρέσεως, "He begins to speak of the heresy of the Nicolaitans." So Œcumenius. The third is,

3. That of the reverend and learned Dr. Hammond, and of the ancients also; that the apostles speak these things touching the Gnostics. And this opinion seems not much to differ from the second. For the ancient fathers say, The Gnostics sprang from the Nicolaitans, and borrowed from them all their filthiness and lasciviousness.* Moreover, the apostle Peter speaketh plainly of the "false teachers" which were to be hereafter; for, ver. 1—3, he speaks still in the future tense; though both Jude in his Epistle, and Peter in the following words, do plainly intimate, that some of them were come already: so that in the exposition of this chapter, and the Epistle of Jude, we have reason to take in those heretics, who appeared after the writing of these epistles.

Nevertheless, because the false apostles, and false teachers of the Jewish nation, and the Nicolaitans, were certainly then come, and we have express and frequent mention of them in the epistles of Paul, and in the Revelation of John, and because Peter speaks of them in the plural number; therefore I shall apply the words to all of them, giving the preference to them, in the exposition of these words, who are expressly mentioned in the holy scriptures.

[2] Ἐν ὑμῖν ἔσονται ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι, There shall be false teachers among you.] The apostle, writing to the Jews, seems by these words to intimate, that these "false teachers" should be among the Jewish converts, especially, as being either Jews by birth, or proselytes to that religion, as was Nicolas of Antioch (Acts vi. 5). But then their entering in among the Jewish converts (Jude 4), and being among them "in their feasts of charity" (ver. 12), their "leaving the right way" (2 Pet. ii. 15), and their "returning with the dog to the vomit," make it probable that they once professed the Christian faith; though afterward they revolted from it, or introduced such doctrines of perdition as fundamentally destroyed the faith which they professed.

[3] Αἱρέσεις ἀπωλείας, Damnable heresies.] Such as tended to the present destruction and future damnation of them who taught, and who believed them. Thus the doctrine of the false apostles, among the Jews, tended to the perverting of souls (Acts xv. 24), to make Christ die in vain (Gal. ii. 21), and their faith to profit them nothing (Gal. v. 2), and "Christ become of none effect" unto them; they being by them "fallen from grace (ver. 4) and "become "enemies to the cross of Christ" (Phil. iii. 18).

The heresy of the Nicolaitans is styled by Epiphanius,* a heresy which did, ἑαυτοῦς καὶ τοὺς πειθομένους ἀπολλύειν, "destroy them that taught, and them that believed it:" yea, Christ himself declares his hatred of it, Rev. ii. 15. And the same all the fathers say of the Gnostic heresy.

[4] Τὸν ἀγορίσαντα αὐτοῦς δεσπότην ἀρνούμενοι, Denying the Lord that bought them.] Christ being never styled δεσπότης in the New Testament, and Jude distinguishing this δεσπότης, or "Master," from our Lord, it seems most reasonable to interpret this of God the Father, who is said to have bought the Jews: "Is he not thy Father who hath bought thee?" Deut. xxii. 5; and the Christians: "Ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God with your souls and bodies, which are his," 1 Cor. vi. 20. Hence also it is truly observed by Esthius, that Christ died for them that perish, and bring destruction upon themselves.

[5] Ταχινὴν ἀπώλειαν, Shall bring upon themselves swift destruction.] That the apostatizing Jews did this, the scripture every where informs us, and the apostles frequently warn them of it. Paul doth it throughout the Epistle to the Hebrews, elsewhere speaking of them as men "whose end is destruction," Phil. iii. 19, on whom should come "swift destruction," 1 Thess. v. 3; they being "appointed for wrath," ver. 9; James as of men "fattened for a slaughter," v. 5, and that "suddenly" to come upon them, their "Judge standing at the door," ver. 9. Christ also threatens to them that held the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, that he would "come against them swiftly, and fight against them with the sword of his mouth," Rev. ii. 16; i. e. he would destroy them, Rev. xix. 15. 21. Accordingly church history informs us, that they were extinct,* λόγου ἅπτον, in a very little time.

But I find nothing of any such remarkable or swift destruction which befell the Gnostics, in church history; not one word that any of them perished at the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman army, though doubtless their iniquities would find them out. We rather read in the church history, that they were never persecuted by the heathen emperors; this being the observation of the fathers, that the Simonians,† and the Menandrians, "were never persecuted by the heathens, their fury being only poured out upon the Christians." Nor could it probably be otherwise, seeing they made the doctrine of the cross no part of their religion; but held it lawful‡ to deny the faith in times of persecution, to avoid suffering for it, and counting idolatry, in such cases, a thing indifferent; whence, saith Origen, "they were never persecuted at all."

[6] Ver. 2. Καὶ πολλοὶ, And many shall follow, &c.] That the Judaizers much infested the Christian church, and perverted many in the churches of Corinth, Galatia, Ephesus, and Crete, we learn from Paul's epistles; and that by reason of the Jewish zealots, who "despised dominions, and spake evil of dignities," the "way of truth was evil spoken of," from 1 Pet. ii. 12. Indeed the heathens seem to have made little or no distinction betwixt the Jews and the Christians that sprang from them; but imputed all the disturbances they made to Christ, or to the Christians. Hence Suetonius§ saith of Claudius, that Judæos, impulsore Chresto assiduè tumultuantes, Româ expulit; "he expelled the Jews from Rome, as being frequently tumultuous, through the instigation of Christ." Of the Nicolaitans, Epiphanius‖ saith, that "great was the deceit which they brought upon mankind." And Clemens Alexandrinus¶ professeth to write against them and the Gnostics, "to remove the scandal which they, by their doctrines, might bring upon Christianity:" as Justin Martyr also hints. Yea, Clemens adds,†† that from these men, who taught, that women should be common, arose the greatest blasphemy against the name of Christ, or Christians."

Moreover, it is to be noted, that instead of ἀπωλείαις, many copies read ἀσελγείαις, "their lascivious ways:" which reading may be confirmed from Jude, who begins his description of the same persons thus, "They turn the grace of God, εἰς ἀσέλγειαν, into lasciviousness." And this character agrees in some measures to the "false teachers" among the Jews, who taught fornication and uncleanness (see note on 1 Cor. vi. 13, Eph. v. 6); practised, τὰ κρυπτὰ τῆς αἰσχύνης, "the hidden things of shame," 2 Cor. iv. 2; and "gloried in their shame," Phil. iii. 19; and whose "exhortation was, ἐξ ἀκαθαρσίας, of uncleanness," 1 Thess. ii. 3; and many of whose followers were guilty of "uncleanness, fornication, καὶ ἀσελγείας, and lasciviousness," 2 Cor. xii. 21. But this is more emphatically the character of the Nicolaitans, and of the Gnostics, the successors of them: for they were, saith Œcumenius, περὶ μὲν δόγματος ἀσεβέστατοι, περὶ δὲ βίου ἀσελγέστατοι, "most ungodly in their principles, and most lascivious in their lives." Refert complexus, et permixtiones execrabiles, obscœnosque conjunctus, et quædam ex ipsis adhuc turpiora, saith Tertullian;* "yea, things so exceedingly filthy, that we blush to mention them, and therefore pass them by." Πάνδημον ἀφροδίτην κοινωνίαν μυστικὴν ἀναγορεύουσιν, saith Clemens† of Alexandria. Τὴν αἰσχρουργίαν ἅμα τοῖς ἄλλοις ἐπιτελεῖν τοὺς ἑαυτοῦ μαθητὰς ἐδίδαξεν, saith Damascen.‡ Hence Pseud-Ignatius§ styles them ἀκαθάρτους Νικολαΐτας, immundissimos Nicolaitas, amatores libidinis; Austin, sectam turpissimam: for, saith Timotheus,‖ οὐδεὶς τῶν ἄλλων αἱρεσιαρχῶν φαίνεται οὗτος αἴτιος πάσης βδελυκτῆς καὶ μυσερᾶς καὶ ἀῤῥήτου πράξεως διδάσκαλος, "amongst all the masters of heresy, none taught such filthy and abominable actions."

[7] Ver. 3. Ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ, Through covetousness.] If πλεονεξία should here and ver. 14 signify adultery, as 1 Thess. iv. 6, it seems to do (see note there), and as Dr. Hammond thinks it doth here, there will be no difficulty in applying this to the Nicolaitans, as well as to the Gnostics and false teachers among the Jews; the note on the second verse showing that this emphatically belonged to them, and gave the rise to that impure sect. But because they are accused, ver. 15, of "following the way of Balaam, who loved the wages of unrighteousness," and by Jude, ver. 11, of "running greedily after the error of Balaam for reward," I think it better to admit of that sense which our translation giveth of the word, and then to apply it at once to the false teachers among the Jews, and to the Nicolaitans: it seems highly probable, from the sixth, eighth, and the tenth chapters of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, that the apostle is there discoursing against the Nicolaitans. Now of these false teachers he said, that they "devoured" the Corinthians, 2 Cor. xi. 20. Paul, in his Second Epistle to Timothy, iii. 6, speaks of a sort of men who "crept into houses, leading captive silly women laden with sins, and led away with divers lusts;" a character which perfectly agrees to the Nicolaitans: and speaking to Titus of the same persons, he saith (i. 10, 11), "They subverted whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake." Irenæus¶ informs us of the Valentinians, that "they would not impart their mysteries to all, but to them only who were able to pay great sums for them:" whence the Pseud-Ignatius styles them, "covetous of what belongs to others, and violent lovers of riches."

[8] Οἷς τὸ κρῖμα ἔκπαλαι οὐκ ἀργεῖ, Whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not.] Jude, in the parallel place, ver. 4, saying they were men, οἱ πάλαι προγεγραμμένοι εἰς τοῦτο τὸ κρῖμα, "of old assigned to this condemnation," viz. by the prophecy of Enoch (see the note there); I think these words may be best rendered thus, "To whom the judgment pronounced of old lingereth not," it being a swift destruction, which the false teachers among the Jews and the Nicolaitans brought upon themselves (see note on ver. 1 of this chapter). Note also, that "their damnation" is in the Greek "their destruction."

but cast them down [9] to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment;

[9] Ver. 4. Ταρταρώσας, Casting them down to hell.] Tartarus, saith Phavorinus, is ἀὴρ ὑπόγαιος, καὶ ἀνήλιος, "the subterrestrial air, where the sun comes not." It signifies also, saith Suidas, τὸν περὶ τὰ νέφη τόπον, "the place in the clouds," or "in the air:" hence τάρταρον ἠρόεντα, and ζόφον ἠερόεντα, in Homer, to intimate that Tartarus was "the dark air:" as Crates in Stephanus saith, ὁ ἅϊδης ὑπόγειός ἐστι τόπος σκοτεινός, "Hades is a dark place under the earth;" saith Porphyry, "where souls are tormented, ἐν ἀκραιφνεῖ σκότῳ, in utter darkness" (Apud Stob. Eccl. Ph. p. 133). These angels being therefore placed in the bright regions of the heavenly light, and being now confined to the dark air (whence Satan is called "the prince of the power of the air"), are said to be cast down into Tartarus: and this suits with the opinion both of the heathens and the Jews, who held that "the air was full of spirits or demons" (see note on Eph. ii. 2); but chiefly of the ancient fathers, according to those words of Jerome, in his comment on that passage of Paul, "against spiritual wickedness, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, in cœlestibus;" that is, saith he, "in the air:* for this is the opinion of all the doctors, That the air, which divides between the earth and heaven, is full of contrary powers." He is styled "the prince of the power of the air," saith Œcumenius,† "because he is the prince of the evil spirits that are in the air;" "not as having dominion," saith Theophylact, "but only his habitation there." That this was the opinion of most of the ancients, see Petavius de Angelis, lib. iii. cap. 4. Now hence it follows, that though the devil and his angels are at present for ever banished from the divine presence, and so do suffer the punishment of loss now of the beatific vision; though they are, in the language of Tertullian, prædamnati ad judicii diem, "condemned beforehand to the tremendous day;" prædestinati supplicio sempiterno, "foreordained to eternal punishment," saith Austin; reservati in diem judicii, "reserved to the day of judgment," saith Origen, and Peter here; or "kept in chains of darkness to that day," saith Jude; and knowing and believing this, they cannot choose but "tremble," and be filled with present horror: yet is the doctrine of Rupertus‡ highly probable, that "at present they are not suffering in the infernal flames, but have their residence in the dark air; whence, at the day of judgment, they shall be precipitated into the fire prepared for the devil and his angels."

First, Because this seems to have been the opinion of all antiquity, for five whole centuries together, as appears not only from their common doctrine mentioned before, that they at present had their habitation in the air, but also from their express words, who spake still in the future of their infernal punishments, saying, as Justin Martyr,§ that "they should be punished with eternal fire; for that they are now banished by the name of Jesus, is an indication of their future punishment in everlasting fire." This he confesseth, μηδέπω τοῦτο πράξαι τὸν Θεόν, "that God hath not yet done;" but yet he saith,‖ "Christ hath foretold that he and his angels shall be cast into the fire, and everlastingly tormented there." And Tatianus saith of them,¶ "The Lord of all things suffers them to expatiate, or insult, till the time of the dissolution of the world, and till the Judge comes." Tertullian saith, that "their desperate condition, on the account of their being condemned before, receives some comfort from the delay of their punishment." Minucius Felix saith,†† that "he foreknowing, trembles at the punishment appointed for him, and those that worship him." Lactantius,‡‡ that "at the time of judgment, this prince, with his ministers, will be laid hold on, and condemned to punishment."

Secondly, This must be the doctrine of those fathers who held, that the devil knew not that he should be certainly condemned till our Lord's advent, and therefore durst not before blaspheme God; which was the doctrine of Justin Martyr, Eusebius,§§ Irenæus,‖‖ and Epiphanius;¶¶ or, as Œcumenius interprets them, "He did not know it manifestly, as being only obscurely hinted by the prophets; but when Christ coming, declared manifestly that everlasting fire was prepared for him and his angels, he ceased not to practise his wiles against his saints:" and this doctrine they founded on the following scriptures, viz.

First, That question which these devils put to Christ, "Art thou come to torment us before the time?" concluding hence, that "not this present age, but the future, was the time when these evil spirits were to be punished;" as Origen saith twice.††† "They thought," saith Jerome, ad judicandos se venisse, "that Christ was to come to judge them:" saith Chrysostom, οὐκ ἀναμένειν τὸν καιρὸν τῆς κολάσεως, "that he would not stay till the time of punishment," i. e. the day of judgment. Hence Maldonate, upon the place, admires at the great consent of the ancients in this opinion.

This, Secondly, they gathered from those words of Christ, "Depart, ye wicked, into the fire prepared for the devil and his angels." Whence they concluded, with St. Bernard,‡‡‡ that "the sentence against them was determined, but was not yet passed upon them;" and that jam diabolo ignis paratus, etsi nondum ille præcipitatus in ignem, "the fire was indeed prepared for the devil, but he was not yet cast into it;" concluding that was only to be done "at the end of the world, at the day of the great judgment, or in the world to come."§§

9 (Then may we rest assured, that) [12] The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations (as he did Noah and Lot), and to reserve the unjust [13] unto the day of judgment to be punished:

10 But chiefly them [14] that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and [15] despise government. Presumptuous are they, selfwilled, they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities.

11 Whereas angels, which are greater in power

But, Thirdly, This they chiefly concluded from these words of Peter* and Jude, that they were "referred unto the day of judgment to be punished." Nor is it easy to conceive a more natural consequence than this;—they are reserved unto the day of judgment to be punished, therefore they are not yet punished with the fire prepared for the devil and his angels.

And, Lastly, This they gathered from the Revelation of John (to which the frequent sayings of Austin do refer),† who often saith that "the old serpent the devil" shall be "cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, at the day of judgment."

Since, then, to torment the devils at our Saviour's advent, was to torment them "before the time" of torment; seeing our Saviour, when he shall pass the final sentence, will only amand the wicked to the fire "prepared for," not actually tormenting then, "the devil and his angels;" seeing they only are "reserved in chains of darkness, to the day of judgment, to be punished:" and so the sentence, and the execution of it, is no more passed upon them, than upon the prisoner that is kept in chains for the assizes: seeing the devil is only said to be then‡ "cast into the lake of fire and brimstone," when the Judge "sat upon the throne," and "all men were judged according to their works;" there seems sufficient reason to assert, that the devils shall not be tormented in the infernal flames, until the day of judgment: and if not they, then much less wicked men.

[10] Ver. 5. Οὐκ ἐφείσατο, And spared not the old world.] This instance agrees very exactly to those Nicolaitans and Gnostics, who had corrupted their ways; as they of the old world did, by taking to them what women they pleased to enjoy, as far as appears, without any solemnity of matrimony (Gen. vi. 2. 4); for it is only said, that "the sons of God went in unto the daughters of men:" hence are these giants said to be οἱ ἐκπίπτοντες οἱ βίαιοι, "violent men," who by force invaded them: and also by idolatry (see Ainsworth on Gen. iv. 26).

[11] Ὄγδοον, The eighth person,] One would think, from Adam; whereas indeed he rather was the tenth from Adam (Gen. v.), and so it is the eighth of them that were saved from the deluge (1 Pet. iii. 8). So Plutarch saith of Pelopidas, that he came, εἰς οἰκίαν ἑωδέκατος, "unto his house with eleven more:" and Polybius of Dionesidorus, that τρίτος ἀπενήξατο, "he swam out with two more:" so here, Noah was saved, with seven persons; so celebrated in history, that the hill where the ark rested is called, "the hill of the eighth," or Themanim; and a village by it bears the same name (see Dr. Hammond on the place).

[12] Ver. 9. Οἶδε, The Lord knoweth.] God's knowledge here includes his power and his will: so Ps. i., "Whatsoever the righteous doth, it shall prosper; for the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous" (ver. 6), i. e. he is able and willing to make it prosper; Matt. vi. 31, "Take no thought what ye shall eat or drink, or wherewithal ye shall be clothed; for your heavenly Father knoweth ye have need of all these things" (ver. 32).

[13] Εἰς ἡμέραν κρίσεως, To the day of judgment, to be punished.] Note, that this is signally the time when the ungodly shall be punished: secondly, that the evils which wicked men suffer in this life, will not exempt them from future punishments in the world to come; even Sodom and Gomorrha must then suffer (Matt. x. 15, xi. 22).

[14] Ver. 10. Ὀπίσω σαρκὸς, Who walk after the flesh.] See note on ver. 2.

[15] Καὶ κυριότητος καταφρονοῦντας, And despise government.] The note of Esthius on the place is this; That "we read not in church history, that the Gnostics despised governments, but rather flattered them." What Dr. Hammond saith, of their teaching Christians to despise all authority of magistrates, or masters, is not proved by him; for he attempts not to prove, that they were κυριότητος καταφρονοῦντες, "despisers of government:" and his attempt to prove, that "they taught Christian servants to despise their masters," from 1 Tim. vi. 2, hath been considered already. Nor do I find any thing of this nature charged upon the Nicolaitans. But then it may be noted, that κυριότητες καὶ δόξαι, "dominions and glories," in the New Testament, do often signify the angelical powers; as when Christ is said to be exalted, ὑπεράνω πάσης κυριότητος, "above all dominion," Eph. i. 21; and when κυριότητες are mentioned among "the invisible things of the creation," Col. i. 16. Accordingly some of the fathers* refer this to the angelical powers; and this they do, with great probability: for (1.) the apostle Peter here asserts, that they blasphemed, ἐν οἷς ἀγνοοῦσι, "in things of which they had no knowledge:" Jude, that they "blasphemed things that they knew not;" which very well agrees with their bold assertions touching the angels; in which they did, as Paul saith, ἃ μὴ ἑώρακεν ἐμβατεύων, "intrude into those things they had not seen" (Col. ii. 18); but cannot so well be applied to civil dignities, of which these heretics must have sufficient knowledge. (2.) The apostle adds, that whereas these men did not tremble to blaspheme these dignities, the holy angels, οὐ φέρουσι κατ' αὐτῶν βλάσφημον κρίσιν, "durst not use railing or blasphemous words against them." Now they whom Michael, and his good angels, durst not blaspheme, were, saith Jude, "the devil and his angels," who were in scripture styled "the principalities, and powers, and rulers of the darkness of this world" (Eph. vi. 12): and therefore they whom these heretics blasphemed, must also be angelical dignities.

But against this it is objected, That we read not in church history, that the heresy of the Gnostics had any thing in it of particular opposition or defiance to the angels; but, on the contrary, the æons, noting the angels, make up a great part of their divinity. Ans. This seems a great mistake; for both Irenæus† and Epiphanius‡ aver, that when they practised their most vile impurities, they invoked some of the angels, to whom they did ascribe that work, saying, when they performed it, ὁ δεῖνα ἄγγελε, καταχρῶμαί σου τῷ ἔργῳ, ἢ δεῖνα ἐξουσία, σοῦ τὴν πρᾶξιν, "O angel, I am doing thy work, I am employed in thy service;" which sure must be, to blaspheme these dignities.

Moreover, it is evident, that the Nicolaitans did also horribly blaspheme them. For (1.) "they made the angels to be the offspring of an obscene and filthy æon," as both Tertullian* and Epiphanius† inform us. (2.) They add, that the mother appears in a beautiful form to princes, and extracts their seed from them with pleasure, that she may recollect her power, or virtue, dispersed among many: and from this hypothesis, saith Epiphanius,‡ "Nicolas brought the mystery of his filthiness into the world:" they doing all their villanies, I suppose, in imitation of her.

[16] Ver. 12.] This verse, in Jude, runs thus: "But these speak evil of the things they know not; but what they know naturally, as brute-beasts, in these things they corrupt themselves," ver. 10. And therefore to make this verse parallel to it, it seems necessary to make the construction run thus; οὗτοι δὲ, "But these blasphemers of dignities, ἐν οἷς ἀγνοοῦσι βλασφημοῦντες, blaspheming in things of which they have no knowledge, shall perish in their own corruption; as do the natural brute-beasts, made to be taken and destroyed," to whom they are, in this practice, of making all women common, like; and whose example they plead, in favour of their common whoredoms, especially the followers of Carpocrates,§ and his son Epiphanes, "making the marriage of one a violation of the community ordained by God, and exemplified in other living creatures."

[17] Ver. 13. Τὴν ἐν ἡμέρα τρυφήν, Riot in the day.] This is exactly true of the Nicolaitans;‖ who practised their impurities "day and night;" and held, that "if a man were not lascivious every day, he could not be saved."

[18] Sporting themselves in their own deceits.] i. e. In those practices which were the effects of their deceitful principles. So that there seems no need of reading ἀγάπαις, "their love-feasts;" for they were the feasts of the church, not of the heretics.

[19] Συνευωχούμενοι, When they feast with you.] Of these feasts, see note on Jude, ver. 12. And also Irenæus's saying of Marcus, and other heretics, that εἰώθασιν ἐπὶ τοῖς δείπνοις τοῦ κλήρου οὗτοι πάντοτε παίζειν, "they are always accustomed, in those suppers which they make, by lot to play;" or, as the Latin hath it, sortibus ludere, "to play by lot:" I suppose, what women they should commit lewdness with, or who should provide the supper; which being ended, there followed, as Justin Martyr* hints, "the putting out of the candle, and their promiscuous lusts:" he speaking thus of the Marcionites; and Clemens Alexandrinus,† of the Carpocratians.

[20] Ver. 14. Covetous practices.] See note on ver. 3.

[21] Ver. 15.] This in Jude runs thus; τῇ πλάνῃ τοῦ Βαλαὰμ μισθοῦ ἐξεχύθησαν, "They ran forth into the error of the reward of Balaam," i. e. the error which the children of Israel committed, through the counsel which Balaam gave to Balak. To explain this, let it be noted;

First, That Balaam not only went with the princes of Balak, but also had the reward of his divination; for it is expressly said, Deut. xxiii. 4, Neh. xiii. 2, that "the Ammonites and Moabites hired Balaam." Note,

Secondly, That Balaam, for his reward, gave counsel to Balak to entice the children of Israel to idolatry and fornication: this is hinted in those words, "Come therefore, I will advertise thee" (Numb. xxiv. 14), i. e. what to do to this people now, and what they will do to thee in the latter days: so the Chaldee paraphrast upon the place; "I will counsel thee what thou shalt do to this people, that thou mayest make them to sin:" so the Jerusalem Targum. This counsel, saith Josephus, was, "that Balaam told Balak, upon his departure, that the only way to prevail upon this people would be to draw them into sin; and to that purpose he counselled him to tempt them with their beautiful women: these were first to entice the Israelites with their beauty and compliant conversation, and when they had entangled their affections, they were to consent to their embraces, upon condition that the Israelites would forsake their own law, and worship the god of the Moabites" (Joseph. Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 6). Note, Thirdly, That this counsel made them "err in the matter of Peor;" and so not only to commit fornication with the women of Midian (1 Cor. x. 8), but also to commit idolatry. Now this Baal-peor, saith Jerome, and other critics, was Priapus, who was worshipped by showing of their shame; to which these words of the prophet Hosea may refer, "They set up altars to Baal-peor, and separated themselves to that shame" (ix. 10); and those of Jeremiah, "Ye have set up altars to shame, even altars to burn incense to Baal" (Jer. xi. 13). And then, as ἐξεχύθησαν, "they were dispersed," or ran about after the Midianitish women, answers to the practice of those men who "crept into houses, leading captive silly women;" so "the matter of Baal-peor" answers exactly to the execrable villanies these men committed cum membris pudoris.

Moreover, this passage seems to confirm that exposition, which refers what is here spoken to the Nicolaitans. For John speaks thus to the church of Pergamus, "I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam; who, as he taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things 18 For when they speak great [23] swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness (or, to lasciviousness), those that were clean escaped from them who live in error.

19 While they promise them [24] liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.

20 [25] For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning.

21 For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them (because they sin by apostasy against the light received, and with ingratitude to the Author of it).

22 But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, [26] The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire.

sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication; so hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which I hate." Now the church history informs us, this was the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, that* "it was lawful to eat things offered to idols, and to commit fornication;" as Irenæus, Austin, and others teach.

[22] Ver. 16. The prophet.] That Balaam was indeed a prophet of God, and well acquainted with his revelations, the history in the book of Numbers will not suffer us to doubt: for those words, "I cannot go beyond the commandment of my God, to do good or evil" (Numb. xxii. 18), show he was not unacquainted with the true God (see also xxiv. 4); though after, through a covetous desire of gain, he used enchantments. "The madness of the prophet" appeared in this, that hearing the ass speak, which argued the miraculous assistance of God enabling him so to do, he goes on in his mad fury, and saith he would kill him.

[22] Τὴν τοῦ προφήτου παραφρονίαν, The madness of the prophet.] The Jerusalem Targum and Ben Uziel on Numb. xxii. 30, introduce the ass speaking thus to Balaam, "Woe to thee, Balaam, thou art חסיר דעתא, mente captus, i. e. mad."

[23] Ver. 18. Ὑπέρογκα, Swelling words of vanity.] This did the heretics many ways (ver. 9), by their barbarous names, quibus terrebant auditores, "by which they affrighted their hearers," say Austin† and Epiphanius,‡ and imposed upon them by those vile words; or by those proud words, that they are the spiritual, the perfect, the seed of the election, men who have perfect knowledge of God (see note on Jude 19); that they have grace, ἀπὸ τῆς ἀῤῥήτου καὶ ἀνωνομάστου συζυγίας, "from the ineffable and not-to-be-named conjugation," and§ "therefore ought to be always meditating the mystery of conjugation;" and that‖ "he that being in the world, does not love a woman, so as to enjoy her, is not of the truth;" and that "except a man be lascivious every day, he cannot enjoy eternal life;" and that they "being¶ spiritual, cannot receive corruption by any evil actions they do, or be hurt by any material actions, so as to lose their spiritual substance." In opposition to which vain boasts, these apostles so expressly say, "They shall perish in their corruption."

Τοὺς ὄντως ἀποφυγόντας.] See this reading defended, Examen Millii in locum.

[24] Ver. 19. Ἐλευθερίαν, They promise them liberty.] They promised them a double liberty: first, a liberty to do any thing they pleased, without fear: secondly, a liberty from the eye and hand of their Judge; as we learn from the ὑπέρογκα, "swelling words of vanity," cited by Irenæus* from them, which are a full comment on ver. 18.

[25] Ver. 20.] From ver. 18. 20. 21, it seemeth to be strongly argued, that they who were once truly faithful, may totally and finally fall away. For, first, that the persons here mentioned were once truly faithful, seems evident from this, first, that they had once ὄντως, "truly," and entirely "escaped from them that live in error" (ver. 18), being not then "entangled with," nor "overcome by, the pollutions which are in the world, through lust," but having escaped them "through the knowledge of Christ Jesus:" that they "turned from the holy commandment" in which they formerly had walked: that they were once washed from that "mire" to which they returned (ver. 22). All which cannot be truly said of hypocritical professors, who are "still in the gall of bitterness, and the bond of iniquity."

That these men after fell away totally and finally, we learn from these expressions, that they "were again allured to wantonness," that they were "again entangled and overcome by the pollutions which were in the world, through lust," and therefore "brought in bondage;" that they "turned from the holy commandment delivered to them;" yea, "with the dog to the vomit, and the washed sow to the wallowing in the mire:" and this so far, as that "it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness."

[26] Ver. 22. Κύων ἐπιστρέψας, The dog is turned to his vomit, &c.] These two proverbs, of which the first is taken from Prov. xxvi. 11, and the second is common among the writers de Re Rusticâ (see Schotii Adag. Sacra, in locum), are very expressive of the folly of those men who return to those vices they had formerly renounced; and therefore the fathers apply them to Julian, returning to that heathenism he had renounced in his baptism: so Nazianzen. CHAPTER III.

1 THIS second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your [1] pure minds by way of remembrance:

2 [2] That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets (of the Old Testament, Enoch, Jude 14, and Daniel, xii. 2, touching the judgment of ungodly men), and of the commandment of us the apostles of our Lord and Saviour (or, of the commandment of the apostles of our Lord and Saviour, as St. Jude, ver. 17, that is, to expect patiently and with unshaken faith that day, Heb. x. 23. 35. 39, James i. 6, v. 7. 11, 1 Pet. i. 13, iv. 1):

3 Knowing this first, that (according to their predictions) there shall come in the last days [3] scoffers, walking after their own lusts,

4 And saying, Where is the promise of his coming (to judge the world, and raise his faithful servants from the dead)? for [4] since the fathers (to whom these promises were made) fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.

5 For this they willingly are [5] ignorant of (Gr. they that are of this mind are ignorant), that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water (viz. dry land) and in the water (viz. that part of it which is covered with the sea):

6 Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished:

7 But the heavens and the earth, which now are, by the same word are kept in store, (being) reserved unto fire against [6] the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men (who, as the antediluvians have been punished by water destroying the world then, shall be punished with fire destroying it again).

8 But (for farther answer to this question), beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a [7] thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

9 The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness (concluding thence, that he hath changed his purpose, or will not perform it); but

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. Τὴν εἰλικρινῆ διάνοιαν ὑμῶν, Your sincere minds.] A sincere desire to know, and regard to the truth, being once seated in the mind and heart, we shall readily embrace and firmly stand in the truth delivered to us.

[2] Ver. 2.] That these words should relate to that notable destruction of the unbelieving Jews, foretold by Christ, seems not very probable; since the believers are instructed to be mindful of these commands, that they might be armed against the "scoffers," mentioned ver. 3, who said, "Where is the promise of his coming?" Now that the thing questioned by them was not our Lord's coming to the destruction of the Jews, but to the judgment of the world, is evident; it being styled emphatically, ἡμέρα κρίσεως, "the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men," ver. 7. 10—12.

[3] Ver. 3.] Since both Peter, and, as Jude tells us, the rest of the apostles, were so careful to mind those to whom they writ, or preached, of these scoffers, we may conjecture that these scoffers were then come; though in respect of the prophecies concerning them, they were yet to come; whence Jude saith of them, "These are they that separate themselves," &c. ver. 18, 19.

Ἐμπαῖκται, Scoffers.] Jude seems to teach us, that these "scoffers" were the heretics mentioned in the former chapter, viz. the Simonians, who, being Samaritans, held still their old heresy,* that "there should be no resurrection of the flesh;" and therefore walked after their own lusts: for those of whom, saith he, I have treated, and am speaking, are they of whom the apostles did forewarn you, ver. 17, 18,

[4] Ver. 4. Ἀφ' ἧς, viz. ἡμέρας.] "For from the day that the fathers," to whom this promise of a resurrection, and a heavenly country, Heb. xi. 16, is supposed to be made, and who had foretold this judgment to come upon the wicked, Jude 14, "have slept," we see no such thing verified to them; nothing answering their predictions, but "all things continue as they were." That ἀφ' ἧς should signify except that, I find no instance or example.

[5] Ver. 5. Λανθάνει γὰρ αὐτοὺς.] That is, that consider not God's power in making the world, which must enable him also to destroy it, if he please; and that by his word the earth was separated from the waters which covered it, and gathered into its channels, so that the dry land, which we call earth, appeared; and that by these very waters, descending partly from the heavens, and partly from the great deep (Gen. vii. 11), the earth was again overwhelmed, for the sin of the antediluvians (eight persons being only preserved); so that those wicked men, which then lived, perished in their wickedness; and so the prophecy of Enoch was remarkably fulfilled upon them.

[6] Ver. 7. Εἰς ἡμέραν κρίσεως, To the day of judgment.] From these words it seems to follow, first, that the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men, and the conflagration of the world, must be contemporary; and that therefore "new heavens and new earth," in the literal sense, must vainly be expected before the final judgment of ungodly men. Secondly, that the ungodly are not to be judged, or punished by fire, before the conflagration of the world: "for the heaven and earth that now are," are to be burnt up with that very fire by which the ungodly are to be destroyed, they being left in the midst of those flames, whilst the godly, being snatched up into the air above the reach of them, "shall be for ever with the Lord" (1 Thess. iv. 16); for the wicked are "reserved unto the day of judgment, to be punished" (2 Pet. ii. 9); that fire in which they are to be tormented and destroyed is reserved unto the same day (Matt. xxv. 41. 46); the fallen angels, for whom the fire is prepared in which the wicked shall be punished, are reserved to that day (2 Pet. ii. 4, Jude 6): and, lastly, Sodom and Gomorrah, who perished by fire and brimstone, and set forth ὡς δεῖγμα, "as an example" of that punishment the wicked shall suffer at that great day of retribution (2 Pet. ii. 5, Jude 7): they are not therefore to be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, before that day. Moreover, that the world was to be dissolved by fire, was the opinion of Anaximander, Anaxiphanes, Anaxagoras, Archelaus, Diogenes, and Leucippus (Apud Stob. Eclog. Phys. p. 44).

[7] Ver. 8. Χίλια ἔτη, A thousand years.] That is, though God defer his coming to this judgment a thousand years or more, we must not think this long; for in respect of him whose duration is eternal, and so who ever lives to make good his promises and threats, a thousand years are as one day. In like manner, Zosimus,* in his history, produces a prediction from the sibyls, or from one Phaellon, and then adds, "Let none think that this prophesy was of some other thing, because it was fulfilled, μετα χρόνους οὐκ ὀλίγους, a long time after; παρ γὰρ χρόνος τῷ Θεῷ βραχὺς ἀεί τε ὄντι, καὶ ἐσομένῳ, for all time is short to that God who ever is, and ever will be." Mr. Mede indeed saith, that these words cannot be thus interpreted, because the question is not, whether the time in which they expected the coming of the Lord, were long in respect of God, but only in respect of us, and so he would have the words interpreted thus, "The day of judgment spoken of shall be a thousand years." But (1.) the text saith not, "One day shall be a thousand years," is (in this) longsuffering to us-ward, [8] not (being) willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

10 But (though it be thus deferred for a time, yet) the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night (i. e. suddenly and unexpectedly to them, Luke xxi. 34, 1 Thess. v. 2, 3); in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up.

11 Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved (by fire designed to punish the ungodly), what manner (of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness,

12 Looking for [9] and hasting unto (prepare for) the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements [10] shall melt with fervent heat?

13 Nevertheless we, [11] according to his promise, look for (καινοὺς δὲ οὐρανοὺς προσδοκῶμεν, we also do expect) new heavens and a new earth, [12] wherein dwelleth righteousness.

but "as a thousand years," and that again not absolutely, but only παρὰ Κυρίῳ, "with respect to God." (2.) Here is no question mentioned touching the length of time, either with respect to God, or us, but only touching the truth of God's promise (ver. 4): and to this the interpretation well agrees, that God's promise may be true, and in his time fulfilled, though he, who ever lives to make it good, should defer it a thousand years. And, (3.) that this respects God's promise, and not the length of the day of judgment, is evident from the ensuing words.

[8] Ver. 9. Μὴ βουλόμενός τινας ἀπολέσθαι, Not being willing that any should perish.] Note here, that when it is said, God "would have all men come to repentance," it is certain that this will refers to all to whom the preaching of the gospel is vouchsafed, to all to whom in "the times of ignorance God winked at, for now he commandeth them all every where to repent" (Acts xvii. 30). When therefore it is said, he is "not willing any one should perish," he must be supposed to mean, he would have none to whom the gospel is vouchsafed, to perish. Vain therefore here are the descants of Esthius upon this place; as v. g.

First, When he says, "God would have none to perish, because he gives to all some general means of conversion to God, though they be not sufficient for that end without these special aids he will not give them." For certain it is, that he who wills not the means necessary to bring them to repentance, wills not that they should come to repentance: and he that determines to withhold the means, which being withheld they must perish, wills they should perish.

Secondly, When he restrains this to "the elect," saying, "God is not willing any of them should perish;" for the words are too general to admit of this restriction, for they run thus, first, he "would have all to come to repentance;" he "would not that they should perish." Secondly, he is here speaking of "the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men," and gives this reason why it is deferred, viz. because God is long-suffering, and would not any man should perish. He therefore must in reason be supposed to speak of God's long-suffering in the general.

Thirdly, When he adds, "He would not any man should perish, because he excites good men to pray they may repent, and so not perish." For if this prayer be according to the will of God, then must it also be his will they should not perish; if it be not, they cannot thus pray in faith or with expectance to be heard, because they know, according to his doctrine, they do not pray according to his will: nor can God excite them thus to pray.

[9] Ver. 12. Προσδοκῶντας καὶ σπεύδοντας τὴν παρουσίαν, And hastening to the coming.] Though πρὸς here may be taken from the foregoing words, yet σπεύδω hath sometimes an accusative case like this without it. As when Thucydides saith, σπεύδω τὴν ἡγεμονίαν, "I hasten to the government;" and Pindar,* μὴ βίον ἀθάνατον σπεῦδε, i. e. ἐπὶ βίον ἀθάνατον.

[10] Στοιχεῖα δὲ καυσούμενα, And the elements being burnt, shall be dissolved.] That the elements cannot be here taken in the common sense, Mr. Mede proves well, because one of them is that fire which shall consume these elements; but, that they signify the planets, he proves from the testimonies of Justin Martyr,† Theophilus of Antioch,‡ of Polycrates,* and other ancient fathers. So ἐνέργεια στοιχείων is the influence of the stars, Wisd. vii. 18, and στοιχεῖα ἐπουράνια, the celestial signs or constellations, as Valesius proves (in his notes upon these words of Polycrates bishop of Ephesus,† κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν μεγάλην στοιχεῖα κεκοίμηται, "In Asia great lights are extinct,") out of Diogenes, Laertius, and Epiphanius: and since the planetary bodies are found to be as much earth as that we tread on, and borrow all their light from the irradiations of the sun, I think there is no need of those criticisms which turn παρελεύσονται, "They shall pass away," into "They shall be changed," and καυσούμενα λυθήσονται, "They shall be dissolved being burnt," into "They shall be refined;" whereas, if they be refined as silver is by fire, they must be dissolved as that is. Nor see I any reason why we should prefer either an unusual or metaphorical, before the proper import of these words.

[11] Ver. 13. Κατὰ τὸ ἐπάγγελμα αὐτοῦ, According to his promise.] This cannot relate, as I have proved, to John's discourse of these new heavens, &c. for this farther reason, That he speaks of them only as in a vision, not by way of promise; it remains therefore, that the new heavens and new earth promised by Isaiah, be the thing here referred to. Now these new heavens and new earth are manifestly promised to the Jewish nation, to whom also the apostle here writes: nor can they possibly admit of any other sense, or be primarily accomplished upon any other people: for God having said by his prophet, "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth," immediately adds, "Be ye (Jews) glad, and rejoice for ever in what I do create; for behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy; and I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people." Now sure this new heaven and earth promised to the Jews must be created before the conflagration of the world, that is, before the Jews be burnt to ashes, they being not likely to be converted afterward. John indeed speaks of his "new heaven and earth," after he had mentioned the day of judgment; but that he doth this by a prolepsis, is evident from this consideration, that after his whole discourse of these "new heavens and earth," the new Jerusalem coming down from heaven, and of the bride, and of the Lamb's wife, i. e. the Jews converted then to Christ, follow these words, "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to render to every one according to his works," xxii. 13; which words contain a repetition of what was said, xx. 13, to show that what was mentioned there was not to be accomplished till after the appearance of the "new heavens and the new earth."

[12] Καινοὺς οὐρανούς, New heavens and new earth.] That this cannot refer to the millennium, supposed to be promised in the Revelation of John, appears, not only because this epistle was writ before the Revelation, which, saith Irenæus,‡ was seen, ad finem Domitiani imperii, "about the end of the reign of Domitian," whereas Peter suffered martyrdom in the reign of Nero; but also, (1.) because the millennium of John is peculiar to the martyrs, and those who have suffered for the cause of Christ; the "new heavens and earth," here mentioned, are the common expectation of all Christians, who upon this account are admonished to be "found of him without spot, and unblameable, in peace" (ver. 14). (2.) I grant, that the apostle is here speaking of the destruction, not only of the sublunary heavens and earth" (ver. 12) by fire: but this concession is so far from doing any service to the hypothesis of the millennium of John, that it doth perfectly destroy it: for this conflagration of the world is contemporary with "the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men:" and by that very fire which consumes the world, are they to perish (see note on ver. 7). So doth the scripture constantly express the punishment of the wicked, saying, that "at the end of the world the angels shall cast them into a furnace of fire" (Matt. xiii. 28), and that Christ shall "come in flaming fire to take vengeance" on them (2 Thess. i. 7, 8). Whereas the millennium of John must be at an end before that day: for after he had spoken of "the first resurrection," and the conclusion of one thousand years, in which they were to reign who were then raised, and of the insurrection of Gog and Magog against them: I say, after the conclusion of those years, doth he introduce One "sitting on a great white throne, and the dead both small and great standing before him, and being judged out of those things which were written in the book, according to their works" (Rev. xx. 13, 14).

I also grant, that after the apostle had spoken of the conflagration of the world, he hath these words, "We also do expect new heavens and new earth;" but then I add, that these words are not to be rendered thus, "Nevertheless, after this violent dissolution of the world, we expect new heavens and new earth," which are to succeed them: but rather, as Dr. More renders them, "But before this conflagration we expect them;" or rather, "But besides this conflagration, we expect new heavens and new earth." As if the apostle should have said,—I hitherto have answered this question of these scoffers, by showing what substantial mutations have been, and will be, brought upon the world by the word of the Lord, and his coming to judge his people: this also I think fit to add in answer to them, That we Christians expect the coming of our Lord to make such a moral change in the affairs of the church, as will amount to the new creation of heaven and earth, promised to the Jews (Isa. lxv. 16—18): so that these scoffers have no cause to doubt of our Lord's coming in behalf of his faithful servants, since he will come to raise his church, by his calling the Jewish nation to the faith, and so to such a glorious state.

Nor is it to be wondered that the apostle should speak of these two things together, in answer to that question, "Where is the promise of his coming?" seeing the Jews thought them connected, expecting these "new heavens and new earth," at the coming of the Messiah, and his coming "at the end of the world;" according to that question of the disciples to our Lord, "When is the time of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Matt. xxiv. 3. "In the end of the world," saith R. Saadias Gaon, "there shall be to the Jews a world full of joy and exultation: so that their heaven and earth shall be as it were new, as it is said, Isa. lxv. 17" (see this more fully in Mr. Mede, p. 535—537).

[13] Ver. 14. Ταῦτα προσδοκῶντες, Expecting these things.] These words, directed to the Jews then living, seem to prove, that in some inferior sense this promise of the new heavens, &c. was to be made good in their times: for why should he exhort them to this diligence, on the account of what should only happen one thousand seven hundred years after they were dead? for he plainly speaks to them to whom Paul had written, ver. 16, and therefore to the Jews at that present age.

[14] Ver. 16. Ὡς καὶ ἐν πάσαις ταῖς ἐπιστολαῖς, As also in all his epistles.] I do not think it necessary so to understand these words, as if the apostle were said to have spoken in all his epistles, that "the long-suffering of God was designed for their salvation;" for I do not find any thing of that nature in many of them: he speaks indeed generally of Christ's coming to judgment in them, but that seems not pertinent to the text. I therefore give the sense of the words thus: As also, according to the same wisdom, he hath written in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things, of which I am now discoursing, that is, of the day of the Lord's coming, and of the preparation we should make for it.

[15] Ἐν οἷς, In which.] This cannot relate to the epistles of Paul, because the words being of the neuter gender, cannot agree with ἐπιστολαῖς, "epistles," which is of the feminine; but to those things of which Peter had been discoursing in this chapter, and which were so wrested by the unlearned and unstable, that some of them thought, long before the writing of this epistle, that the day of the Lord was instant (2 Thess. ii. 2), and so became unstable in the faith (ver. 15). Some said, "the resurrection was past already, and thereby overthrew the faith of some" (2 Tim. ii. 18); some, wanting patience to expect it longer, left the assemblies of Christians (Heb. x. 18), and some questioned whether this promise would be made good at all, as here, ver. 4. 9, the resurrection of the flesh being by some thought "a thing absurd," they holding that it was "incapable of salvation;"* and the resurrection of the same body being by some looked on as a thing impossible; and these seem to be the ἐνσνόητα here mentioned.

[16] Ver. 18. Αὐξάνετε ἐν χάριτι, Grow in grace.] That grace signifies generally, in the New Testament, the favour of God to us, see note on 2 Cor. vi. 1.

THE FIRST

EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. JOHN,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

Concerning the author of this epistle, all ages have agreed that it was John, the apostle of our Lord and Saviour.

As for the time when it was written, some (both ancient and modern) writers think his epistles to be the last of his works, and therefore to have been written in the last years of Domitian. But Dr. Hammond hath very well observed, that this epistle must have been written some time before the great destruction which befell the Jews: (1.) Because he speaks of the last hour as now at hand; which that it must be understood of the last times of the Jewish state, see note on ii. 18. (2.) Because he speaks of the antichrist, ii. 18, and the false prophets, iv. 1, which were then among them, or come into the world; such as Christ tells us were to be the immediate forerunners of that destruction, Matt. xxiv. 24, declaring, that they went out from them of Judea, ver. 19. (3.) It being written by an apostle of the circumcision, it is not doubted but it was written to the Jews; but that it was an Epistle to the Parthians, as Austin,* Posidonius in his Index, and Idacius, contra Verim. aver; as I know nothing can be said against it, but that it only is asserted by authors of a later date: so, if Parthia be taken for the whole empire, as it was enlarged by the Arsacidæ, it is a farther proof, not only that this epistle was written to the Jews, who, saith Josephus,† abounded in Babylon and Mesopotamia, and had there three famous universities, one of them at Necrda, mentioned by Josephus; but also, that many of the ten tribes were then converted, they being seated in Mesopotamia and Media: for the text saith, that "they were carried away into Assyria, and placed in Halah and Habor, by the river Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes," 2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11. Now all these places, saith the learned Bochart,‡ are to be found thereabouts; and therefore John, being an apostle of the circumcision, may well be supposed to have written to them, though perhaps he was never there; as Paul writ some of his epistles to churches he had never seen.

Whence it was written, neither scripture nor any thing in antiquity that I have met with, give any ground for a conjecture.

The occasion of it seems to be, (1.) To arm those Jewish converts against those loose and pernicious doctrines which had obtained among the Jews, viz. that solifidian doctrine of being righteous by a faith that is not fruitful in good works, or without doing righteousness, 1 John ii. 29, iii. 7. 10, being children of the light, without walking in the light; favourites of God without obedience to his laws, or love to his servants. (2.) Against the madness of their zealots, abounding every where among them, who thought their zeal for God and for his laws would atone for their hatred and murder of their brethren, and for all the other sins, which, saith Josephus, they did so greedily commit (see note on Rom. ii. 1. 24, James i. 26). And, (3.) to preserve them steadfast in the truth, which they had "heard from the beginning," against those deceivers, antichrists, and false prophets, which were then among them, ii. 19. 26, iv. 1—3, and to continue them steadfast in the belief that "Jesus was the Christ the Son of God," v. 1.

And here, because that question hath made so great a noise of late, "Whether salvation or perdition depends upon believing or rejecting this one proposition, That Jesus was the Messiah," as, saith the author of the Reasonableness of Christianity, p. 43, adding, p. 47, that "all that was to be believed for justification, was no more but this single proposition, that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ, or the Messiah;" I shall endeavor briefly to state and explain this matter, and so give farther light to those words of this epistle, iv. 2. 15, vi. 1. 5, which seem to say the same thing.

Whereas then this author challenges all the systematical divines, p. 192, "to show that there was any other doctrine, upon their assent to which, or disbelief of it, men were pronounced believers or unbelievers, and accordingly received into the church of Christ as members of his body, as far as mere believing could make them so, or else kept out of it:" this I shall undertake to show,

First, From the express words of Christ, who requires of all his disciples, in order to their admission into the church by baptism, faith in "the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," Matt. xxviii. 19, saying, "He that believeth (this) and is baptized, shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned," Mark xvi. 16, he adds with an asseveration, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," John vi. 53; clearly declaring the necessity of faith in the body given, and his blood shed, for the remission of sins, to justification and salvation; we being "justified by his blood," and "through faith in his blood," Rom. iii. 25, v. 9.

Secondly, From the plain declaration of Paul, who, among the first things he preached to the Corinthians, as things by the belief of which they should be saved, mentions three articles; first of all, that "Christ died for our sins, according to the scriptures," 1 Cor. xv. 1—4. (2.) That "he was buried." And, (3.) that "he rose from the dead." In the same chapter he plainly asserts the necessity of believing the resurrection of the body, ver. 19. 32. Among the foundations and first principles of the doctrine of Christ, from which all Christians were to go on to perfection, he reckons "the doctrines of repentance, of faith towards God, of baptism, of laying on of hands (for the receiving of the Holy Ghost), of the resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment," Heb. vi. 1, 2. These therefore were then necessary to be believed by all Christians. The doctrine of the sufficiency of faith in Christ's death for justification without the works of the law, is by the same apostle declared to be so necessary, that he saith of them who gainsaid it, "Christ is become of no effect to you; ye are fallen from grace," Gal. v. 2. 4.

Moreover, it will be easy to account for the practice of our Lord and his apostles, who insist so much and lay so great stress upon this one article, if we consider who they preached to, and how much was contained in, or necessarily depended upon, the cordial belief of this one article.

First, then, Our Lord and his apostles, whilst he was on earth, preached only to the Jews, Matt. x. 6, that is, to them to whom "pertained the adoption, the glory, the covenants, the giving of the law, the service of God, and the promises," Geogr. S. lib. iii. cap. 14, p. 220.

Rom. ix. 4. and to whom "were committed the oracles of God," Rom. iii. 2; i. e. those scriptures which were "able to make them wise to salvation, with faith in Christ Jesus," 2 Tim. iii. 5, i. e. if they, to the belief of them, added faith in Christ, they teaching them the knowledge of the true God and the way in which he would be worshipped, and showing them "what was good, and what the Lord required of them." They also were writ by, and made frequent mention of, the Spirit of God, of the new covenant God would establish with them, "of the sufferings of Christ, and of the glory that should follow," 1 Pet. i. 11, of his prophetical, priestly, and his kingly office, of an Emanuel that should be born to them, whose "name should be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of peace," Isa. vii. 1. 14, ix. 6. It is not therefore to be wondered, that whilst our Saviour was on earth, he only called them to repentance, and faith in the promised Messiah.

Moreover, Paul's sermon, Acts xiii., was preached to the "children of the stock of Abraham," ver. 26; and yet he preached to them not only that Jesus was the Christ, but also that "he died, and rose again," and that "remission of sins was to be obtained through his name;" and that "by him all that believed were to be justified from all those things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses," ver. 38, 39. And though we find him once disputing in the school of one Tyrannus, we seldom find him preach any where but in a Jewish synagogue. Others also preached to the same persons; for "they that were dispersed upon the persecution of Stephen preached to the Jews only," Acts xi. 19.

We have, in the whole Acts of the Apostles, mention only of four persons who were not Jews by birth, to whom the gospel was thus preached; one of these was the eunuch, who was before a worshipper of God, as is probably conjectured, of the Jews' religion; and therefore "came up to Jerusalem to worship." Paul preacheth to Lydia in a Jewish synagogue, Acts xvi. 13, 14, and she was also one that worshipped God, and so in all probability of the Jews' religion. The centurion to whom Peter preached, was "one that feared God, wrought righteousness, was much in prayer and alms;" and yet Peter, before his baptism, preaches to him, and his friends, of "the word that God sent to the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ;" declaring how he was "anointed by God with the Holy Ghost, healed all that were oppressed of the devil, suffered and rose again," that he was "made Lord of all things," that he was "ordained of God to be the Judge of the quick and the dead," and that "through his name whosoever believed in him should receive remission of sins," Acts x. 36. 43. The only heathen family, that Paul admits to baptism, is the jailor's; and he first preaches to them "the word of the Lord," Acts xvi. 32; i. e. say even the Socinians, he summarily expounded to them* who this Jesus, this Son of God, was, what miracles he did, how he was crucified by the Jews, raised up again by God, taken up into heaven, made Lord of all things;" what promises he had made, what precepts he enjoined. I know this author saith, that preaching the word was only preaching that Jesus was the Messiah: but the scriptures cited by him do not say so: for the word, mentioned Acts x. 37, is the whole word which God sent to the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ. It is the word of the gospel, Acts xv. 7. It contains the whole ministry of the gospel, Acts vi. 4. All the counsel of God being "the word of his grace which was able to build them up, and give them an inheritance among them who were sanctified through faith in Christ," Acts xx. 27. 32. It cannot therefore be concluded, from the preaching of our Lord or his apostles, that they thought nothing more was necessary to be believed by Christians saving this one article, that "Jesus was the Christ."

Secondly, The belief of this proposition, that "Christ is the Messiah, and the Son of God," may well be represented as the chief initiating article of Christian faith; because where it is heartily professed, it carries with it a profession of believing all Christ's sayings, and of obeying all his precepts: and where it cordially is embraced, it produceth both this faith and practice. That "Jesus is the Christ," as it is the principal article of pure faith, the most peculiar doctrine of our religion, as it stands opposed to that of Judaism; so it doth virtually comprehend all other doctrines of moment in it, regarding either faith or practice. For to believe him to be the Christ, is to believe him to be "a Prophet sent from God, to teach the way of life unto us," John iii. 3, even "that Prophet which was to come into the world." Hence Christ applies these words to himself, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath appointed me to preach the gospel," &c. Luke iv. 18. Now sure we are obliged to embrace as truth whatsoever was taught by such a Prophet, and to obey all his precepts upon pain of destruction; for "whosoever will not hear this Prophet, shall be destroyed from the people," Acts iii. 23.

Again, To believe him to be the Christ, is to believe him to be the Son of God, according to that profession of Peter, "Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God," Matt. xvi. 16, and the inquiry of the high-priest, "Art thou the Christ, the Son of God?" Matt. xxvi. 63. Now this lays an obligation upon us to hear, that is, obey him; according to those words of God, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear him," Matt. xvii. 5. It is also to believe him to be our Lord and King, according to those words of the angel, "To you is born a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord," Luke ii. 11, and of Nathaniel, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel." Now this relation calls for obedience: "for why," saith our Saviour, "call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things that I say?" Luke vi. 46, and that on penalty of ruin from him, when he shall say, "Bring those mine enemies, who would not I should reign over them, and slay them before me," Luke xix. 27. It was also Jesus who was called Christ, even that Jesus who was to "save his people from their sins," and "a Saviour to give repentance and remission of sins," Matt. i. 21. Now upon such a King, and such a Saviour, we may securely rely for the obtainment of all the blessings and rewards which he hath promised to the obedient. Hence we may learn, that it was highly reasonable that the apostles should begin their preaching with proving and persuading this doctrine; that they should give such great commendations, annex such excellent privileges, offer such high rewards, to the hearty belief of such a comprehensive article, and should admit them to baptism who professed it; since "by that baptism, (saith this author, p. 196, 197,) they owned themselves the subjects of this Jesus whom they believed to be their Messiah (i. e. the Prophet sent from God to teach them), and received him for their Lord and King; and this was the solemn visible act whereby they who believed him to be the Messiah, received him as their King, and professed obedience to him, and so were admitted as subjects into his kingdom." For as every one who was circumcised, "became a debtor to obey the whole law" of Moses, Gal. v. 3, and therefore to believe it; so every person baptized, being of age, doth by that very baptism profess to believe all the doctrines, and obey the precepts, of the holy Jesus, in whose name he is baptized. And therefore, though John here says, "He that confesseth that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God," iv. 15, and, "Every one that believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God," v. 1, yet he requires of the same persons, in order to the same ends, that they should walk in the truth of the gospel, in conformity to the example of Christ, and to the love of God, and in obedience to his commands; and adds, that "he that is born of God sinneth not, neither can sin;" clearly insinuating, that this proposition, when cordially embraced, will produce a faith and practice answerable to it in our lives.

CHAPTER I.

1 That which was [1] from the beginning (of the gospel dispensation, that) which we have heard, which [2] we have seen (i. e. discerned as clearly as if we had seen it) with our eyes, (that) which we have looked upon, and our hands have (as it were) handled, of the Word of life, (declare we to you;

2 Nor have ye the least reason to suspect our testimony, either of this life, or the author and procurer of it:)(For the life (we speak of) was manifested (in the author and the promise of it), and we have seen (or known) it, and bear witness (to it), and shew unto you [3] that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us;)

3 That which we have seen and heard (of this Word of life) declare we unto you, that ye also may have [4] fellowship with us (in the same life): and truly our fellowship is [5] with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.

4 And these things write we unto you, that your joy may be full (i. e. that believing this eternal life, ye may rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory, 1 Pet. i. 8, 9. For which cause ye must carefully attend to another message he hath sent by us).

5 This then (and this) is the message which we have heard of him (i. e. from God by Jesus Christ), and declare unto you, that God is light (a pure and spotless Spirit), and in him is no darkness at all; (nothing of impurity or iniquity in his commands which are all holy, Rom. vii. 12, or in his actions, as in the heathen deities, he being holy in all his works.

6 And therefore) If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not (speak) the truth:

7 But if we walk in the light, [6] as he is in the light (endeavouring to be holy, as he is holy), we have [7] fellowship one with another, and the [8] blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all (those) sin (which might obstruct our communion with this holy

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Ὃ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς.] This I here render, "From the beginning" of the gospel dispensation; because I find that is the constant import of the phrase in this epistle, and elsewhere, where it relates to what Christians had heard and seen, as here. In this sense is, "That which ye have heard, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the beginning," used six times by our apostle in these epistles; viz. First Epistle, ii. 7. 24, twice, iii. 11; Second Epistle, ver. 6. So, "The commandment which we have received, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the beginning," First Epistle, ii. 7, Second Epistle, ver. 5, doth necessarily import its being Christ's new commandment of love. So, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς αὐτόπται, are "those who from the beginning of Christ's preaching were witnesses of what he said and did," Luke i. 2. And in this sense Christ saith to his disciples, "Ye have been with me, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the beginning," John xv. 27.

[2] Ὃ ἑωράκαμεν, Which we have seen.] That is, in the scripture phrase, said to be "seen" and "looked upon," which is as truly known and discerned by us, as if we had seen it. So the Jews are said to do the things which they have "seen with their Father," John viii. 38, and to have "seen the end of the Lord's dealing with Job," James v. 11. So we are said to "see God," or not to see him, 1 John iii. 6, Third Epistle, ver. 11; to "see the life" here, ver. 2. So also ψηλαφᾶν, when applied to spiritual things, is not to touch with the hand, but to apprehend with the mind, Acts xvii. 27. I confess, all these things are more properly true of the "Word made flesh;" of whom the apostles declared what they had heard from him, and seen of him, who "saw his glory," John i. 14, and what one of them had touched. But then the Λόγος agreeing only to the divine nature, a metaphorical sense must be allowed, in seeing and handling that.

[3] Ver. 2. Τὴν ζωὴν τὴν αἰώνιον, ἥτις ἦν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, That eternal life which was with the Father.] Thus of our eternal life, the apostle saith, it is "hid with Christ in God," Col. iii. 3, and of the evangelical dispensation, that before the revelation of it by Christ and his apostles, it was "a mystery hid in God," Eph. iii. 9. But this also may be applied to the divine Λόγος, styled by this apostle, "Life eternal;" v. 20; who was "in the bosom of the Father, and was manifested to us," John i. 18. Yet two things seem to favour the first interpretation.

First, That the phrase here used, being not ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν, He subsisted in the beginning of all things; but only, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ἦν, "He was from the beginning," this phrase excludes not his creation, as the other seems to do; and, as I have observed, it chiefly is applied, by this apostle, to the beginning of the gospel dispensation.

Secondly, That though ὁ λόγος and ζωὴ, absolutely put, are spoken of Christ, yet ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς, is never used concerning the person of Christ, but is expressly used of that word by which eternal life is manifested; as when we are bid to "hold fast, λόγον ζωῆς, the word of life," Phil. ii. 16, and when the apostles are bid to teach, τὰ ῥήματα τῆς ζωῆς, "the words of this life," Acts v. 20 (see Acts xiii. 16).

[4] Ver. 3. Κοινωνίαν μεθ' ἡμῶν, Fellowship with us.] It doth not follow hence, as Esthius imagines, that no man can have fellowship with God, who hath not fellowship with the church (though that be doubtless true of fellowship with the invisible church, united to Christ by the Spirit, and so made a habitation of God through the Spirit, and of fellowship in doctrine, and communion with the church of the apostles): for, as "like precious faith with us" is only such faith as we have, 2 Pet. ii. 1, so here, "fellowship with us," is only such fellowship as we have.

[5] Μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς, With the Father.] We being "heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ," Rom. viii. 17, and being united to, and having communion with, the Father and the Son, by the Spirit of both dwelling in us, John xiv. 21. 23, Eph. ii. 21, 22, Rom. viii. 9. 11, and he being to us the earnest of this life, 2 Cor. i. 22, v. 5, Eph. i. 13, 14, who "seals us up to the day of redemption," Eph. iv. 30.

[6] Ver. 7. Ὡς αὐτός ἐστιν ἐν τῷ φωτὶ, As he is in the light.] That this metaphor of "light" relates not to the knowledge or the felicity, but to the purity of the divine nature, appears, (1.) from the injunction, to "walk in the light, as he is in the light;" for we are not any where bid to resemble God in knowledge or in happiness, but we are commanded to "be holy as he is holy." (2.) From the darkness set in opposition to it; which doth not refer so much to the ignorance of men, as to the vices they practised in a state of ignorance (see note on Rom. xiii. 12).

[7] Κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' ἀλλήλων, We have communion one with another.] Some manuscripts read, μετ' αὐτοῦ, "with him;" which either is the true reading, or gives the true sense of the other reading: i. e. We have communion with God, and he with us; as is evident from ver. 6. Moreover, the apostle had said nothing before of our communion with one another, but only of our "fellowship with God," ver. 6, "with the Father and the Son," ver. 3, which makes it reasonable to refer the words to that communion, of which the apostle so often speaketh in this epistle (see ii. 5, 6. 24, iii. 24, iv. 13). Notwithstanding, it is true, that then we have communion with one another, by virtue of that Holy Spirit which enlightens us, and enables us to walk in the light.

[8] Τὸ αἷμα Χριστοῦ, The blood of Christ cleanseth us from all sin.] This cannot well relate to that effect of the blood of Christ, which we call "justification by faith in his blood," or the remission of our past sins, by virtue of our faith in Christ dying for us; for that follows immediately upon our faith, and cannot require that a habit of purity, or of walking in the light, should precede it: it therefore seemeth to God, and our attainment of the life thus manifested to us.

8 And of this expiation we shall have need, for) [9]If we say that we have no sin (to be thus cleansed from), we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us: (for in many things we offend all, James iii. 2, and therefore are required to pray daily for the remission of our sins, and have even after our regeneration need of this advocate for the propitiation of our sins, ii. 1, 2. See 1 Kings viii. 46, Eccles. vii. 21.

9 But) If we confess (these) our sins, he (who hath made this new covenant in the blood of Christ that he will be merciful to our iniquities, Heb. viii. 8) is faithful (to his promise) and just to forgive us our sins (upon the satisfaction made to his justice by the death of Christ), and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.

10 (But) If we (continue to) say that we have not sinned (and therefore do not need this expiation through the blood of Christ), we make him a liar, (who hath declared, both in the Old and New Testament, that all have sinned, and fallen short of the glory of God, Rom. i. 23,) and his word is not in us.

refer to those sinful infirmities and defects, which, in this state of imperfection, cleave to our best actions, and even good men are still subject to, and which do not deprive us of the divine favour, or of an entrance into that new Jerusalem, "into which nothing enters that is polluted or unclean;" because in this new covenant of grace, established in the death of Christ, his blood doth cleanse all faithful and sincere Christians from the guilt of them.

The blood of Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.] Here note, that these words confute the quakers, who hold that those who are in the light, are guilty of no sin: for were this so, they could be cleansed from none by the blood of Jesus (see the text defended, Examen Millii).

[9] Ver. 8—10.] The question is, of whom the apostle speaketh here, whether of sincere Christians, after their conversion to the Christian faith, or only of them considered before they entered on that state. That John here speaks only of the latter, is argued from these considerations:

1. That the apostle doth plainly teach the contrary to the first exposition, by saying, "He that is born of God, sinneth not," iii. 9, v. 18. But to this I shall return an answer in the comment on those places.

2. That these words run in the preterperfect tense, "If we say, οὐχ ἡμαρτήκαμεν, we have not sinned;" whereas some single acts of lesser sins they were then still subject to, to whom he speaks.

Ans. True; and therefore he adviseth them to confess them, that they might obtain forgiveness of them: now confessing of them must be after they have been committed.

3. Because this phrase, ἁμαρτίαν ἔχειν, "to have sin," is still used of such sins as will condemn us at the last, John ix. 41, xv. 22. 24, xix. 11.

Ans. The text cited from xix. 11 is impertinent: the other two may be taken absolutely, as to the matter spoken of: i. e. they had been guilty of no sin of infidelity, if Christ had not come to them, or if he had not proved his mission (xv. 22. 24), or if he had wanted means to discern the truth (ix. 41); nor would their sin of infidelity have been condemning, had they confessed it, and forsaken it.

Since then the apostle was speaking (ver. 7), of them who "walked in the light," who had "communion with God," and who were "cleansed from the guilt of sin;" and (ver. 8) goes on to add, "If we say we have no sin;" it seems more probable, that he speaks there at least of the same persons.

Note also, that some of the Jews* professed to be ἀναμάρτητοι πρὸς Θεὸν, καὶ μηδεμιᾶς μετασχόντες, supply ἁμαρτίας, "free from all sins and offences against God;" and of such may the last verse be interpreted. They varying in this from the doctrine of other Jews: for Maimonides† truly saith, Nullus homo dari potest qui non peccet, vel ignorantèr in dogmate et sententiâ aliquâ amplectendâ, aut qualitate eligendâ quæ non eligenda est, vel ob iræ aliorumque affectuum vehementiam et prædominationem.

CHAPTER II.

1 My little children, these things (concerning the necessity of walking in the light, and putting off the deeds of darkness,) write I unto you, that ye sin not (i. e. that ye live not in any course of sin). And [1]if any man (through the infirmity of the flesh be overtaken with a) sin, we (Christians) have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, (the Just One, in whom was no sin, 1 Pet. iii. 18:)

2 And [2]he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for our's only, but [3]also for the sins of the whole world.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἐάν τις ἁμάρτῃ, And if any man sin.] Though that is not to be interpreted of sins of infirmity only; yet since the apostle is here speaking of his "little children," whose past sins were already "forgiven them, for his name's sake" (ver. 12. 16), and the apostle would not encourage them in wilful or habitual sins, I think, as it relates to them it chiefly is to be referred to those sins of ignorance, weakness, and infirmity, which will be pardoned by the tenor of the new covenant, through Christ's intercession.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἱλασμός ἐστι περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν, He is the propitiation for our sins.] In the Old Testament, the sin-offering which made atonement for a trespass, that it might be forgiven, is called, κρίος ἱλασμοῦ, "the ram of atonement," Lev. vi. 6, 7, Numb. v. 8; and that which in the law is φέρειν, or προσάγειν τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, "to bring an offering for sin," is in Ezekiel, προσφέρειν ἱλασμὸν, "to bring an atonement," or propitiation (Ezek. xliv. 27). When therefore it is said here of Jesus Christ, that he is ἱλασμὸν, "the propitiation for our sins;" and, iv. 10, that God sent him into the world, to be, ἱλασμὸν, "the propitiation for our sins;" have we not reason to conclude, he was so our propitiation, as were all the sin-offerings of the Jews for them, viz. by suffering in our stead, to make atonement for our sins, and so to render God propitious to us, in the forgiveness of them? Moreover, why is he styled "Jesus Christ the just," or "righteous," who made propitiation for our sins, if he intended not to intimate, that the just suffered instead of the unjust, to make an atonement for their sins? To this Crellius replies, that δίκαιος should be rendered, not "the just," but "the faithful."
